CALIFORNIA REPORTER

287 PACIFIC REPORTER

SHANNON v. NORTHWESTERN PAC.
R. CO.

S. F. 13054.

Supreme Court of California.

April 16, 1930.

Railroads — 348(6) — Crossing — Collision — Contributory negligence — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence, in action for personal injuries and damages to automobile sustained in collision at railroad crossing, held to show plaintiff contributorily negligent.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by William Shannon against the Northwest Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment of nonsuit and dismissal, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Daniel A. Ryan and Vincent W. Hallinan, both of San Francisco (George F. Snyder, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Stanley Moore, R. W. Palmer, and Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

Appeal from a judgment of nonsuit and dismissal.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company on account of injuries to his person and damage to his automobile caused by the electric train of respondent striking and colliding with said automobile at Greenfield avenue crossing, a point on said railroad between San Anselmo and the city of San Rafael, at the hour of about 2:50 p. m., January 17, 1925. The section of the general double-track system of said railroad company over which said electric cars were operated at the time said injuries were inflicted extends in a general easterly direction from San Anselmo, crossing said Greenfield avenue, and terminating at San Rafael.

Appellant had taken his wife for a visit to the home of the Luchessi family, who were nearby neighbors, and was returning from the latter residence by way of Greenfield avenue, which crosses said railroad at grade, at right angles. Upon reaching the crossing, he observed an electric train on the southerly track moving easterly towards San Rafael. He paused his car at a distance of eight feet from the nearest rail and waited for said train to pass. When the last car passed, he proceeded to cross the double tracks and, when about half way across the northerly or second track, the car which he was driving was struck by an electric train coming from the east and badly damaged from the impact. Appellant sustained a broken collar bone, a fractured rib, painful bruises, and a number of minor cuts. Whether the trains were two or three-car trains is left in a state of uncertainty. There seems to be a slight curve in the railroad track looking easterly from said crossing, but it was not sufficient to seriously affect visibility for a distance of three or four hundred feet at least. Appellant testified that the eastbound train obstructed his view of the westbound train, and that certain trees and bushes near the track aided also in that respect. He also testified that the only whistle he heard sounded was the signal given by the eastbound train. Two or three other persons were questioned as to the blowing of the whistle, but their testimony was negligible on that issue. Plaintiff testified that upon crossing said tracks he went into the third gear, which meant that his mileage per hour was from three to five miles, and that he could have stopped his car in a distance of three or four feet. He also testified that the eastbound train was traveling at a high rate of speed. The westbound train was brought to a stop after the collision within the length of the train plus twenty feet, that is to say, the rear car was twenty feet past the point where the automobile was struck.

Appellant had resided for twenty-nine years within a very short distance of the crossing in question. He testified that he had crossed the track at that point more than one hundred times, and was so familiar with the train schedules that passing trains served him as a timepiece. He gave the impression that it was unusual for trains to pass at the point in question, but he produced testimony which clearly established the contrary fact.

We have examined the entire record in the case, and find nothing therein that would justify us in reversing the judgment. The learned trial judge, in passing upon the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a judgment for appellant used the diagram or map prepared by the plaintiff to illustrate his position and said:

"And after Mr. Shannon did start up, until he got to this south rail, there is no question at all if he looked down there he could see three or four hundred feet down the track. And then going three to five miles an hour, he could have stopped, because anywhere along here would have been a place of safety. This track, the testimony shows, is straight for several hundred feet. To the west there is no indication of any train coming, or due or in danger of coming. So it seems to me if Mr. Shannon came out this far on the track and stopped and looked—with-out stopping, if he had looked—he would have seen the train approaching from the east. * * * So it looks to me as though, much as I dislike to do it, I will have to grant the motion. [After discussion.] Well, I do not think I could look at it any other way except he was guilty of contributory negligence."

The court further stated that by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of appellant the accident would have been avoided. Upon an examination of the record, including the transcript of testimony, we find no grounds upon which its judgment may be overthrown.

Judgment affirmed.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action on a contract of guaranty evidenced by writings dated January 12 and 19, 1925, respectively.

The plaintiffs, Segaloff and wife and Greenberg, contracted to exchange certain real property owned by them in Hollywood for certain installment contracts for the sale of certain lots in a subdivision owned by the defendants in Orange county. As a part of the same transaction, the defendants guaranteed in writing that whenever the payments on any of said installment contracts should be delinquent and remain unpaid for three months after June 1, 1925, the defendants would pay the installments in default and would thereafter pay the installments upon said delinquent contracts until the same should be paid in full. Delinquency occurred as contemplated by the contract of guaranty. Demand was made on the defendants for payment in accordance therewith. Upon failure to comply with the demand this action was brought. The signing of the contract was admitted, but the answer set up a special defense of want of consideration, alleging that the sole consideration for the contract of guaranty was certain oral promises made by the plaintiffs at the time the contract was executed which promises had not been performed, and the further special defense of fraud, alleging that the plaintiffs made the alleged oral promises with the intention of not performing the same.

[1] The evidence as to the issues framed by the pleadings was sharply in conflict, and the court, within its province, found thereon in favor of the plaintiffs. Under familiar rules such findings may not be disturbed on appeal.

The contract of guaranty recites the execution of the contract of exchange. The documentary evidence fully supports the contention of the plaintiffs that the contract of guaranty was a part of the consideration running to the plaintiffs in the contract of exchange.

[2] We find no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in allowing an amendment to the complaint to be filed during the course of the trial setting up the supplemental contract between the parties of date January 19, 1925. The purpose of the supplemental contract was to make, on behalf of the defendants, the terms of the original contract of guaranty more certain with reference to the amount of the guaranty and on behalf of the plaintiffs to insure the payment by the defendants of interest as well as principal to become due under the contract of guaranty in the event that delinquencies occurred on said contracts of sale. The agreements dated January 12 and January 19, 1925, respectively, constituted one contract of guaranty and as such were properly so impleaded in the complaint as amended.

We find no error in the record, and the findings support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

SENECA CONSOL. GOLD MINES CO. v.
GREAT WESTERN POWER CO. OF CALIFORNIA.★

Sac. 4147.

Supreme Court of California.

March 28, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 24, 1930.

1. Pleading ⇨129(1) — Allegations — Failure to deny — Admission.

Allegations in complaint not denied by defendant are admitted by implication.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨51 — Riparian rights — Flow of water.

Riparian landowner has right to natural flow of water in its accustomed channel unless another has acquired superior right by license, grant, or prescription.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨46 — Riparian right — Generation of electricity.

Use of stream for generation of electricity is legitimate exercise of riparian right.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8) — Riparian right — Adverse use.

Evidence held to establish that impounding of water by upper proprietor for generation of electricity was adverse to lower riparian owner's right, and not merely exercise of riparian right.

It was admitted by stipulation that the impounding of the water by upper proprietor was not confined to flood or freshet waters, but extended also to natural flow of stream, and that water not required for generation of electricity was stored and later discharged at time necessary for generation of electricity.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨152(6) — Upper proprietor — Use of stream — Presumption.

Use of stream by upper proprietor will be presumed to be riparian and not adverse until facts are brought home to lower proprietor showing adverse use.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨51 — Riparian rights — Flow of water.

Lower riparian proprietor held not entitled to flow of constant invariable specific quantity of water.

7. Waters and water courses ⇨40 — Riparian right — "Tenancy in common."

Riparian right is in its nature a "tenancy in common," and not a separate or severable estate.

8. Waters and water courses ⇨152(7) — Diversion — Riparian right — Damages.

Evidence as to plans of lower proprietor to use waters, extent of project and probable cost thereof, would not be proper matters to be considered in assessing damages for diversion by upper proprietor.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨152(9) — Riparian right — Violation — Damages.

Market value of property with and without water right would be basis of damages for violation of riparian right to natural flow of water.

PRESTON, J.

This appeal involves a conflict of claims to the right of use of the waters of the North fork of the Feather river at certain points thereon in Plumas county. The record is large and the briefs of counsel are numerous and voluminous, but we intend to confine this discussion within comparatively narrow limits.

Plaintiff, a corporation, the owner of certain lode mining claims, on the 9th day of August, 1924, sued defendant public utility corporation to enjoin it from diverting the natural and normal flow of the waters of said stream above plaintiff's lands. The complaint is in two counts. The first is predicated upon its prescriptive right in said stream, and the second upon its riparian right therein. Defendant answered, framing its pleadings to call into operation the provisions of section 534 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the chapter on "Eminent Domain," first making categorical denial of some of the allegations of the complaint, admitting directly and by implication other allegations, but resting its defense in the main upon a claim of prescriptive rights in said waters, estoppel, and the statute of limitations. At the same time it also filed its cross-complaint, pleading in effect that, if any rights to the use of said stream by plaintiff, other than its prescriptive right to 2,500 miners' inches of water, be found to exist, that it be allowed a judgment condemning such rights pursuant to the law of eminent domain.

The cause was tried beginning on the 4th day of May, 1927. The trial was in two parts. The equitable issues were heard by the court and the issue as to damages by the court sitting with a jury. The court first announced its conclusion respecting the rights of the parties, finding the extent and measure of plaintiff's prescriptive right and further finding in plaintiff a riparian right in the remainder of the normal flow of said stream in addition; then it defined concretely both of these rights; submitted to the jury the issue of damages; received its verdict; made formal findings embracing the verdict and all the other facts, and thereafter entered its judgment declaring the rights of plaintiff and decreed an injunction as prayed unless the amount of the verdict, $350,000, was deposited in court or a bond given in lieu thereof within the time provided by law. Defendant has appealed on a full record.

The above outline will aid us in our consideration of the material facts, which we shall now set forth. The North fork of the Feather river is a natural water course, with well-defined bed and banks, having its source in the Sierra Nevada mountains, and being fed and supplied for its normal and natural flow from creeks and springs, and in particular from a large spring situate in Big Meadows, Plumas county. Plaintiff, at the commencement of the action, was the owner of some five different lode mining claims, the first of which was known as the White Lily, located on April 4, 1896. All are traversed by said stream. From that date plaintiff's predecessors in interest began to divert and plaintiff and/or said predecessors have since continuously diverted the waters of said stream by dam, ditch, flume, and pipe line to the said claim and have used them for operating a quartz stampmill thereon, and also for mining, milling, irrigation, and domestic purposes, as well as for the generating of electric power for said mine. The amount of this diversion is one of the questions in dispute. Defendant conceded it to be to the extent of 2,500 miners' inches. The court, however, found it to be 4,240 miners' inches or 106 second feet.

The court found also that, prior to the inception of any rights on the part of defendant in said stream, plaintiff located and made discovery upon a second mining claim, known as the Addie Bell lode claim, and that it, too, was entitled to riparian rights in said stream superior to the appropriative claims of defendant. Defendant disputes the finding that discovery of said Addie Bell claim was made prior to the inception of its rights.

As to the three remaining claims of plaintiff, the court found that said upper appropriation made by defendant was superior to the riparian rights otherwise adhering therein.

In 1902 the predecessors in interest of defendant posted notices of appropriation of the waters of said stream at the intended points of diversion, being points on said river above the property of plaintiff. These notices were regular in form, properly posted, and work thereunder was pursued in the manner provided by law for the perfecting of appropriative rights. In the year 1913 the predecessors of defendant, as a part of this development, constructed a dam across said stream about six miles above the mining claims of plaintiff, thereby restraining the natural flow as well as the flood waters of said stream, flooding the said Big Meadows and creating a large artificial reservoir commonly known as Lake Almanor. The object of this development was the storing of the normal and flood waters of said stream for the purpose of generating by its use electric energy for sale to the public.

At about the same time defendant, or its predecessors, also completed the first unit of its plan by constructing a power house on the said stream at a point known as Big Bend, some thirty miles below said mining claims of plaintiff. Said power house was built to use the flow of said river at said point in the generation of electric current. From the year 1913 to the year 1921 there was no other outlet for said dam except down the said Feather river. Defendant used said dam for the purpose of storing in said reservoir such waters as it required for the operation of its said power house, and later discharged down said river such waters from said reservoir at such times and in such amounts as were necessary for the convenient and successful operation of its said power plant, bearing in mind always and respecting the prescriptive rights of plaintiff. In the year 1921 defendant completed the construction of diversion works to take from said Lake Almanor into a reservoir in Butt valley, and thence to another power plant constructed by it and called the Caribou plant, situated also on said stream below the claims of plaintiff, and above the plant at Big Bend, a portion of the waters of said stream, and from the year 1921 to the commencement of this action defendant has diverted from said lake and passed around the claims of plaintiff, and discharged into said stream below said claims a part of said water so stored in said reservoir and has used the water so diverted for the generation of electric energy at said last-mentioned power house. At the time of the commencement of this action defendant was engaged in constructing a cut in the bottom of said Lake Al-manor, leading to the entrance to said tunnel from said lake into Butt valley, through which it could take more of the waters of said reservoir than it had theretofore diverted, and the court found it to be, and admittedly it is, the intention of defendant, when authorized by law so to do, to divert around plaintiff's land all of the waters of said stream in excess of the prescriptive right to which plaintiff is finally found to be entitled.

Many contentions are made by defendant for a reversal of the judgment, a number of which will be referred to in passing, but, to our mind, the underlying proposition which determines the course of this appeal is whether or not defendant has, by its acts and conduct, gained a prescriptive right over plaintiff in and to the use of any of the usual or normal flow of said stream. As above intimated, the court accorded to defendant no preferential right therein, and, moreover, declined to allow the jury to give consideration to any such claim by defendant. If any such right existed, then defendant was entitled to have it weighed in assessing the amount of damage done plaintiff's lands by the proposed diversion of the stream. If a material element tending to reduce the damages suffered by plaintiff was denied consideration, then, of course, the error was prejudicial. In order to realize the importance of this issue, it is necessary to state further findings of the court.

The court found, as already noted, that plaintiff's prescriptive right in said stream for the use of said mining claims was 4,240 miners' inches or 106 second feet of water; also: "That the White Lily Quartz Claim and the Addie Bell Quartz Claims are riparian to the North Fork of the Feather River and that the riparian rights attached thereto are superior to any right of defendant in and to any of the normal flow of the waters of the North Fork of the Feather River." "That it is not true that since the year 1913, or at any other time, or at all, that defendant has openly and notoriously, or openly, or notoriously, under claim of right or otherwise, increased and diminished the volume of water in said river at will, but on the contrary the Court finds that prior to August, 1921, that the water passing through the lands of plaintiff has at all times been equal to or in excess of 581.05 second feet of water." The court also found that "plaintiff is entitled to have the waters of the North Fork of Feather River flow in their original and natural channel and without obstruction, interruption or diminution, and without diversion thereof, not exceeding 581.05 second feet. * * *" The court also made the finding that "plaintiff is entitled to have by reason of use and under the stipulations between the parties 4240 miners' inches flow down at all times, in the natural channel of the North Fork of Feather River without restriction or interruption, and that in addition thereto plaintiff is entitled to have flow down without interruption by defendant, 475 second feet of the waters of the North Fork of Feather River, as the riparian owner of the White Lily and Addie Bell Quartz Mining Claims."

In its charge to the jury, while deliberating upon the issue of damages, the court instructed it as follows: "The Court has also found that the plaintiff, Seneca Consolidated Gold Mines Company, are entitled, by reason of such riparian ownership, to have flow through said mining claims throughout the year an amount of water equal to the ordinary usual and normal flow of said river for the months of July, August and September as shown by the evidence, the mean of which has been testified to be 581.05 second feet or 23,242 miners' inches of water measured under a four-inch pressure."

It will thus be seen that in effect the jury were told that plaintiff had a right to a specific concrete amount of water and was entitled to have the same at all times flow by its lands. In other words, the riparian right of plaintiff was defined to be a constant specific right to so many second feet of water measured, not at defendant's dam, but at its own property. The implication from the findings above quoted is that defendant has no prescriptive right whatever in the normal waters of the stream, but, on the contrary, held and enjoyed only the right to divert and store what is known as extraordinary flood waters, in which no riparian right usually inheres. In other words, the court's findings preclude any claim on the part of defendant to a prescriptive right to store, impound, or manipulate to any extent the normal flow of the said stream.

The question then is: Does the evidence support such an implied finding? Admittedly for more than nine years defendant operated said reservoir. Admittedly its action was open and notorious and it paid all taxes assessed against it. By a stipulation of the parties it was conceded that its storage was not confined to the flood or freshet waters, but extended also to the "natural flow" of said stream. By the same stipulation it was admitted that said dam was used "for the purpose of storing in the reservoir created thereby such water of the north fork of the Feather River as was not at the time required for the operation of the defendant's said power house at Big Bend and later discharging down such river such water from said reservoir at such times and in such amounts as was necessary for the operation of said Big Bend power plant."

[1] It was alleged in plaintiff's complaint and by implication admitted by failure of defendant's answer to deny, as follows: "That defendant, by means of said dam, so constructed as aforesaid, prevents the normal and natural flow of said North Fork of Feather River from flowing in its natural channel down, through, over and across the lands of plaintiff; that said defendant by the manipulation of a gate in said dam is able to increase and diminish the volume of water, flowing in said North Fork of Feather River below its said dam, at will, and that said defendant so does, thereby rendering it unsafe for plaintiff, its agents, servants and employees to be on or along said stream on the property of plaintiff and thereby making it impossible for plaintiff to regulate, in any manner, its diversion of the waters thereof or to maintain its diversion works and equipment to plaintiff's great and irreparable damage and for which plaintiff has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law." There is therefore, under the undisputed admission of the parties, a complete refutation of the claim that defendant has stored for all these years only storm waters of said stream.

Furthermore, the only other reliable evidence introduced on the subject was the records of defendant's company as to the discharges from said reservoir during the period intervening between 1916 and 1924, inclusive, from which it is clear that for months at a time few or no discharges were permitted from said reservoir. This fact is conceded by respondent. In other words, during the periods of high water, the stream would be largely fed by tributaries below defendant's dam and the necessity for water from the reservoir would be slight, and during said periods defendant would store practically all the waters of said stream reaching its dam and thus build up a supply for use during the seasons of low water.

But respondent contends that the uniformity of flow at its lands during the period of heavy run-off was maintained by the influx of water above its lands and below defendant's dam. It must be here specially noted that these waters are not to be diverted by defendant, and respondent is not entitled to consider them in ascertaining the existence of a prescriptive right in defendant nor as an element of injury on the taking sought. Furthermore, that the use by defendant was by the court thought to be adverse seems to follow from its finding that, as to the three other mining claims of plaintiff, defendant owned an appropriative right in the entire stream in excess of the prescriptive right of plaintiff, for the court in that connection charged the jury as follows: "You are instructed that as to all the lands of the Seneca Company except the White Lily and Addie Bell Claims, the power company has, by reason of the priority of its appropriations, the superior right to the water of the river in excess of 106 second feet and that you are not in any way, directly or indirectly, to take into consideration the value, if any, which the waters of the river may have for use upon any lands, either of the Seneca Company or anyone else, other than the two claims mentioned, the White Lily and the Addie Bell."

Respondent, however, meets this contention by the assertion that defendant during all this storage was itself a riparian owner, and that the storage carried on was in the exercise of its riparian right and not adverse to its riparian right. Citing Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 124, 211 P. 11. This contention it supports by the further statement that up to the inception of this proceeding it had enjoyed the use of all the water of the stream it needed.

In view of the above-noted contention, a general definition of the right of storage in a riparian proprietor seems to be required of the court. The question in another form is: May a riparian owner, when the stream carries more water than is necessary for the propulsion of his mill or power plant, store such surplus water until he shall be able to use it in a contemplated dry season to follow?

[2] The riparian doctrine comes down to us from the common law, and it has been repeatedly defined in this state; hence little time need be spent in recounting the holdings of the courts in this regard. A few citations will suffice.

"* * * Every owner of land, through which a natural stream flows, has a usufruct in the water of the stream as it passes along, and has an equal right with those above and below him to the natural flow of the water in its accustomed channel, at its usual level, without unreasonable detention or substantial diminution in quantity or quality, and that none of the owners can make any use of it prejudicial to the rights of the other owners, unless he has acquired a right to do so by license, grant, or prescription." Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights (2d Ed.) vol. 1, p. 939, § 543. Citing Paige v. Rocky Ford Canal, etc., Co., 83 Cal. 84, 21 P. 1102, 23 P. 875; Chauvet v. Hill, 93 Cal. 407, 28 P. 1066, and other decisions. See, also, Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co., 200 Cal. 81, 252 P. 607, and volume 25, Cal. Jur., pp. 1060 et seq., where the cases are collated.

But to what extent may such owner detain, store, or impound the waters before the right ceases to be a riparian one and becomes an adverse or appropriative right which may ripen into a prescriptive one, is the question? Little has been said on this point by the courts in recent years. In the days of the old mills, when the momentum of the stream upon the overshot wheel furnished the power, this question was present, and received thoughtful consideration by the courts, particularly in New York, Massachusetts, and Texas. The logic of the positions then taken seems to be entirely sound and to be controlling here.

In Rhodes v. Whitehead, 27 Tex. 304, 84 Am. Dec. 631, 634, it is said: "And the momentum of the stream may be resorted to as a power for making it available, or it may be turned by a proprietor on his own land by a dam, or by any other means which he may find appropriate for the purpose. Yet, unless he has acquired the right of doing so by grant, license, or such adverse possession as will give him the right by prescription, he cannot do it in a manner that will unreasonably detain the water, not consumed, from the riparian owners below, or throw it back beyond the line where it passes from the land of the owner above him. For every party must exercise his own rights, and use his own property in such a manner as shall not cause detriment to that of another."

In 40 Cyc. p. 606, we find the matter summed up as follows: "A riparian owner has a right to erect a dam across the stream on his land, and to detain the water for such reasonable time as may be necessary to raise the requisite head, and accumulate such a quantity as will enable him to use the water for the purpose of his machinery; but he cannot, as against a lower riparian owner, by means of a storage dam erected on his own land, detain such surplus water of the stream as he may not require for his present use until it may be wanted by him in a dry season. * * *"

Probably the best considered case on the subject to be found anywhere is the case of Clinton v. Myers, 46 N. Y. 511, 7 Am. Rep. 373. Quoting from the syllabus, paragraphs 1 and 2, it is said: "No riparian proprietor has a right to use the water of a stream to the prejudice of other proprietors above or below, unless he has a prior right to divert it, or a title to some exclusive enjoyment. He may use the water while it flows over his land as an incident thereto, but he cannot unreasonably detain it, or give it another direction, but must return it to its ordinary channel when it leaves his estate. A party has a right to erect a dam across a stream upon his land, and such machinery as the stream in its ordinary stages is adequate to propel, and if, in seasons of drought, it becomes inadequate for that purpose, he may detain the waters for such a reasonable time, as may be necessary to raise the requisite head to enable him to use it advantageously and profitably upon such machinery. He has no right to erect machinery, requiring for its propulsion more water than the stream furnishes at its ordinary stages, and operate such machinery by accumulating the water and discharging it upon those below in unusual quantities to their prejudice. Nor has he a right to create a reservoir, and detain and store the water therein for future use in a dry season." This doctrine has been reaffirmed in New York in several recent cases. See Fulton County, etc., Co. v. Rockwood Mfg. Co., 205 App. Div. 787, 200 N. Y. S. 225; United P. B. Co. v. Iroquois P. & P. Co., 226 N. Y. 38, 123 N. E. 200; Little Falls Fibre Co. v. Ford & Son, Inc., 249 N. Y. 495, 164 N. E. 558, and Ford & Son v. Little Falls Fibre Co., 50 S. Ct. 140, 74 L. Ed. —, decided January 6, 1930, which is indirectly in point.

See, also, as directly in point, Still v. Palouse Irr. & Power Co., 64 Wash. 606, 117 P. 466, 467, which concerns a stream in Washington much like in its habits the stream under consideration here. Defendants were enjoined by a lower riparian proprietor from storing the water of the natural flow for future use, and the court there said: "Water may not thus be gathered into reservoirs for future use, when it may best suit the convenience and use of one riparian owner, and thus deprive other riparian owners of their use and service of the stream in its natural condition, unless such right is exercised under a valid prior appropriation."

[4] It is plain, therefore, that the use of the stream by defendant was adverse and not in the exercise merely of a riparian right. The use was as much adverse and could have been as readily enjoined as if the diversion had been to another watershed for use on non-riparian lands.

[5] The holding in the case of Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 124, 211 P. 11, when properly understood, is not in conflict but in accord with these views. It is true that if an upper proprietor is making a certain use of the stream, which may or may not, from the face of the act, be intended as an adverse claim against the proprietor below, it will, when the use is under inquiry, be presumed to be a riparian and not an adverse one, until facts are brought home to the lower proprietor showing the use above to be adverse. This must be true because of the long line of cases which hold that the lower riparian proprietor may enjoin a nonriparian use on the stream above him, even though no present damage is done upon the ground that such use may ripen into a prescriptive right. See 26 Cal. Jur., pp. 538, 539, where the cases are collected.

The foregoing discussion is in reality but a confirmation of the reasoning of this court in Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co., supra, on practically a parallel state of facts, the only difference being that in that case the court found the storage to be an unreasonable exercise of the riparian right, while here we have impliedly a contrary finding. The facts are not in dispute. The question is then one of law. In describing the situation in the above-cited case, Mr. Justice

Richards uses this language (200 Cal. 110, 111, 252 P. 607, 619): " * * * And as to said waters as a whole and to the extent of their retention in said reservoirs, their ultimate return to the river would depend, not at all upon the claims and asserted rights of lower riparian owners to the usual, natural, and ordinary flow of said waters, but altogether upon the will and convenience of the defendants in their proposed utilization of said waters for power production." And in portraying the legitimate result of the reasoning employed by defendant in behalf of the right of storage, he uses the following language: "The asserted right of the defendants herein as riparian owners along said river and incidentally the asserted rights and claims of all those who have appeared herein as amici curiæ claiming similar rights in similar rivers in this state, would, if permitted, put an end to the whole doctrine of riparian rights, not only as to these plaintiffs and all other lower riparian owners similarly situated, but also as to the defendants themselves, since any person or aggregation of persons having the financial ability and acquiring a riparian ownership in lands above those of the defendants along the yet higher reaches of said river would thus become entitled to exercise all the rights which the defendants are here claiming, even against them, with the resultant drying up of the defendants' own reservoirs."

The essence of the riparian right for power, therefore, is that the land owner is entitled to the benefit of the hydraulic effect of the natural flow of the stream measured by its drop from the highest point to the lowest on his land. He, too, may make such temporary detention in forebays or reservoirs as will insure him this right, but a detention of surplus water above his needs, from a wet season to a dry one, when he may utilize it, is not a use of the stream as it flows and is in plain violation of the correlative rights of proprietors below. The defendant thus possessing prescriptive rights in the stream, they are conclusively presumed to be injurious to the riparian right of plaintiff. See authorities cited in 26 Cal. Jur., supra. If then the riparian right has suffered a damage, in that it has been invaded by prescription, in a valuation of the real property thus affected, this fact must be considered.

[6] At this point respondent replies that, conceding a prescriptive right to have been acquired, that fact is unavailing here, as the storage of the storm and natural waters of the stream in the manner carried on by defendant and their release in the manner done by it were and are a distinct benefit to plaintiff, in that the flow of the stream was equalized and made uniform, pointing to the fact that 581.05 second feet was the average flow during the summer months of July, August, and September; that in the period of high water, and when the dam was closed, the tributaries below the dam furnished this constant amount of water, so that at all times and during all seasons plaintiff has enjoyed a constant, steady flow at its lands of 581.05 second feet; that it owns a prescriptive right to 106 second feet and has an uncontested right to 475 second feet as riparian proprietor. This position is specious, but is it sound?

Walla Walla Irr. Co. v. Finis Irr. Co., 62 Or. 348, 124 P. 666, 670, 125 P. 281.

In Pabst v. Finmand, supra, at page 129 of 190 Cal., 211 P. 11, 13, it is said: "A riparian owner is entitled to a reasonable amount of water for use on his riparian lands. What is a reasonable amount varies with the circumstances of each particular case and also varies from year to year, for the amount which might be reasonable in a season of plenty might be manifestly unreasonable in a season of drought."

But, in this case, the whole evidence was founded upon and the jury instructed upon the supposed right of plaintiff to a constant, invariable, specific quantity of water. This basis is necessarily artificial, impossible, and admittedly is the result of a computation of averages during three special months over a long period of years. The evidence shows that many years this average did not obtain. Constancy and uniformity are most valuable elements in producing electric current by the use of water power. The evidence of such discharges during such period is, of course, admissible, but the jury should not be told that plaintiff as a riparian owner was entitled to any specific concrete amount of water. In other words, the right is riparian and not a prescriptive or other prior one. The necessary conclusion from the above facts is that the verdict of the jury in fixing damages in this cause cannot be sustained.

The same is also true of the judgment respecting injunction, entered following said verdict. The language of the paragraph relating thereto is as follows: "That the defendant be and it is hereby enjoined and restrained from storing, withholding or diverting the waters of the North Fork of the Feather River as to reduce the flow thereof below 581.05 cubic feet per second." This clause is based upon a similar finding, and it cannot be sustained by the evidence. It required defendant to allow 581.05 second feet of water to pass through the outlet of its dam at all times. Admittedly this is contrary to the evidence of the right above discussed and sustained, which attached by prescription. The court found that 581.05 cubic feet of water measured the flow to which plaintiff was entitled through its lands, which was quite a different matter for between the dam and plaintiff's lands during certain seasons of the year large quantities of water flow into the stream from tributaries so that this number of second feet measured at plaintiff's lands and at the dam are quite different things. In fact, the dam is practically closed for certain periods of the year. Defendant might for a number of months during the year close the dam entirely and still plaintiff would have his 581.05 second feet of water. The judgment, therefore, in this respect cannot be sustained.

[8, 9] These conclusions make it unnecessary to consider the question as to whether the extent of the prescriptive right of plaintiff is or is not 4,240 miners' inches or 106 second feet. This finding is based upon evidence which at another trial may be different and from which different conclusions might be drawn by the trial court. The same observation is true with respect to the defense of estoppel, for this claim too is founded solely upon a question of fact, the evidence on which may or may not be the same on a second hearing. For the same reason it is unnecessary to determine whether a discovery was made upon the Addie Bell claim prior or subsequent to the year 1902. We prefer to leave all questions not inconsistent with the views herein expressed open so as not to prejudice either party upon retrial of the case. It must be said, however, that the testimony as to the plans of plaintiff to use said waters, the extent of the project and the probable cost thereof, were not proper matters to be considered by the jury in assessing damages. San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irr. Co. v. Stevinson, 63 Cal. App. 767, 220 P. 427. The court also on request should have told the jury that the value of the property to plaintiff, with or without the water right, was not the basis, but the market value alone, with and without the water right, was the basis of damages.

The judgment is reversed.

VAIL v. JONES et al.*
L. A. 9682.

Supreme Court of California.
April 1, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 28, 1930.

I. Process — 149 — Service — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence held to support finding of trial judge that deceased was duly and personally served with process in action by defendants to quiet title.

Administrator sought to set aside judgment against deceased quieting title to certain realty. There was no direct evidence that process in previous action had ever been personally served upon deceased, but she knew of the action, and there were other facts from which the inference might be drawn that she was served.

2. Process 127 — Service — Jurisdiction.

Jurisdiction does not depend upon proof of service, but upon fact that service has been made.

Suit by Albert Vail, as administrator of the estate of Annie H. Vail, deceased, against G. H. Jones and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 277 P. 909.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for appellant.

LANGDON, J.

Plaintiff brought an action to vacate a prior judgment against his intestate and to quiet title. He alleged his appointment and qualification as administrator; that on July 10, 1923, and subsequent thereto and until the time of her death, Annie H. Vail was the owner in fee and in the possession of certain described property in the county of San Diego, Cal.; that on said day the defendant Jones commenced an action against the said Annie H. Vail wherein and whereby he alleged that he was the owner of, was in the possession of, and was entitled to the possession of, said real property, and that said Annie H. Vail had no right, title, or interest therein, and asked that it be so decreed; that Jones was never the owner of said property nor any portion thereof and was never in the possession or entitled to the possession of any part thereof; that a summons was duly issued in said action on July 10, 1923, and on the 27th day of August, 1923, the same was returned to the clerk of said court with an affidavit thereon of one A. A. Crosbie wherein he deposed and said that he had served the said Annie H. Vail with said summons and complaint on July 25, 1923, by delivering and leaving with her personally, in the county of Kern, state of California, a copy of said summons attached to a copy of the complaint; that in truth and in fact, the said A. A. Crosbie did not serve the said Annie H. Vail with the said summons, or with a copy thereof, or with the said complaint or with a copy thereof, on the said 25th day of July, 1923, or at any other time, nor was the said Annie H. Vail ever served with the said summons or with the said complaint by any other person or in any other manner and at the time of her death, she did not have, nor at any time prior thereto did she have, any notice of or knowledge of, the commencement of the said action or of any of the other proceedings thereafter therein had and taken.

It is then alleged that in the said action the default of defendant Annie H. Vail was entered, and thereafter C. H. Jones, the plaintiff, was adjudged and decreed to be the owner, in possession and entitled to the possession of all of the said real property, and that the said Annie H. Vail had no right, title, or interest in the same.

In the second cause of action, plaintiff claims Annie H. Vail to have been the owner of the property at the time of her death; that the defendants claim some interest in the same, which claim is without right, and it is prayed that the judgment and decree before mentioned against Annie H. Vail be vacated, annulled, and set aside, and that claims of the heirs at law of Annie H. Vail be quieted against the claims of the defendants.

The defendant Jones denied the allegations of the complaint with reference to the title of Annie H. Vail and also denied that he was never the owner nor entitled to the possession nor in the possession of the property in question. He denied, on information and belief, that Annie H. Vail had not been personally served with summons, and alleged that she had, at all times, full knowledge and notice of the pendency of said action and of all proceedings therein had and taken.

A second defense was that the claim of plaintiffs was barred by various sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. The third and fourth defenses and the cross-complaint set out in detail the facts and circumstances alleged to have occurred with reference to the transaction between the parties whereby the defendant Jones claims to have acquired title to the property, consisting of a tax sale at which Jones was the purchaser and many other matters, which will appear, in so far as they are material to our inquiry, in the findings hereinafter mentioned.

The trial court went extensively into the evidence for days, and found, among other things: "That it is not true that Annie H. Vail was the owner in fee or in the possession of, or entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint or any portion thereof on July 10, 1923, or at any other time subsequent thereto. That it is not true that defendant Jones was never the owner of said property and it is not true that said defendant Jones was never in the possession of said property, and it is not true that said Jones was never entitled to the possession of said property, and on the contrary, the court finds that said Jones was, on the 10th day of July, 1923, and at all times since July 10, 1923, had been and now is the owner in possession and entitled to the possession of all the property described in the complaint."

[1] With reference to the service of summons in the quiet title action in which Jones was plaintiff, the court found: "That in truth and in fact the said A. A. Crosbie did not serve the said Annie H. Vail with the said summons or with a copy thereof or with the complaint or with a copy thereof on the 25th day of July, 1923, or at any other time; that it is not true that the said Annie H. Vail was never served with the said summons or with the said complaint by any other person, or in any other manner; that it is not true that at the time of her death she did not have notice and knowledge of the commencement of said action or of any of the other proceedings thereafter therein had and taken; that it is not true that said Annie H. Vail did not, prior to the time of her death, have notice of or knowledge of the commencement of said action, or of any and all of the proceedings in said action taken and had." The court finds that said Annie H. Vail was in fact served with summons attached to a copy of the complaint in said action, and the court further finds that said Annie H. Vail did in fact have notice of and full knowledge of the commencement of the said action and of any and all proceedings thereafter therein had and taken.

The court then finds the facts with reference to the levy of taxes upon the property, delinquency, sale, and purchase by Jones and other matters unnecessary to this decision, but all of which establish equities strongly in favor of Jones.

The decree was that plaintiff take nothing, and that defendant Jones was at the time of the commencement of the action and now is the owner in possession and entitled to the possession of all the property described in the complaint.

Although A. A. Crosbie, marshal at Taft, where Annie H. Vail resided, contradicted his official record of service upon Annie H. Vail, by his testimony that he had handed copies of the summons and complaint, not to Annie H. Vail, but to Caroline Vail, her daughter, for the mother, and the court found in accordance with such testimony that Annie H. Vail had not been served with summons by said Crosbie, the court, nevertheless, found that "Annie H. Vail was in fact served with the summons attached to a complaint in said action."

of the Vail family, where Mrs. Annie H. Vail, her son and daughter, lived, and of discussing with all three of them the action to quiet title and the prior tax sale upon which it was founded; that all three knew of the action and about the service of summons. It seems pertinent to add that this testimony of disinterested witnesses is directly contradictory of the testimony of the daughter, an interested witness, that the mother never knew about the action to quiet title brought by Jones. The daughter also testified that, when the summons and complaint were handed to her, her mother was in the house with her. The house was a small four-room house. The daughter did not remember whether the door was open between the room where her mother was sitting and the room where the papers were delivered by Crosbie. She also stated that her mother depended upon her for everything, and that she, the daughter, attended to all the mother's business matters at all times.

There are also presumptions of service arising from the recitals of the judgment in the quiet title action, wherein it was recited that Mrs. Annie H. Vail had been duly, regularly, and personally served with process therein.

[2] In the face of all these facts and circumstances, inferences and presumptions, and the clear equities of the case, the trial court correctly found that Mrs. Annie Vail had been duly and personally served with process.

It cannot avail appellant that the proof of service made in the quiet title action differed from the fact of service, and, therefore, it becomes unimportant whether the service was made by Crosbie, as he alleged in his return, or whether it was made by some one else, as would follow from the trial court's finding as to service. Jurisdiction does not depend upon the proof of service, but upon the fact that service has been made. Lindley v. Lindley, 49 Cal. App. 631, 633, 194 P. 85; In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 P. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 P. 220.

The foregoing discussion disposes of the important and controlling question involved in the action and on the appeal. Unless this court were to repudiate the finding of the trial court that service of summons and complaint had, in fact, been made upon Annie H. Vail, the judgment must be affirmed. Under all the facts and circumstances of this case, such action by an appellate court seems unwarranted.

The judgment is affirmed.

1 dissent. It appears beyond controversy that Annie H. Vail, defendant in the former action, was not personally served with summons therein as required by section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor was service waived. It is not pretended that any one other than Crosbie attempted to serve the summons, and he failed, as found by the court, to serve it on Annie H. Vail. Furthermore, I think the tax deed, which is the foundation of the defendant's title, is void, as pointed out in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal written by Mr. Justice Houser, 277 P. 909. The plaintiff offered at the trial to reimburse the defendant on account of any moneys paid out by him in pursuit of the tax title or in or about the property. Because of the lack of jurisdiction on the part of the trial court in the former action and further because of the fatal defects in the tax proceedings relied upon by the defendant, the plaintiff's title should be quieted upon proper reimbursement to the defendant.

L. A. 10828.

Supreme Court of California.
April 17, 1930.

1. Specific performance — Enforcement inequitable — Increase in values — Land.

Where then reasonable price was named in agreement for land sale, later increase in values would not render enforcement of contract inequitable.

2. Specific performance — Laches.

Plaintiffs beginning specific performance suit within three months after dismissal of defendant's suit, in which they had filed cross-complaint, held not guilty of laches.

The evidence showed that plaintiffs made a continuous effort to effect a consummation of sale of the land, and that from January, 1922, until dismissal in August, 1923, they were active in defending themselves against dilatory tactics practiced by defendant in her own action, and in endeavoring to have their rights adjudicated through issues raised by their cross-complaint, and that within two months after dismissal they made tender to defendant and during third month thereafter they instituted specific performance action.

3. Specific performance — Test of mutuality.

Test of mutuality in specific performance action is mutuality of remedy—whether agreement is such that equity court would decree specific performance for either party (Civ. Code, § 3386).

Civ. Code, § 3386, provides that neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party has performed or is compellable specifically to perform.

4. Specific performance — Land contract — Uncertainty — Lack of mutuality.

Contract for sale of land to be awarded vendor in partition suit, together with water rights then or thereafter existing, held not uncertain or to lack mutuality (Civ. Code, § 3386).

5. Waters and water rights — Land contract — Construction — Water rights.

In contract for sale of land to be awarded vendor in partition suit, clause regarding water rights held to contemplate rights which at time of performance would run with land.

The clause with reference to water rights was "together with all * * * water rights now or hereafter existing in * * * connection with said property including rights to water through ownership in or other relationship with any water company now or hereafter supplying or formed to supply water to lands of which property or any part thereof is a part."

6. Waters and water courses — Appurtenances — Water company's shares.

One claiming shares in mutual water company are appurtenant to land must prove it (Civ. Code, § 324).

7. Waters and water courses — Appurtenances — Water rights.

Where court found there were no water rights, language of land contract with reference thereto was surplusage, and only rights running with land would pass under specific performance decree.

8. Vendor and purchaser — Land contract — Title in vendor.

It was immaterial whether vendor could have compelled decree in partition suit, where title was vested in her when performance of land contract was sought.

9. Vendor and purchaser — Validity of contract — Wife's signature to mortgage.

Provision of land contract requiring mortgage to be executed by buyers' wives did not render contract void (Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 5).

Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 5, provides "the following obligations cannot be specifically enforced * * * 5. An agreement to procure act or consent of wife of contracting party."

10. Appeal and error ⇨1073(1) — Harmless error — Decree — Land contract — Wife's signature to mortgage.

Vendor could not complain of provision requiring mortgage to be executed by purchasers' wives, where specific performance decree required payment in cash (Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 5).

11. Vendor and purchaser ⇨8 — Land contract — Title in vendor.

Contract for sale of land to be awarded vendor in partition suit held binding enforceable contract.

The contract provided that, if title did not vest in vendor by stated date, purchasers should have certain option with reference to purchase, but title had vested in vendor before date specified.

12. Appeal and error ⇨1009(2) — Land contract.

Trial court's finding under persuasive evidence that plaintiffs were entitled to specific performance of land contract was conclusive (Civ. Code, § 3387).

Civ. Code, § 3387, provides that it is to be presumed that breach of an agreement to transfer real property cannot be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by W. R. Wheat and another against Josefa B. Thomas and another, to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of real property. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendant named appeals.

Barker & Keithly, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J.

The judgment for plaintiffs is affirmed.

Defendant Thomas seeks by this appeal to avoid the decree which requires her to specifically perform a certain written contract whereby plaintiffs agreed to purchase and she agreed to sell certain real property comprising a part of the Rancho East Laguna, situate in Los Angeles county, Cal. Her objections to the decree are numerous, varied, interwoven, and supported mainly by undeveloped argument; hence, we find it impractical to discuss all of the matters urged, but we have examined the record thoroughly and find evidence, convincing and abundant, in support of the findings and judgment, and also find the numerous contentions made by appellant to be untenable.

The facts, as gleaned from the evidence, particularly that evidence which directly supports the findings, are in substance as follows: Upon the death of one Arcadia B. De Baker in 1913, appellant, one of her heirs, succeeded to an undivided interest in the above-mentioned tract, consisting of some 755 acres known as Rancho East Laguna. The De Baker estate was administered by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, with which company Mr. J. H. Coverley was connected in one capacity or another for a period next prior to 1923 of about twenty years, being vice president and trust officer thereof in December, 1921, at which time, as appellant's attorney in fact, he executed the agreement here sued upon. As such trust officer, Mr. Coverley had charge of said De Baker estate and general control of said tract of land. It was in this official capacity also that he became acquainted with appellant about the year 1915, at which time she was desirous of having the title company look after her affairs and effected an arrangement with it to that end. The company made several sales for her account of land held for subdivision, loaned money to her and otherwise handled part of her business, including her interest in said estate, and Mr. Coverley personally represented her in the partition action instituted by some of the De Baker heirs through which she was eventually awarded the property here involved.

Appellant took frequent trips abroad. During her absences Mr. Coverley was intrusted with the handling of her affairs. On three different occasions she gave him powers of attorney, under the last of which the transaction before us was consummated. Said power of attorney, bearing date May 2, 1921, was prepared by another trusted officer of the title company; it gave Mr. Coverley full power of disposition, with two exceptions, over lands and tenements owned by or in which appellant had an interest, and full power to act for her in a transaction of the character of that before us. It was duly executed by appellant, certified by a notary, delivered to Mr. Coverley, and thereafter recorded. Mr. Coverley testified that he would have preferred that it run to the title company, but that appellant expressly desired that it be in his name because she wanted him to know everything that was done for her. He further testified that he had instructions from her and the power of attorney was drawn for the particular purpose of selling everything that she had, aside from the two excepted parcels, if he could get what in his opinion was her adequate price for it.

Appellant left for Europe shortly after the execution of said document. About a month previous to her departure an interlocutory decree had been entered in said partition action, fixing her undivided interest in said tract at .04998008 thereof, but no specific land had been allotted to her. She had requested Mr. Coverley to obtain a large parcel of cheap land rather than a smaller parcel of higher priced land, and he so informed the referees, with the result that on November 12, 1921, about a month prior to execution of the agreement in suit, the referees appointed to partition the property, filed their report, recommending that such a parcel be awarded to her, describing it. On November 29, 1921, about a week prior to the execution of said agreement, their report, as modified, was confirmed by the court. The final decree in partition, however, was not filed and entered until January, 1922.

A short time prior to December 6, 1921, plaintiffs, upon recommendation of a third party, called on Mr. Coverley, who had never seen them before, for information relative to land in that vicinity, having in mind the purchase of any property available at a fair price. In the course of their conversation Mr. Coverley described the land under partition to them. They were immediately interested, and after several subsequent meetings they agreed to purchase the parcel thereof to be awarded to appellant.

On December 6, 1921, therefore, said agreement, the basis of this action, was duly executed by Mr. Coverley, as attorney in fact for appellant, and by plaintiffs as buyers, appellant thereby agreeing to sell to plaintiffs the real property therein described situate in the Rancho Laguna "together with all * * * water rights now or hereafter existing in * * * connection with said property * * * including the rights to water through ownership in or other relationship with any water company now or hereafter supplying, or formed to supply water to lands of which this property, or any part thereof, is a part." The purchase price was to be $21,250, $500 thereof being payable in cash, $4,812.50 at the time of delivery of the deed, and the balance of $15,937.50 "by first mortgage upon said property, executed by the Buyers, and their wives (if married) * * * due three years after date of the delivery of said deed," etc. Said agreement further provided that all parties understood that the property was in litigation in said partition action, that no decree had been entered therein awarding it to the seller, but that such a decree was expected and contemplated; that, however, if by March 6, 1922, legal title had not vested in the seller, the buyers could elect either to demand the return of all their money or take, without warranties of any kind, whatever title the seller then had. This agreement was prepared by one of the attorneys for the title company, and signed by plaintiffs without submission to their own attorney. They were financially able to make the payments required thereunder, and left with Mr. Coverley as earnest money their check for $500. The matter then went into escrow and from time to time they paid in further amounts to be credited on the $4,812.50 payment, although it was not due until delivery to them of the deed.

Testimony offered respecting the value of the property was conflicting; however, that the above purchase price represented the fair market value thereof was confirmed by a number of witnesses, and the evidence fully supports the findings of the court in this behalf as well as its finding as to the rental value thereof.

The final decree filed in the partition action in January, 1922, awarded said parcel to appellant, provided for payment of costs, and also awarded her a .072459 interest in the water and water rights created by the setting apart of a certain acreage for the development of water for the benefit of all the other property in said tract.

About this time appellant returned from Europe and learned of the sale, which met with her decided disapproval, and she so informed Mr. Coverley. He assured her that he had acted in good faith and to the best of his ability. He also informed her that the sale had been consummated and it was too late to withdraw. Thereafter, however, and on January 20, 1922, she revoked the power of attorney given to him, notified the title company that she repudiated the sale, and a few days later notified plaintiffs that she disaffirmed and rescinded said contract. On January 21, 1922, she commenced an action against Mr. Coverley, the title company, these plaintiffs and certain fictitious defendants, to rescind said sale, praying that the transaction be adjudged invalid. In said action the court immediately issued a temporary order restraining defendants from proceeding with the matter, and on January 22d it issued an injunction pendente lite against the title company and Mr. Coverley for the same purpose. Demurrer and answer were thereafter filed therein, together with a cross-complaint by these plaintiffs, asserting their rights under said contract and praying for its enforcement, and they later, on October 10, 1922, made and served on appellant's attorney a written offer of performance thereof. Notices and proceedings were had from time to time in said action. Appellant, however, opposed all efforts of the cross-complainants, plaintiffs here, to have it set for trial, and finally, in August, 1923, she dismissed it.

In the month of October following, plaintiffs made to appellant another tender of performance, and on November 29, 1923, they instituted this action, praying that said contract be specifically enforced and that appellant be required to execute to them, upon their full performance, a good and sufficient deed to said property. Appellant, aside from her other contentions, claimed that, by reason of a discovery of oil in the vicinity just prior to the time of the sale, land values increased rapidly and surrounding property was leased for oil development purposes; that the purchase by plaintiffs was purely a speculation in oil lands; that the land awarded her was worth many thousands of dollars more than they contracted to pay for it and, if required to carry out said agreement, made without her knowledge, she would sustain a great and irreparable monetary loss and would be defrauded of a valuable estate.

The court found that practically all of the allegations of the amended complaint were true, except that the rental value of appellant's property, at time of purchase, was $1,500 per annum instead of the larger sum alleged in said pleading; that at said time the value of said land was not $200,000, nor was it more than the sum of $21,000; nor was said purchase price grossly or at all disproportionate to the value of the land. It further found that there were no water rights or rights to water in connection with said land at the time of making said contract of sale or thereafter derived through ownership in or relationship with any water company or association. Following these findings, judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, decreeing that appellant be required to perform fully said agreement of sale. Thereafter she prosecuted this appeal.

Appellant claims that enforcement of the contract against her will be unjust, unreasonable, and inequitable; that it must fail for lack of mutuality in that its provisions are uncertain and unenforceable because it bound her to convey future unknown water rights; the title to be conveyed was contingent upon the entry of a final judgment in a partition action, which entry she could not compel; the consideration must partially fail as respondents' wives, not being parties to the contract, could not be compelled to execute said required mortgage; the contract was a mere option, and plaintiffs had an adequate remedy at law.

[7] Appellant also makes minor contentions with respect to defects in the pleadings and errors in rulings on the evidence, all of which, upon examination, we find to be without merit and unworthy of discussion. We likewise find no merit in the claim that the enforcement of this contract will work an injustice against appellant in view of the holding above announced with respect to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court with respect to the sale and rental values of said land at the date of sale. There is also competent evidence to the effect that at that time the land had no monetary value for oil development purposes. A then reasonable purchase price having been named in the agreement of sale, any later increase in land values would not, of course, render enforcement of said contract inequitable.

[2] Neither is there merit in the claim that respondents were guilty of laches. The evidence shows, as is apparent from the above statement of facts, that they made a continuous effort to effect a consummation of the sale. From January, 1922, until dismissal in August, 1923, they were active in defending themselves against the dilatory tactics practiced by appellant in her own action, and in endeavoring to have their rights adjudicated through the issues raised by their cross-complaint therein. Within two months after said dismissal they made another tender to appellant, and during the third month thereafter they instituted this action. Blame for any undue delay may therefore be laid at the doorstep of appellant.

[3] The test of mutuality in an action of this character is defined by section 3386 of the Civil Code, which provides: "Neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance." In other words, the test here is mutuality of remedy—whether the agreement is such that at the suit of either party a court of equity would decree specific performance against the other. See 23 Cal. Jur., p. 447, § 20, et seq. See, also, Thurber v. Meves, 119 Cal. 35, 50 P. 1063, 51 P. 536, holding that while it is a general rule that mutuality of remedy is essential to authorize the specific performance of a contract, this rule does not require that such mutuality shall exist in all cases at the inception of the transaction.

[4] Bearing in mind the above doctrine, we find no lack of mutuality and no uncertainty in said contract—and particularly we find no such lack by reason of the above-quoted provision thereof which, appellant claims, binds her to convey future unknown water rights. In this behalf appellant contends that respondents' claim that said clause contemplates only water rights appurtenant to and running with the land cannot avail them, as under the partition decree water rights in connection with the land were especially created by the award to her of said undivided interest in four water-bearing and reservoir lots. She further claims that the action of the trial court was inconsistent in finding that there were no water rights of any kind in connection with the land, and yet decreeing, as a conclusion of law, that respondents were entitled to a deed from her "conveying all of the property the subject of said contract" and ordering her to convey the land, "together with all water rights, if any, existing in connection with said property or any part thereof."

[5] It would seem that by the insertion of said clause there was in the contemplation of the parties only the giving of those rights which, at the time of performance of the contract, were appurtenant to and running with the land and would, without special mention, have passed by the deed anyway by implication of law. This is apparent from the testimony of Mr. Coverley that at the time of the sale articles of incorporation for a mutual water company to serve the tract were in the course of preparation, and the value of rights of way for water and other purposes was considered at the time the purchase price was fixed.

[6] The right of a stockholder in a mutual water company to receive water by virtue of his ownership of stock is real property, but the shares themselves are personality and do not pass upon a conveyance of land unless they are appurtenant thereto; they may become appurtenant by the adoption of appropriate provisions in the by-laws of the water company under section 324 of the Civil Code, but one claiming that they are appurtenant, is required to prove it. See 26 Cal. Jur. 449 et seq., and cases in note; also Imperial Water Co. v. Meserve, 62 Cal. App. 593, 217 P. 548, and Palo Verde, etc., Co. v. Edwards, 82 Cal. App. 52, 254 P. 922.

[7] In this case no proof was offered and no claim made that the water stock of said company was appurtenant to the land or that the passing of ownership thereof was contemplated by the contract. In fact, the court specifically found that there were no water rights of any kind in connection with the land; hence, as both contract and decree require appellant to convey only such water rights "if any," and the court found there were none, it is clear that the language complained of became mere surplusage and only such rights will pass to plaintiffs as, running with the land, would pass in any event by implication of law.

[8] It is likewise immaterial whether appellant could have compelled a decree in said partition suit as title was vested in her when performance was sought. "It is the settled rule in this state that the vendor need not have even an inchoate title at the time of the contract; that he may sell land to which he has no title, and the contract will be valid and enforceable if, when the time for performance arrives, he is able to furnish the title he

[9, 10] Appellant complains of that clause of said agreement which provides that the deferred portion of the purchase price shall be secured by first mortgage upon said property "executed by the buyers, and their wives (if married). * * *" It is her contention that inasmuch as the wives were not parties to the agreement and could not have been compelled to execute such a mortgage, the agreement is by said provision rendered unenforceable under section 3390, subdivision 5, of the Civil Code, which provides: "The following obligations cannot be specifically enforced * * * 5. An agreement to procure the act or consent of the wife of the contracting party. * * *"

It is true that said provision was itself unenforceable, but it did not thereby render the contract void (Armstrong v. Sacramento, etc., Co., 52 Cal. App. 110, 115, 198 P. 217). In other words, the contract, aside from said provision, was valid and binding and the provision was not a vital portion thereof. It did not render the contract unenforceable, but became immaterial because the decree entered does not require the giving of a mortgage. The mortgage contemplated by the contract would have been due three years after delivery of the deed by appellant; that time having elapsed, the decree removed the formality of a mortgage and provided for payment of the full purchase price in cash. Appellant should not complain of the clause, therefore, as it cannot prejudice her rights in any respect.

[11] The terms of the document are a complete answer to appellant's contention that it was a mere option depending upon the sufficiency of the showing of title. From the language thereof, it is clear that the agreement was intended to be and was, in fact, a binding contract of purchase and sale. The sale was thereby made subject to the contingency that, if legal title did not vest in the seller by a stated date, the buyers should have a certain option with respect to the purchase, but title vested in the seller long before that date and, therefore, as the contingency never arose, the provisions relating to it, which might be termed a collateral option, failed and became ineffective. Far from being prejudicial, said contingency was evidently inserted for appellant's own protection, to relieve her from any possible liability for damages in case the partition decree should not be entered in the manner anticipated.

[12] Lastly, we believe that specific performance of said contract was the only adequate remedy available to plaintiffs. Section 3387 of the Civil Code announces the rule in this behalf—that "It is to be presumed that the breach of an agreement to transfer real property cannot be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation. * * * " This presumption is not overcome by the claim that plaintiffs, being mere oil speculators, had no real desire for any particular parcel; thus pecuniary compensation would afford them an adequate remedy. The evidence shows that respondents, having looked over land in the vicinity, desired, whatever their purpose, to secure this special property and so contracted in writing to purchase it rather than other available portions of the tract. The situation is not altered because by a provision in said contract they undertook to protect themselves against a possible shifting of the allotments of land recommended by said referees in the partition proceeding. To put it another way, the trial court, under persuasive evidence, expressly or impliedly found that specific performance was the remedy to which respondents were entitled, and such finding is conclusive.

The decree entered by the court also takes care of respondents' obligation to appellant for payment of taxes, and in other respects equitably adjudicates her rights; hence our conclusion that it must be affirmed.

NARVER v. CALIFORNIA STATE LIFE
INS. CO. ★
Civ. 142.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
April 15, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 6, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 12, 1930.

1. Insurance ⇨146(3) — Uncertainties — Ambiguities — Construction.

Ambiguous provisions in life policy, capable of two constructions, should be construed most favorable to insured.

2. Insurance ⇨146(3) — Ambiguous provisions — Construction.

Insurer cannot defeat ambiguous policy by construction, if reasonable construction upholding insurance can be had without doing violence to language used and parties' clear intention.

3. Insurance ⇨150 — Indorsement or rider — Effect — Life policy.

Indorsement or rider on life policy, relating to short-term premium until beginning of first policy year, held not policy separate from main policy.

Indorsement provided, in substance, that in consideration of payment in advance of a short-term premium, insurer agrees to pay amount insured if death of insured shall occur before February 28, 1928, which is beginning of first policy year.

4. Insurance ⇨150 — Indorsements.

Indorsements on insurance policy form part of insurance contract, and policy with indorsements and riders thereon must be construed together.

5. Insurance ⇨186(5) — Premiums — "Payment" — Note — Acceptance.

Insured's note, given and accepted as payment of premiums under life policy, held to constitute "payment."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Payment," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Insurance ⇨445(3) — Effective date — Life policy — One year — Suicide.

Under ambiguous terms of life policy, application, premium receipt, and indorsement considered as whole, policy held effective on November 28, 1927, warranting recovery where insured committed suicide more than year thereafter.

Suicide clause in life policy provided that in case of suicide committed while sane or insane, within one year from effective date, recovery should be limited to total amount of premium paid. Various recitals in policy showed effective date to be February 28, 1928; that policy and application therefor should constitute entire contract between parties. Application provided that effective date should be determined by payment of premium with application. Receipt for first premium delivered on October 25, 1927, recited that insurance shall take effect and be in force from day of approval at home office if premium is fully paid with application, or upon manual delivery of policy to applicant during lifetime, and good health and full payment of premium thereon if premium has not been paid with application. Short-term indorsement in consideration of additional premium made policy effective from November 28 to February 28, 1928, following, and recited that latter date should be beginning of first policy year. Policy was issued on November 28, 1927, and delivered on or about December 1st. Insured committed suicide on December 10, 1928.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by Emma S. Narver against the California State Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Eugene U. Blalock, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

Respondent is the widow of Chester Narver and the beneficiary named in an insurance policy issued by appellant on his life.

On October 28, 1927, the deceased made his application to appellant for a policy of insurance upon his life in the sum of $5,000, and on the same day executed his promissory note to appellant in the sum of $176.95 in payment of the premiums to accrue under said policy until February 28, 1929. The promissory note was subsequently paid. The deceased took his medical examination and the policy was issued by appellant on the 28th day of November, 1927, and delivered to deceased on or about December 1st of the same year.

The insurance policy contained the following paragraph: "This policy is incontestable after one year if all premiums shall have been duly paid, except as to provisions and conditions relating to any double indemnity or total and permanent disability benefits which may be issued in connection herewith. In case of suicide of the insured, committed while sane or insane, within one year from the date hereof, the limit of recovery hereunder shall be the total amount of the premium paid."

Above the signature of the president and secretary of the insurance company on the policy appears the following: "In witness whereof, California State Life Insurance Company has caused this policy to be signed by its President and its Secretary of Sacramento, California, this twenty-eighth day of February, 1928. Which is the date of this policy."

The policy further provided that: "This policy and the application therefor (a copy of which application is attached hereto when issued) constitute the entire contract between the parties hereto."

Attached to and made a part of the policy under this clause was the application for insurance, in which the following appears: "I further agree that the effective date of any policy which may be issued hereon shall be determined as follows: (a) If the premium be fully paid with this application, such policy shall take effect at twelve o'clock noon of the day upon which this application is approved by the company at the home office."

In the report of the medical examiner, a copy of which was attached to the policy, there appears the following: "I have verified each of the foregoing answers on this page and on the first page hereof and adopt them as my own, and warrant that they are full, complete and literally true answers to the questions against which they are written. I further agree that if during the first year following the date of any policy issued hereon I commit suicide, whether sane or insane, the only liability under any policy issued thereon shall be for a fixed sum equal to the actual cash premium paid to the company on said policy."

On October 25, 1927, there was delivered to the insured a receipt, the material parts of which were as follows:

October 25, 1927.

"Received of Chester Narver One Hundred Seventy-six and 95/100 Dollars in full for fifteen months the first annual premium on Five Thousand dollars insurance. Counter-signed by Harvey Stewart. Agent."

"The insurance shall take effect and be in force: (a) At twelve o'clock noon of the date of approval at the home office of the Company, if the premium be fully paid with the application; (b) Upon manual delivery of the policy to the applicant during his lifetime and good health and full payment of the premium thereon, if such premium has not been paid with the application."

"California State Life Insurance Company. J. R. Kruse, President. Do not detach this receipt except for delivery to applicant for full settlement of premium. This is the only form of receipt authorized by the company to be given to an applicant for a premium collected when the application is taken. California State Life Insurance Company. Sacramento, California."

Attached to the policy of insurance as an endorsement or rider, was the following:

"November 28, 1927.

"In consideration of the payment in advance of a Short Term Premium of Twelve and 60/100 Dollars, California State Life Insurance Company agrees, subject to the provisions of this policy and the application therefor, to pay the amount insured hereunder if the death of the insured shall occur prior to February 28, 1928, which is the beginning of the first policy year. Double indemnity and Total Disability Benefits, if either thereof be stipulated in this policy, are not included herein, and neither shall be effective until noon of the date herein stated, and then only if the premium for the first policy be fully paid.

"[Signed] Arthur Luddy, Asst. Secretary."

Insured committed suicide on December 10, 1928. Proofs of his death were made and delivered to appellant, and demand was made upon it by respondent for the sum of $5,000, which payment was refused. On January 3, 1929, appellant tendered to respondent the sum of $164.35, which was the amount of the premium on the policy of insurance for the year commencing February 28, 1928.

Respondent brought this action to recover on the policy of insurance, and, after a trial in the court below, without a jury, the court found all facts in her favor and rendered judgment against appellant for the principal sum of $5,000.

Appellant presents two grounds upon which it asks this court to reverse the judgment of the trial court. The first is that, as it maintains there were two policies of insurance issued to deceased, one being a short-term policy commencing on November 28, 1927, and ending on February 28, 1928, the premium for which was $12.60, and the other a twenty-year nonparticipating policy commencing on February 28, 1928, the premium being $164.35, payable annually on the 28th day of each February. The second ground upon which the reversal is asked is a corollary of the first, namely: That since the policy of insurance in effect on December 10, 1928, did not become operative until February 28, 1928, one year had not elapsed at the time of the suicide of the insured, and that, therefore, the principal sum of $5,000 could not be collected, but that only the annual premium paid, $164.35, was recoverable. The exact questions presented upon this appeal do not seem to have been decided in California.

[1, 2] It is a well-recognized rule of law that if any uncertainties or ambiguities appear in an insurance policy which may be solved by either one of two reasonable constructions, the one which is most favorable to the insured and which will give life, force, and effect to the policy should be adopted. The insurance company, having prepared the policy and all documents used in connection with its issuance, should not be heard to put such a construction upon an ambiguity, caused by it, as will defeat the policy and take from the beneficiary the very purpose and object of the insurance, if a reasonable construction upholding the insurance can be had that does no violence to the language used and the clear intention of the parties. Pacific Heating & Ventilating Co. v. Williamsburg, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 367, 111 P. 4; Welch v. British American Assurance Co., 148 Cal. 223, 82 P. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 396; Witherow v. United American Insurance Co. of Pennsylvania (Cal. App.) 281 P. 668. With this rule in mind, we will proceed to a consideration of the contract of insurance involved in this appeal.

[3, 4] Appellant contends that the indorsement, or rider, on the main policy of insurance, which put in effect the insurance from November 28, 1927, to February 28, 1928, was a policy of insurance complete in itself and a contract separate and distinct from the main policy. With this we cannot agree. Taken by itself, this indorsement means nothing. Of itself, it is not a contract in any sense of the word. By its terms it refers to the main policy and the application therefor, and, except as specifically excepted in the indorsement, it put the provisions of the policy into force and effect. Indorsements on an insurance policy form a part of the insurance contract (25 Cyc. of Law and Procedure, 743), and the policy of insurance with the indorsements and riders thereon must be construed together as a whole. Sharp v. Scottish Union National Ins. Co., 136 Cal. 542, 69 P. 253, 615.

[5, 6] Considering the policy of insurance as a whole, we find a most obvious and patent ambiguity as to its date. The closing paragraph of the main policy gives February 28, 1928, as its date. The application for the insurance, of which there was only one, and which was made a part of the contract of insurance, contains the direct statement that "if the premium be fully paid with this application such policy shall take effect at twelve o'clock noon of the day upon which this application is approved by the Company at its home office." The application was approved and the policy actually issued on November 28, 1927. It was registered with the insurance department of the state of California on November 29, 1927, and delivered to deceased two days later. His note was given and accepted as payment of the premium and was therefore a payment of them. Harrigan v. Home Life Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 531, 58 P. 180, 61 P. 99. The receipt given to the insured by the company contained language identical with that in the application as to when the policy should take effect. From these documents the insured was justified in assuming that his policy of insurance became effective at noon on November 28, 1927. Why the date of February 28, 1928, was used at the close of the policy is not entirely clear. It is not an unreasonable conclusion, in fact it is entirely probable, that it was inserted for the convenience of the parties to fix the due date of the future annual premiums.

We therefore conclude that the policy of insurance was made operative and put in effect by the short-term insurance rider and under all the terms of the policy the date of this instrument became the date of the policy. We are aided in reaching this conclusion by four decisions from other jurisdictions, namely, Krebs v. Philadelphia Life Ins. Co., 249 Pa. 330, 95 A. 91, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1184; Jefferson Standard Life Ins. Co. v. Wilson (C. C. A.) 260 F. 593; Fox v. New York Life Ins. Co., 211 Ill. App. 406, and American Na- tional Insurance Co. v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 186 S. W. 254. The first two of these cases present facts identical with the one we are considering, and the other two, very similar facts. In the case of Krebs v. Philadelphia Standard Life Ins. Co., supra, the policy of insurance was issued upon application of the insured on July 19, 1913. It was dated on October 1, 1913. An indorsement providing for short-term insurance from August 1 to October 1, 1913, was placed upon the policy when issued. The policy was delivered prior to August 1, 1913, and the insured committed suicide on August 24, 1914. It contained a provision that "self destruction, while sane or insane, within one year from the date hereof, is not a risk assumed by the company under this policy," which, in effect, is similar to the language used in the policy issued by appellant.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania was of the opinion that if the date of the policy was to be considered as the date appearing on the main instrument, there would be no liability under its terms, the suicide of the insured having occurred within one year from that date, but that if its date were to be taken as the date of the short-term insurance indorsement, the liability of the company would be fixed. The court held that the short-term insurance indorsement did not constitute an insurance policy in itself, and that therefore, it incorporated in its provisions enough of the terms of the main policy to make it a complete contract of insurance. It having incorporated the provisions of this contract it must be held to have incorporated all of them not expressly excepted, as the company could not be permitted to select, as included, the portions favorable to it and reject the others. The court held that there was but one contract of insurance which was in effect on the date of the short-term insurance indorsement, and that as there was an ambiguity in the policy itself, such ambiguity must be construed against the company and in favor of the insured, and affirmed the judgment of the trial court against the insurer.

In the case before us it would have been a simple matter for the appellant to have used such language in the several documents constituting the contract of insurance, so that there would have been no question of its meaning. The company did not do so, and it cannot complain because the trial court, following the usual rule of construction, resolved such ambiguities against it and in favor of the insured.

Judgment affirmed.

LOWERY v. HALLETT.

Civ. 3835.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

April 4, 1930.

1. Automobiles ⇨245(87)—Guest held not contributorily negligent as matter of law in making no protest or suggestion to automobile driver respecting speed.

One injured when automobile in which he was riding ran into tree after going around curve in road at speed of over 50 miles an hour held not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in making no protest or suggestion to driver respecting speed, though he was watching speedometer and knew speed at which car was going.

2. Automobiles ⇨244(35)—Prima facie evidence of violation of statute in exceeding speed limit becomes conclusive on failure of other evidence to contradict and overcome it (California Vehicle Act, § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

Prima facie evidence of violation of California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, in exceeding speed limit fixed by subdivision (b), as declared by subdivision (c) becomes conclusive on failure of other evidence to contradict and overcome it.

3. Trial ⇨296(4, 5)—Instructions not referring to issue of contributory negligence held not prejudicially erroneous, in view of other instructions and rulings on evidence (California Vehicle Act, § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30).

In action for injuries to guest in automobile, instructions to find for plaintiff, if defendant drove car faster than 35 miles per hour in violation of California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30, and such violation was proximate cause of accident, instruction that defendant was negligent as matter of law, if he drove car in violation of subdivision (a), and instruction to find for plaintiff if defendant failed to exercise ordinary care, and plaintiff was injured by reason thereof, held not prejudicially erroneous because not referring to issue of contributory negligence, in view of other instructions and court's rulings on evidence.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1107—Statute limiting right of injured guest in vehicle to recover against driver was inapplicable to appealed case pending when statute became effective (California Vehicle Act, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

Where guest in automobile recovered judgment against driver for injuries sustained when automobile, going at excessive speed, ran off road, and appeal from judgment was pending when California Vehicle Act, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, became effective, limiting guest's right of recovery, such statute, not being retroactive, was inapplicable.

Action by Jeff Lowery against L. P. Hallett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, and Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Carter & Smith and L. C. Smith, all of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J.

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages. The facts upon which the judgment is based are as follows:

At the time the alleged injuries were suffered by the plaintiff, he and the defendant were residing on a ranch near Redding. The defendant "wanted to see the country over there at Goose Valley," and he asked the plaintiff "to go along with him and show him the country"; the plaintiff being familiar therewith and the roads leading thereto, while the defendant was not. The plaintiff accepting the invitation, the parties proceeded on the contemplated journey in the defendant's Buick touring car, driven by the defendant. A part of their course was along the highway running easterly from Redding to Burney. When they had reached a point within about 3 miles of Burney, they came to a straight and comparatively level stretch of road about a mile in length, at the end of which the highway curves to the left. The defendant drove over this stretch of road at a speed of between 50 and 55 miles an hour, and continued around the curve at the same speed until his automobile ran off to the right and into a large tree about 290 feet from the commencement of the curve, thereby causing the injuries for which the plaintiff claims damages. During all this time the plaintiff, who is a half-blood Indian, was watching the speedometer, and knew the speed at which the automobile was going, but he made no protest or suggestion to the defendant in relation thereto. The plaintiff testified that he did not make any protest because he was "afraid he would go faster," and that he "thought he would slack up a little" at the curve.

[1] Appellant contends that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and that a nonsuit should have been granted. A similar contention was considered and answered in the negative by the Supreme Court in Shields v. King, 277 P. 1043, and in Benjamin v. Noonan, 277 P. 1045. Those cases and the authorities cited therein are deemed decisive of this.

"You are instructed that the maximum speed at which a motor vehicle was permitted to travel on the public highway in the State of California on the 21st day of August, 1927, was thirty-five miles per hour, and if you believe from the evidence that the defendant, L. P. Hallett, was driving the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, at a rate of speed in excess of thirty-five miles per hour at the time the accident happened, the said defendant was operating said automobile in violation of the law of the state of California, and if said violation was the proximate cause of the accident, defendant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and if said negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff."

Another instruction to the same effect was given. Admittedly the instruction is erroneous in stating that the speed limit was 35 miles an hour at the time of the accident, August 21, 1927. California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) § 113, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30.

The error in the instruction was not prejudicial, however, because the uncontradicted evidence is to the effect that the speed was negligently excessive. The plaintiff testified that the defendant was driving in excess of 50 miles an hour at the time of the accident. No attempt was made to overcome this evidence. The defendant did not testify in the case, and his silence tends to strengthen the case made by the plaintiff.

The court, after reading subdivision (a) of section 113 as amended, instructed the jury that, if the defendant drove his automobile in violation of that subdivision, "he was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, and if such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, your verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff." In another instruction the court stated that, if the defendant "failed to exercise ordinary care in the operation of the automobile, * * * and that by reason of the failure of said defendant to exercise ordinary care in the operation of said automobile, plaintiff received the injuries complained of, it is your duty to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff." No reference is made in any of the four instructions mentioned to the issue of contributory negligence. Appellant contends that all of such instructions are prejudicially erroneous by reason of such omission. It may be conceded that, considering the instructions abstractly, they are incomplete and inaccurate, but, under the circumstances of this case, later to be considered, they are not deemed prejudicial. Two subsequent instructions, given at the defendant's request, are as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that plaintiff was guilty of any negligence which proximately contributed to his alleged injury, or was guilty of any lack of ordinary care, whether by doing an act or by omitting to do what a person of ordinary care and prudence would have done under the same or similar circumstances, and such lack of ordinary care, act or omission, if any such there was, proximately contributed in any degree to the accident, and without which the accident would not have occurred, then you cannot go further and apportion the negligence, if any, between the parties, but in such event plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which defeats his recovery and your verdict must be in favor of defendant and against plaintiff."

"I further instruct you that a passenger in an automobile operated by another not for hire is required to use ordinary care for his own safety. If he is aware that the operator is carelessly operating the automobile, or is carelessly rushing into danger, it is incumbent upon him to take such steps as an ordinarily prudent person would take under the same circumstances for his own safety.

"I therefore instruct you that if you find from the evidence that said plaintiff, while a passenger in the automobile in which he was injured, by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the injuries which he received, and that such failure of plaintiff to exercise ordinary care proximately contributed to his injuries then your verdict should be for the defendant."

Since the evidence shows that the defendant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law, the only issue in the case, other than as to the amount of damages, was the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff. During the cross-examination of the plaintiff he repeatedly stated that he made no protest or suggestion to the defendant in relation to the speed of the automobile. Thereafter counsel for the plaintiff, misconceiving the effect of the decision of this court in Brown v. Davis, 84 Cal. App. 180, 257 P. 877, moved the court, in the presence of the jury, to strike out all such testimony. The court granted the motion, saying in effect that the plaintiff's conduct, or omissions, did not constitute contributory negligence. Thereafter, counsel for the plaintiff, thinking that possibly he had led the court into error, moved the court to change the ruling striking out the aforesaid evidence, and the court granted the motion, saying:

"The motion to withdraw the objection to the questions as propounded and also the motion to strike out the answers of the plaintiff, and the motion to withdraw the objection to said answers will be granted and the objection will be overruled and the answers will stand and the court will instruct the jury that they are to disregard the remarks of the court in regard to whether or not such acts proximately contributed to the injury of the plaintiff, and that it will be the duty under the instructions of the court and the law and the evidence as offered to determine whether such acts on the part of the plaintiff proximately contributed to his injury and not to consider the remarks of the court in determining that question as to whether or not such acts were contributory negligence."

After all the things mentioned had occurred, and after the court had given the instructions on contributory negligence quoted herein, it seems impossible that the jurors could have been misled by the omission of any reference to the issue of contributory negligence in the first four instructions referred to herein. Presuming that they were persons of ordinary intelligence, they must have understood that any contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was sufficient to bar a recovery. It is by no means certain that jurors would understand such instructions, standing alone, to exclude the consideration of contributory negligence. It has been held that the use of the words "the proximate cause" of negligence "necessarily implies that it is the only proximate cause." Straten v. Spencer, 52 Cal. App. 98, 106, 197 P. 540, 543. See, also, Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 393, 264 P. 237, and Saltzen v. Associated Oil Co., 198 Cal. 157, 161, 244 P. 338. If the word "proximate," as used in the instructions under consideration, had been preceded by the word "only" or "sole," there would have been no error in the omission of any reference to contributory negligence. What is said herein is not intended as an approval of the form of those instructions, but only as reasons for holding that, under the particular facts of this case, they are not prejudicially erroneous.

Appellant complains of the court's refusal to give other requested instructions on the subject of contributory negligence, but the instructions on that subject herein set forth clearly cover the questions of law involved, and, from what has already been said, it appears that the jurors must have fully understood their duty in that connection.

[4] Appellant contends that section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 1580), providing "in substance that no guest in a vehicle upon a public highway has a right of recovery against the driver for injuries sustained, except through intoxication, willful misconduct or gross negligence of the driver, * * * applies to the instant case and that any previous right of action of plaintiff fell with the enactment of this section." The appeal from the judgment herein was pending in this court at the time section 141½ became effective. In Krause v. Rarity

(Cal. App.) 285 P. 879, 888, a case involving a similar situation, it was held that "section 141¼ of the California Vehicle Act is not retroactive and has no bearing whatsoever upon the case at bar." This holding was expressly approved by the Supreme Court in Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., 287 P. 343, decided April 1, 1930.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 4002.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

April 4, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing May 3, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 2, 1930.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨109(1) — Leased premises — Surrender — Acquiescence.

Lease may be terminated by surrender of leased premises and landlord's acquiescence in surrender.

Such surrender is termed surrender by operation of law and is based upon doctrine of estoppel, and arises where owner of premises is party to act in conjunction with some act on part of tenant, validity of which landlord is estopped to deny.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨109(4) — Leased premises — Surrender — Acquiescence — Evidence.

Landlord's acquiescence in tenant's surrender of leased premises may be evidenced by landlord's acts and is best evidenced by landlord's taking possession and assuming authority as owner.

3. Frauds, statute of ⇨63(2) — Lease — Surrender.

Under statute of frauds, surrender of term can be effected only by express written consent of parties or by operation of law.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨109(4) — Leased premises — Surrender — Acceptance.

Mere statement by lessor that lessee may move out held not to terminate leasehold until surrender and acceptance has actually been made.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨109(4) — Leased premises — Surrender — Acceptance — New tenant.

Landlord's mere attempt to secure new tenant, where landlord has not taken possession after surrender or reletting, held not acceptance of surrender by former tenant.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨112½ — Leased premises — Surrender — Acceptance — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence, in landlord's action to restrain injury or removal of buildings, held insufficient to show landlord consented to or accepted surrender of lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by the Borchers Bros. Company, a corporation, against Antonio Ciaparro and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Busick & Leeper, of Sacramento, for appellant.

A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

By its amended complaint appellant seeks to restrain respondents from injuring or removing certain buildings and property from land owned by it, and theretofore leased to respondents Ciaparro, Fenech, and Borg, and by its supplemental complaint seeks to recover damages from them for tearing down and removing buildings and property belonging to appellant, from said leased premises. Judgment was rendered in favor of respondents, from which appellant has appealed.

It appears from the evidence that on May 2, 1927, the said Ciaparro, Fenech, and Borg leased from appellant the 50 acres of land described in the complaint, for a term of ten years and two months, and thereupon entered into possession of same, and continued in such possession until April 3, 1929. Respondent Grech acquired an interest in said lease some time after its execution. On April 21, 1927, an agreement was entered into between the city of Sacramento and respondents Fenech, Borg, and Ciaparro by which for a period of ten years from the date they were given the exclusive right to collect and carry away all swill and garbage from all hotels, restaurants, hospitals, and clubs situate in said city. The agreement further provided that said respondents should establish a ranch for the purpose of feeding said swill and garbage to hogs. The said lease provided that the leased premises were to be used by the lessees to aid in the performance of the said agreement, and it further provided that if for any reason whatever the said agreement with said city should be or become unenforceable or void, or if the lessees should be prevented from gathering the garbage aforesaid, or if, without the fault of the lessees, they should be prevented by law, or pursuant to law, from using said premises for the purpose of raising hogs thereon, then at the option of the lessees the lease should be deemed canceled and of no further force or effect, and all liability of the lessees thereunder should cease.

Respondents, in their answer, set forth as a defense to said action that on the 12th day of December, 1928, a judgment was given and was entered on December 15, 1928, in the case of I. K. Ohaver v. Phillip Fenech, Sam Borg, Antonio Ciaparro, John Doe Number One, John Doe Number Two, John Doe Number Three, in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Yolo, in an action therein pending, which judgment restrained and enjoined these respondents from shipping to, or receiving at Borchers Bros. ranch, being the property described in the lease, any garbage or other similar materials, and from feeding said garbage, or other similar material, to hogs on said Borchers Bros. Company ranch. That said injunction was granted without any fault of respondents. And further allege in said answer that by the provisions of said lease, if respondents were ever prevented by law or injunction, from using said premises for the purpose of feeding garbage to hogs, or raising hogs thereon, or carrying out the terms of that certain contract between respondents and the city of Sacramento, described in said lease, that thereupon defendants would have the right to cancel same, and that on the ——— day of January, 1929, they gave notice to plaintiff that they canceled and rescinded the lease. That said lease has been canceled by virtue of the terms of said lease, and that appellant has accepted said cancellation when offered by respondents.

The trial court found that on the ——— day of January, 1929, the lease was rescinded, terminated, and extinguished, and of no further force or effect.

Inasmuch as the lease provides that any alteration in, or improvements on the leased premises, made or constructed by the lessees, shall remain on said premises after the expiration of said term or extension, it becomes necessary to determine whether or not there is substantial evidence to support the said finding of the court that the lease was rescinded or canceled.

It is apparent that the judgment in the said case of Ohaver v. Fenech et al. did not render the lease void, nor give respondents the option of so declaring. That portion of the lease bearing upon this question is to the effect that if the said contract with the city of Sacramento became unenforceable or void, or if the lessees be prevented from gathering the garbage mentioned in said contract, or if, without their fault, the lessees be prevented from raising hogs on the leased premises, then at their option they may cancel same. The said judgment in no manner prevented, or affected the enforcement of the said agreement with the city of Sacramento, nor did it prevent the gathering of the garbage named therein, nor restrain or enjoin the said lessees from continuing to use said leased premises for raising hogs thereon.

The said case of Ohaver v. Fenech et al. was before the Supreme Court upon an application for a supersedeas (273 P. 555, 557), and in passing upon the effect of the injunction granted by the trial court, the following language was used: "It is contended by appellants [respondents in the instant case] that these restrictions upon the disposal of said garbage will necessarily require the removal by them of the hogs from the locality in which they are now maintained, and that the effect of said injunction will therefore be to compel them to take affirmative action in removing said hogs. This does not necessarily follow. The appellants may feed their hogs other food and maintain them in such a manner as not to render them a nuisance to their neighbors. So long as they pursue this course, the prohibitive terms of the injunction above set forth will not make it necessary for them to make any change in the locality in which their hogs are kept."

In addition to claiming that the effect of the said judgment gave them the option of declaring the lease void, respondents allege in their answer that on the ——— day of January, they gave appellant notice that they canceled and rescinded the said lease. No proof was offered to support this allegation. They claim, however, that appellant verbally agreed to the cancellation or surrender of the lease, and in support thereof produced the following evidence: Fenech testified that he had three or four talks with George Borchers; that Borchers asked him when he was going to move, and he said, when they picked a place, and that in the presence of Grech, Ciaparro, and witness Borchers, asked when they were going to move, and Fenech said that they would move right away; and in reply to this Borchers said, "Because I want to rent the place." He further testified that Borchers went with him to look at two places, and at one place he said, "This is the best place you fellows can get for hogs." And then he said, "When you move out there, I am going to raise pigs there." Ciaparro testified that he said to Borchers: "What you think if we appeal the case? Are you satisfied with $150 a month?" And Borchers said, "No, I have got a man I can get $500 for the ranch." He told me three or four times, "When are you going to move? When are you going to get out of here?" And I told him, "Just as soon as we can find a place to get out." Grech testified that Borchers asked him when they were going to move, and he said as soon as they were ready at the other place. Grech then said to him, "Why are you in such a hurry?" And he said: "Well, because I have got a fellow here to put a deposit on the place and I am losing $500 a month while you stay here. As soon as you move out of here, I make money. I am losing money right along." And on cross-examination he testified as follows:

"Q. You knew that Mr. Borchers wanted some money to have him release you from the lease, didn't you? A. I don't know such a thing like that. What I know, I thought the lease was canceled when it was in court, when we lost the case. I thought we had to move out of there; I thought the lease was canceled. We lost the case and the lease is canceled and Mr. Huston himself tells us that the lease is canceled." (The Mr. Huston referred to was one of respondents' attorneys in the injunction suit.)

"Q. And that is your only reason for believing that this lease is canceled, is that right? A. Yes, so they never talk to me about money at all.

"Q. You said that your only reason for believing the lease was canceled was the decision of the court? A. Well, what I know, Borchers, the way he was talking to me, looks like the lease was canceled, and when he is going to raise the hogs and sheep and cattle there himself and ask me to move out of there. He says he is going to start business himself."

Fenech testified on cross-examination as follows:

"Q. You recall that the court rendered the decision in the injunction matter? A. Yes.

"Q. Isn't it a fact that you thought that they canceled the lease? A. That is what I thought, yes.

"Q. And isn't that the only reason for thinking so, the decision of the court? A. Yes."

On redirect examination this witness further testified:

"Q. Well, now, you say that he told you to get off, didn't you? A. Yes.

"Q. And you said you would when you got a place? A. Yes.

"Q. And you thought the lease was terminated by that didn't you? A. Yes, sure."

W. H. Greenlaw, Jr., a witness produced by respondents, testified that Borchers told him that he hoped respondents would get off immediately because he wanted possession of the place himself; that he had a chance for greater money than they were paying him. No date is given as to the time of this conversation. On cross-examination he testified that some month and a half after, "when the thing was over," Borchers told him that the boys had made a mistake in not accepting his proposition, which was an offer of $4,000, and he to keep the improvements and releasing them from the lease. D. G. Nunnally was also produced as a witness by respondents. He testified that in December or January, Borchers took witness to the leased premises and wanted him to give him figures as to what witness thought the 20 acres across on the west of the road could be sold for. Witness asked him if he could do that under the lease, and he replied, "Well, they are going to get off, and we can do that anyway, as soon as they get off." This witness further testified that nearly every time he met him Borchers talked about their going to get off the ranch, and on one occasion asked witness what he thought the premises could be used for after they got off; that if they moved off, they would have to do something, go in with him; he wanted to go in with them, or something of that kind. The foregoing is practically all of the evidence introduced by respondents that tended in any way to show that appellant consented to or acquiesced in the rescission, cancellation, or termination of said lease.

Robert W. Huston, called by the appellant, testified that he had been attorney for respondents in the injunction suit; that some time in January, 1929, he had a conversation in his office with respondents and Mr. O'Connor, an attorney, who had been associated with witness as attorney for respondents in said injunction suit; that at said meeting O'Connor asked witness if he would talk with Borchers and see if a settlement could be reached. Witness finally consented to do so. All those present then discussed the matter. The result was that witness was to have a talk with Borchers and ascertain what sort of a settlement or understanding they could come to relative to the surrender of the premises. Pursuant to this arrangement he had a talk with Borchers and Borchers offered to let them take certain buildings and improvements off the rented premises and cancel the lease for $6,000. Witness then communicated the proposition to respondents, and they refused to accept it. He then had another talk with Borchers, and leaving out some of the property to be removed, Borchers reduced the offer to $3,000 or $3,500. The conversation of witness with Borchers was about a week before this action was begun, and the last conversation witness had with any of the respondents was with Grech some two or three days before this action was commenced.

Appellant admitted that respondents told him they were going to move off of the leased premises, but denied that he ever at any time agreed to release respondents from the lease, or to rescind or cancel it.

[1-5] A lease may be brought to an end by the surrender of the leased premises and the acquiescence in such surrender by the landlord. Such acquiescence is perhaps best evidenced by his taking possession of the property and assuming again all the authority over it of an owner in possession. Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 26 Cal. App. 371, 146 P. 1056; Steel v. Thompson, 59 Cal. App. 191, 210 P. 430. This surrender may be evidenced by some act on the part of the party against whom the surrender is claimed. This kind of surrender is termed a surrender by operation of law, and is based upon the doctrine of estoppel, and arises where the owner of the premises is a party to an act in conjunction with some act on the part of the tenant, the validity of which act the owner or landlord is estopped to deny. Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, vol. 2, 1198. Under the statute of frauds a surrender of the term can be done only by express consent of the parties, in writing, or by operation of law, when the parties do something that implies that both have consented. Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 27 P. 369, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145. A mere statement by the lessor to the lessee that he may move out if he desires, does not become of binding effect in terminating the leasehold until a surrender and acceptance have actually been made. 15 Cal. Jur. p. 795; Steel v. Thompson, 59 Cal. App. 191, 210 P. 430; Voss v. Levi, 33 Cal. App. 671, 166 P. 359. Merely attempting to secure a new tenant for premises previously leased, but which have been vacated without taking possession, or in fact reletting, is not an acceptance of the surrender by the former tenant. Melone Co. v. Acquistapace, 73 Cal. App. 199, 238 P. 734, 736. In this last-named case the court said: "A surrender is the yielding up of an estate for life or years to the reversioner or remainderman. Under the statute of frauds it can be done only by express consent of the parties in writing, or by operation of law when the parties do something which implies that both have consented. These acts are such as would estop the parties from disputing the fact of surrender, and which would not be valid unless the term were ended; as, for instance, a new lease accepted by the tenant or the resumption of possession by the landlord if the tenant acquiesces, or the giving of a lease to another. * * * The tenant, subject to the covenants * * * is the owner for the term. If he leaves the demised premises vacant, and avows his intention not to be bound by his lease, his title still continues, unless the landlord has accepted the offer of surrender. Merely attempting to secure a new tenant, without taking possession or in fact reletting, is not an acceptance of the surrender. * * * Chase v. Oehlke, 43 Cal. App. 435, 185 P. 425."

[6] In the case under consideration there is no evidence that there was any written agreement between appellant and respondents rescinding, canceling, or terminating the lease, nor is there any evidence that appellant ever took possession, or assumed possession of the leased premises after respondents removed therefrom. Nor, in the opinion of this court, is there any substantial evidence that appellant ever consented to or accepted a surrender of the lease. Such being the case, it is unnecessary to pass upon the question as to whether or not the improvements placed upon the leased premises are trade fixtures subject to removal by the lessees upon the termination of the lease.

For the reasons aforesaid the judgment must be and is hereby reversed.

DOZIER v. HILLMAN.

Civ. 6884.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

April 8, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1001(1), 1010(1) — Review — Verdict — Decision — Absence of substantial evidence.

Verdict or decision will not be sustained where there is no substantial evidence to support it.

2. Witnesses ⇨336 — Conviction of felony — Credibility.

In action on note, maker's admission of conviction for felony tended to impeach his credibility, notwithstanding subsequent pardon (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

3. Evidence ⇨589 — Contradictory testimony — Affecting credibility.

In action against maker of note, his contradictory and evasive testimony, with other evidence, justified court in refusing to credit his testimony.

The original answer had admitted execution of note, but alleged payment. A supplemental answer, filed after trial had begun and after maker had learned of death of secretary of payee corporation (to whom payment was alleged to have been made), denied execution of note, claiming it to be a forgery.

4. Appeal and error ⇨994(3) — Review — Credibility of witness.

Credibility of witnesses was question for trial court in action on note (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

5. Evidence ⚡571(1) — Weight of expert testimony — Question for trial court.

In action on note, weight to be given testimony of handwriting experts was question for trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

6. Appeal and error ⚡1010(1) — Review — Findings — Evidence — Conclusiveness.

Trial court's findings, there being evidence to support them, could not be disturbed on appeal.

7. Bills and notes ⚡474 — Provision for attorneys' fees — Absence of denial — Admitting liability.

In action on note providing for attorneys' fees, failure to deny allegation that $1,000 was reasonable fee admitted liability to some extent, but not for $1,000.

8. Bills and notes ⚡534 — Reasonable attorney's fees — Discretion of court.

In action on note providing for reasonable attorney's fees, amount thereof is to be determined by court in its discretion.

9. Appeal and error ⚡984(5) — Action on note — Attorney's fees — Discretion of court.

Court's discretionary action in determining reasonable attorney's fees recoverable in action on note will not be disturbed except for abuse thereof.

10. Bills and notes ⚡534 — Action on note — Excessive attorney's fee.

In action on note for $3,227, trial requiring three days, with additional time for settling pleadings and presenting motion, attorney's fee of $1,000 held excessive by $500.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Maud Watson Dozier, executrix of the estate of Thomas B. Dozier, deceased, against C. D. Hillman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Modified and affirmed.

L. L. James and C. K. Bonestell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

C. F. Kimball, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action brought by Thomas B. Dozier, since deceased, to recover from C. D. Hillman the sum of $3,227, with interest, according to the terms of a promissory note purporting to have been executed by Hillman on November 8, 1921.

The note was made payable to Laymance Real Estate Company, a corporation, and was by it transferred before maturity to Dozier.

The defendant in his answer to the complaint admitted the execution of the note, but alleged payment. In a supplemental answer he denied the execution of the note, alleging the same to be a forgery.

The trial court found in Dozier's favor, and entered judgment accordingly, with attorneys' fees in the sum of $1,000.

The defendant, who has appealed, contends that the finding that he executed the note is not supported by the evidence, and that the allowance of the above amount as an attorney's fee was an abuse of discretion.

The testimony shows that the document in question was indorsed for the corporation by William J. Laymance, its secretary, and delivered to Dozier for a valuable consideration shortly after its date. It appears that the defendant over a period of years had considerable business both with the company and its secretary. On April 4, 1923, Dozier sent a letter to the defendant, stating that the note (describing it) had been transferred to him and requesting payment. The defendant made no reply to this letter, but admits its receipt. Suit was commenced on the note and an amended complaint filed in the action on January 25, 1927. Thereafter two other letters passed between the parties; one dated August 2, 1927, was sent by the defendant, stating in effect that the note had been fully paid to William J. Laymance and making no claim that the same was a forgery. In reply Dozier on August 4, 1927, denied the statement that the note had been paid. Defendant's answer, alleging payment, was filed on August 31, 1927; his supplemental answer, denying the execution of the note, was filed on October 13, 1927, which was after the trial of the cause had commenced. The trial opened on September 14, 1927, and on that day the defendant, who was called as a witness for the plaintiff, testified in substance that he executed the note, but that he paid the same to William J. Laymance within three days after its date, and that payment was made in cash and by the conveyance of certain real property in Oregon. On this occasion it was announced by plaintiff's counsel that Laymance had died, a fact of which defendant, according to his testimony, had before been ignorant. The defendant after the filing of his supplemental answer testified that the only note executed by him to the corporation was dated June 25, 1920, and was for $2,262, payable six months after its date. In support of this claim he produced a receipt from the company dated June 21, 1920, stating that an account due the company for that amount had been paid by defendant by the execution of such a note. The defendant at this stage of the trial testified that the payment previously referred to by him was made upon this note and not upon the one in question. In this connection, however, the books of the company were produced, from which it appeared, as testified by its clerk who handled the transactions and made the entries in the regular course of business, that the principal sum of the note mentioned in the receipt with the accrued interest thereon and certain charges for insurance premiums, water, and taxes against the defendant, aggregating $3,227, were included in the note in question, the amount of which was credited to defendant's account with the company. It was also shown that the company kept a real estate account, which showed no transfer of any real property from the defendant. It was also testified by M. J. Laymance, the president of the company, that the defendant shortly before the trial stated to the witness that he had executed a note for about $3,000 to William J. Laymance, of whose decease he had just learned, and asked the witness if he knew of the transaction; that defendant further stated that there was a deposit in a bank in Portland, Or., to which the deceased or the company was entitled, and also that certain land in that state stood in one of their names; that defendant failed to divulge the name of the bank or the location of the land, but stated in substance that if the witness would help him in connection with the note in question he would assist the witness in recovering the property in Oregon. Two witnesses who qualified as handwriting experts, and a banker familiar with defendant's signature, testified for the defense, and each expressed the opinion that the note sued upon was not signed by the defendant. As against this testimony appears that of Dozier who was also shown to be qualified and who, after stating the grounds therefor, testified that in his opinion the signature affixed to the instrument was that of the defendant. The defendant on cross-examination admitted that he had been convicted of a felony, namely, using the mails to defraud, stating, however, that he was subsequently pardoned.

[1-6] While a verdict or decision will not be sustained when there is no substantial evidence to support it, here not only was there evidence tending to impeach the credibility of the defendant, namely, the admission of his conviction of a felony (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051), and this notwithstanding his pardon (People v. Hardwick, 204 Cal. 582, 269 P. 427, 59 A. L. R. 1480), but his testimony was in many particulars contradictory and evasive. This, considered in connection with the other evidence in the case, was sufficient to justify the trial court in refusing to credit his testimony, and to support the conclusion that the defense of forgery was conceived after he learned of the death of Laymance. The credibility of the witnesses, as well as the weight to be given the testimony of the experts, were questions for the trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847; Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 380, 119 P. 512, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1230; Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 P. 913), and there being evidence tending to impeach the testimony of the defendant, and evidence which contradicted the conclusions of his witnesses on the question of the execution of the note, the determination of the trial court cannot be disturbed on appeal (27 Cal. Jur., Witnesses, § 157, p. 186).

[7-10] The note contained the provision that: " * * * In case suit is instituted to collect this note or any portion thereof I promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorneys' fees in said suit." The complaint alleged the sum of $1,000 to be a reasonable attorney's fee, which allegation was not denied. Where a note makes provision for reasonable attorneys' fees, such fees are in the nature of special damage under the contract (De Jarnatt v. Marquez, 127 Cal. 558, 60 P. 45, 78 Am. St. Rep. 90), and the failure to deny the reasonableness of the amount asked was not an admission of liability to the extent charged, but simply an admission of liability to some extent (Landwehr v. Gillette, 174 Cal. 654, 163 P. 1018). The amount to be allowed is to be determined by the court in its discretion, and it is only for an abuse of discretion that its action will be disturbed. Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 175 Cal. 652, 166 P. 1006. While in the present case three days were required for the trial of the issues of fact, and additional time was spent in the settlement of the pleadings and the presentation of the motion for leave to file a supplemental answer, yet we are of the opinion that the attorney's fee allowed, considering the amount of the claim, was excessive and should be reduced. It is our conclusion that the sum of $500 is in view of the facts a reasonable allowance for attorney's fees, and that the judgment should be modified accordingly.

The judgment is modified by deducting the sum of $500, and as so modified is affirmed. It is further ordered that each party bear his own costs on appeal.

HILL v. WALSH.

Civ. 4019.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

April 12, 1930.

1. Replevin ☞59 — Description of property — Certainty.

Property sought to be recovered in action in claim and delivery must be described with reasonable certainty.

2. Replevin ☞104 — Judgment — Description of property — Judgment roll.

Description of property in replevin judgment may be aided by entire judgment roll.

3. Replevin ☞104 — Description of property — Judgment — Sufficiency.

In action in claim and delivery, description of property in judgment held sufficient under pleadings.

The property was described in complaint, findings, and judgment as "2 Buck rakes, 2 Mowers, 4 Wagons," etc., of specified value. The complaint was demurred to generally, but no uncertainty or ambiguity was suggested. In the answer, no point was raised regarding uncertain description, but instead plaintiff's right to possession of property was denied and claim of superior right was alleged, and it was also insisted that third persons asserting interest in property should be made parties.

4. Appeal and error ☞1170(1) — Reversal — Proving error.

To justify reversal, it must be shown not only that error exists, but that some right has been abridged thereby, or fair hearing prevented. (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Mary C. Hill, administratrix of the estate of Thomas P. Hill, deceased, against Patrick Walsh, Jr., and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

N. J. Barry, of Susanville, and W. M. Kearney, of Reno, Nev., for appellants.

J. E. Pardee, of Susanville, and R. M. Rankin, of Willows, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This is an action in claim and delivery for the recovery of certain personal property. Plaintiff had judgment for the return of the property, or for the value thereof, in case a return could not be made. From this judgment, defendants appeal on the judgment roll alone.

But one point is presented on the appeal. Appellants contend that the judgment is too uncertain to be enforced or enforceable, and that there is no description of the property sufficient to enable an officer, executing the judgment, to identify the property.

As indicated, we have before us the judgment roll alone.

The complaint alleges among other things, that certain personal property is in possession of defendants, and describes that property as follows:

Article	Value
2 Buck rakes	$ 125.00
2 Mowers	125.00
4 Wagons	200.00
5 Hay nets	50.00
1 Grain binder	70.00
1 Derrick and equipment	135.00
2 Side-delivery rakes.....	135.00
2 Sulkey rakes.....	70.00
1 Tractor	1,350.00
Stoves and household goods.....	175.00
1-500 gallon tank on wheels	90.00
1 Grain drill	50.00
1 6-disc tractor plow	225.00
1 Walking plow	10.00
1 2½ h. p. gas engine	50.00
Sundry tools and implements.....	75.00
Total	$2,935.00

In the trial court's findings of fact, the property is again described in exactly the same manner, and in the judgment it is ordered that plaintiff do have and recover from defendants the possession of the property described in plaintiff's complaint as follows: (Here follows the same description, including values, as hereinbefore tabulated.) The judgment providing the alternative of payment of values found in case delivery could not be made.

Appellant relies mainly upon the California cases cited as follows: Welch v. Smith, 45 Cal. 230; Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192; Cooke v. Aguirre, 86 Cal. 479, 25 P. 5; Hawley v. Kocher, 123 Cal. 77, 55 P. 696; Lamus v. Engwicht, 39 Cal. App. 524, 179 P. 435. In Welch v. Smith it is said: "The description of goods recovered is obviously insufficient to sustain a judgment in replevin unless, perhaps, it be aided in this instance by reference to the description set forth in the complaint. On looking into the complaint, however, the description there given is, if possible, even less definite than that found in the judgment." It might be noted that the judgment in the case of Welch v. Smith was for the restitution and possession of goods described as "Buckwheat, valued at three hundred and sixty-five dollars and seventy-five cents; sweet potatoes, valued at thirty-nine dollars; Irish potatoes, valued at one hundred and sixty dollars; [and] squash valued at one hundred and forty-five dollars."

In Kelly v. McKibben, supra, it is said: "The mode of describing the property recovered in the judgment is not one that we can conscientiously recommend as a precedent. But the description is not uncertain. That is certain which can be made certain."

In Cooke v. Aguirre, supra, the judgment of the lower court was reversed for many reasons and the last to be stated was as follows: "It contains no sufficient description of the property nor does it refer to any other pleading or paper for such description."

In the case of Hawley v. Kocher, supra, the decision was on the lower court's sustaining of a demurrer for uncertainty.

[1, 2] The last-cited case, Lamus v. Engwicht, supra, is authority only to the point that an action in replevin will not lie to recover "shares of stock" in a corporation, and does not aid us here. The cited cases support the claim of appellant to the extent that the property sought to be recovered in an action in claim and delivery must be described with reasonable certainty. But these decisions are likewise in accord on the point that in such an action the recitals or description in the judgment may and must be aided by the entire record comprising the judgment roll. And as a corollary to this we have the constitutional provision, section 4½, article 6, of the state Constitution, declaring, in effect, that error must work injustice in the case under review before a judgment should be set aside. With these principles in mind, we review the record before us.

[3] The complaint of plaintiff describes the property as hereinbefore indicated. Defendants entered a general demurrer to the complaint, but make no specification of uncertainty or ambiguity. The demurrer being overruled, defendants answered. In the answer, no point is urged as to the uncertain description. On the contrary, by answer, the defendants deny that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the property mentioned in the complaint, or any part thereof. They allege that they have an interest in the property against the claims of plaintiff. Defendants then set up that they held a chattel mortgage covering the said property, which chattel mortgage provided that upon breach the mortgagees might take possession of the chattels mortgaged. They then allege the breach, and the further fact that plaintiff did thereupon turn over to them the possession of all of the personal property mentioned in the complaint, and that defendants, since that time, have been in the sole, exclusive, and undisputed possession thereof. Further, defendants plead the pending of another action, and allege that the same identical rights between the parties are involved in the former suit and the one at bar, and that the nature, object, and character of said former suit is the same as the nature, character, and object of the suit at bar. Further, the answer sets up the claim that other persons, not parties to the suit, assert some interest in the property, and defendants ask that these persons be made parties, as necessary to a complete determination of the controversy. Defendants pray a decree establishing their lien upon the property and their right to retain possession thereof. The findings are against defendants on all issues, and the judgment follows.

[4] We may adopt the language of the court in the case of Kelly v. McKibben, supra, as follows: "The mode of describing the property recovered in the judgment is not one that we can conscientiously recommend as a precedent." But where the pleadings leave no possible doubt concerning the identity of the particular articles in controversy, and all of the issues presented and tried are framed upon mutual assent as to the specific property involved, it, indeed, comes with poor grace to attempt to defeat the judgment by a claim that possibly some third person reading the judgment could not immediately identify the property therein named. Surely, the defendants, under the record, could not have been misled. They have admitted under oath their ability to deliver the property described in the complaint, and have asked the judgment of the court for a decree establishing their right to retain it. It is not enough to establish, academically, the presence of some error to justify a reversal. Appellants must go further and show that some right of theirs has been abridged, or that, by reason of the error complained of, a fair hearing and determination has not been accorded them.

The judgment is affirmed.

SONOMA COUNTY v. DE WINTON. ★

Civ. 3847.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

April 10, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 10, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 9, 1930.

1. Eminent domain ⇨204 — Construction of road — Benefit to land not taken — Evidence — Admissibility.

Evidence of benefit to land not taken for road previously used by county only with owner's permission, held admissible.

2. Judgment ⇨715(1) — Estoppel — Subsequent action — Identical questions.

For judgment to constitute estoppel, it must appear from record or extrinsic evidence that identical questions were determined in former action (Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, subd. 2, and § 1911).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, subd. 2, declares judgment conclusive in respect to matters adjudicated, while section 1911 provides that only that is deemed to have been adjudged in former action which appears on its face to have been adjudged or was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto.

3. Judgment ⇨739 — Conclusiveness — Matters not adjudicable.

Judgment is not conclusive of matters not adjudicable in former suit.

4. Judgment ⇨715(3) — Enjoining county from using road — Award of damages — Res judicata — Condemnation proceeding.

Judgment enjoining county from using road and awarding damages held not res judicata in condemnation proceeding.

The issues in the former case were ownership of roadway, county's right to continue use thereof as public highway, and damages for injuries to owner's improvements in construction thereof, while issues in condemnation proceeding were necessity of land for public road, value of land taken, damage to land not taken, and benefit thereto.

5. Judgment ⇨958(1) — Injunction against using road — Consideration in condemnation proceeding — Instruction — Issue of permission.

Instruction that judgment roll was admitted in condemnation proceeding, on issue whether injunction against using road was granted because owner's permission was not given to construct it "exactly" as it was, held not erroneous.

6. Eminent domain ⇨145(4) — Construction of road — Condemnation proceeding — Instruction — Benefit to land not taken.

Instruction not to deduct benefit to land not taken for county road, by work done without owner's consent before complaint was filed, held properly refused.

7. Eminent domain ⇨223 — Construction of road — Benefit to land not taken — Failure to find — Waiver of objection — Requested instruction — Failure to object.

Defendant requesting instruction to deduct benefit to land not taken for county road from damages thereto, and not objecting to verdict not stating amount of such benefit, waived objection (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 619, 1248).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1248, requires the court or jury to ascertain and assess value of land taken, damage to land not taken, and benefit thereto, while section 619 provides that jury may again be sent out if verdict is insufficient in not covering issues submitted.

Action by Sonoma County against W. W. De Winton to condemn a right of way for a county road. From a judgment on a verdict for the value of the land taken only, defendant appeals.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

This action was brought by respondent to condemn a right of way for a county road over the land of appellant. The issues as to the value of the land taken, severance damage and benefit to land not taken were submitted to a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of appellant for the sum of $354 for the land taken, and no damages for severance from the land not taken. From the judgment rendered upon this verdict appellant has appealed. Appellant produced evidence tending to prove that the land taken was of the value of $1,500; that the damage to the land not taken was from $25,000 to $45,360, and that no benefit was conferred upon the land not taken by the construction of the road. Appellant then offered in evidence the judgment roll in an action brought by appellant against respondent and theretofore tried and determined. It appears from the findings contained in this judgment roll that this former action grew out of an agreement entered into between appellant and respondent in the year 1919, by the terms of which appellant agreed, in consideration of the sum of $250, to grant to respondent a right of way 40 feet wide over and across his said land, the outside edge of said right of way to be at least 30 feet from the top bank of the Russian river at a point easterly from appellant's upper house, and the construction of said road to be completed within one year from the date of said agreement; that in accordance with said agreement respondent entered upon appellant's land and did some work toward laying out and constructing said road, but did not pay appellant the $250, nor place the outside edge of the work which respondent did toward the construction of said road at least 30 feet back from the top back of the river at a point easterly from the upper house of appellant on said property; that, by reason of promises made by respondent that it would carry out and perform its part of said agreement, appellant extended the time within which to perform said work to December 20, 1920, but at this date respondent not having complied with its promises, appellant elected to consider said agreement terminated; that thereupon respondent requested appellant to reinstate its rights to construct said road and did again enter upon the premises and dig out and excavate a road through said land of appellant; that during the year 1922 two separate agreements were entered into by said parties providing for a board of arbitrators to determine the value of the land covered by the said right of way and to assess the damage appellant had sustained, but neither of these agreements was carried into effect; that from time to time respondent continued work upon said road and by January 1, 1924, had constructed a roadway through appellant's said land over which it was possible for vehicles to travel, but was not smoothed off or put in good condition.

On October 25, 1925, appellant commenced an action against respondent, reciting in his complaint the aforesaid facts, and demanding that respondent be enjoined from the further use and occupation of said right of way, and for damages for injuries caused to appellant's land by the construction of said road. Upon the trial of the issues involved in that action, judgment was rendered in favor of appellant enjoining respondent from the further use of said road, and for damages in the sum of $100. This judgment was rendered July 21, 1927, and the present action was commenced on August 11, 1927. The strip of land sought to be condemned by the present action is the same strip over which the road was theretofore constructed. When the said judgment roll was offered in evidence the attorney for appellant suggested to the court that it be considered as a record to the court, and not to the jury, for the reason that the said judgment roll consisted of long documents which would be difficult for the jury to follow, and that the court should, in its instructions to the jury, set forth the legal effect of said judgment roll, or such portions as might be applicable to the case, and to this suggestion the attorney for respondent assented. The record then recites that the judgment roll was thereupon admitted in evidence under the aforesaid circumstances and for said purposes. Respondent then produced testimony as to the value of the land taken, and also evidence as to the benefit conferred upon the property not taken by the construction of the road. The entire tract of land owned by appellant through which the right of way runs is twenty acres, and the amount within the said right of way is 1.4 acres.

Appellant does not question the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. He maintains, however, that the court erred in admitting certain evidence, and in giving and refusing to give certain instructions hereinafter referred to, and that the verdict of the jury upon which the judgment is based is incomplete and insufficient to support the judgment.

It was stipulated by the parties to the present action that the right of way sought to be condemned in this action follows the lines of the road constructed by respondent under the agreement of 1919. And it was also stipulated that the value of the appellant's land sought to be taken by the present action and damages to land not taken should be ascertained as of the date of the trial, to wit, December 17, 1928. This last stipulation was unnecessary for the reason that section 1249 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that where the issue is not tried within one year from the date of the commencement of the action, unless the delay was caused by the defendant, and in this case there is no evidence of any such delay, the compensation and damages shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of the trial. This action was commenced August 17, 1927, and was tried December 17, 1928.

[1] Appellant contends that the court erred in permitting respondent, over his objection, to produce evidence tending to show the value of the benefit conferred upon the land not taken by reason of the construction of said road. He bases this contention upon the ground that respondent, at all times since it began the construction of said road, has been a trespasser on his said lands, and therefore cannot offset any damage to which appellant may be entitled by proof of benefits conferred upon the land arising by or through the trespass. He cites several cases in his effort to support this contention. The one upon which he appears mainly to rely is that of Pinney v. Borough of Winstead, 83 Conn. 411, 76 A. 994, 20 Ann. Cas. 923. This was a case where the town wrongfully entered upon Pinney's land and constructed a street thereon without condemnation proceedings and without Pinney's consent. Pinney brought an action against the town for damages arising from this trespass. The case was tried upon the theory that the taking was permanent. No proof was offered by the town tending to show that the construction of the street benefited the remaining land. Judgment was given the plaintiff for the value of his land that was taken, only. However, in that case the court held that even if benefits had been proven, they could not have been offset against plaintiff's judgment, for the reason that the law is well established that a trespasser cannot, when compensation is sought for his trespass, be heard to say, in his defense, that he has benefited plaintiff by his wrongful act.

These cases are not in point for the reason that there is no evidence to the effect that during the time respondent was using or occupying the said road it was a trespasser. In his complaint in the former action appellant alleges that he had permitted respondent to enter upon his said land and do the work on said road up to the commencement of that action, and in its findings in said former action the court specifically found that respondent went upon and took possession of the strip of land which it used and occupied as a road and highway across the land of appellant in the year 1919 by his permission and has ever since the year 1919 used and occupied same by the permission of appellant. There is no evidence that since the commencement of the former action respondent has continued to use or occupy the said strip of land for highway purposes or has continued to use or occupy it for any purpose. There being no evidence that respondent has used or occupied the said strip of land otherwise than with the permission of appellant, the objection to the introduction of this evidence was properly overruled.

[2-4] Appellant also claims that the court erred in giving instruction No. 5, which was given by the court of its own motion. By this instruction the jury was told that the judgment roll in the former action was admitted in evidence upon the issue, joined by the allegation contained in the complaint in the instant action, to the effect that respondent entered upon appellant's land and constructed said road with his permission, and appellant's denial thereof and assertion that an injunction was granted appellant in the former action because permission was not granted to construct the roadway exactly as it was constructed. That issue, being thus joined on this allegation, permitted the reception in evidence of said judgment roll, but this did not alter the issue which the jury was to determine, namely, the market value of the land sought to be condemned, and the damage, if any, to the remaining land by severance of the land sought to be condemned from the remainder of the tract. Apparently, the object the court had in view in giving this instruction was to inform the jury, complying with appellant's suggestion made at the time said judgment roll was admitted in evidence, of the extent to which the jury should give consideration to the said judgment roll in the determination of the issues before it. In the former trial no issues were involved regarding the value of the land occupied by the road, nor of damages to the land not taken by reason of severance therefrom of the land occupied by the road, nor of benefits conferred upon the land not taken by the construction of the road. It appears to have been an action to enjoin respondent from further occupying or using said road because it had failed to perform its agreements thereto relating, and for damages arising from such failure. By section 1908, subdivision 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, the effect of a judgment is conclusive in respect to the matters adjudicated, and, by section 1911 of said code, that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former action which appears on its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto. In order that a judgment in one action may constitute an estoppel against the parties thereto in a subsequent action, it must be made to appear, either upon the face of the record or by extrinsic evidence, that the identical questions involved in the issues to be tried were determined in the former action. Beronio v. Ventura County Lumber Co., 129 Cal. 232, 61 P. 958, 79 Am. St. Rep. 118; Agnifili v. Lagna, 204 Cal. 262, 267 P. 705.

The issues in the former case were the ownership of said roadway and the right of respondent to continue the use of it as a public highway, together with damages for injuries inflicted upon appellant's improvements by respondent in its construction of said highway.

The present action is a proceeding to condemn a strip of land for a public highway over the said land of appellant, and the issues involved in this case are whether or not said strip of land is necessary for public use as a right of way for a public road, the value of the land embraced within said right of way, the damage to the land not taken by the severance therefrom of the land taken, and the benefit, if any, accruing to the land not taken, by the proposed highway. A judgment is not conclusive of any matter which, from the nature of the case, the form of the action, or the character of the pleadings, could not have been adjudicated in the former suit. Black on Judgments, vol. 2, p. 944. In the case of Lillis v. Emigrant Ditch Co., 95 Cal. 553, 30 P. 1108, 1110, after stating that the judgment is not conclusive as to any matter which only comes collaterally in issue, the court said: "A fact or matter in issue is that upon which the plaintiff proceeds by his action, and which the defendant controverts in his pleadings, while collateral facts are such as are offered in evidence to establish matters or facts in issue; and notwithstanding they may be controverted at the trial, they do not come within the rule."

In the former case the allegations of the complaint, except those relating to damages to improvements, are substantially the same as the facts found by the court hereinbefore set forth. The answer of respondent thereto is a denial of those allegations and a claim of ownership of said roadway by adverse user. The judgment of the court in that case enjoined and restrained respondent from trespassing upon appellant's said land and from using or attempting to use any roadway existing thereon and for damages. We are of the opinion that the judgment in the former action is not res judicata as to any issue or matter involved in the present action.

[5] Appellant objects to the word "exactly" used in this instruction. In view of the fact that there is nothing in the findings indicating how many inches or feet respondent deviated from the agreement of 1919 in laying out and constructing the said road, we cannot say that the said word was used improperly. In fact, the allegations contained in the complaint in this condemnation action, relative to permission theretofore given by appellant to respondent to enter upon said land and construct a highway there, were unnecessary and immaterial allegations and doubtless would have been stricken upon motion. We are unable to see wherein appellant was injured by this instruction.

[6] Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to give his proposed instructions Nos. 1 and 2. Instruction No. 1 is as follows:

"It is your duty to determine these damages as of the date of the filing of the complaint in this action, which was on August 11, 1927.

"Sonoma County actually constructed the road through Mr. de Winton's property as the road now exists long prior to the filing of the complaint in this action; but the county so constructed the road without Mr. de Winton's consent and without having paid him anything for the right of way, and in so doing, the county exceeded its rights.

"Therefore, in ascertaining the value of the land taken for the right of way in this case, and the damage to the adjoining property, you must consider the value of that property with the road already constructed. That road belonged to Mr. de Winton and you are not to deduct from the value of the land taken and the damages done to the adjoining property any benefits which you believe he may have received by reason of any work done in constructing the road prior to August 11, 1927."

Aside from the fact that this instruction required the jury to assess the damage as of the date of the commencement of the action instead of the date of the trial, it is somewhat difficult to determine just what it means. Apparently its purpose was to instruct the jury that the road theretofore having been constructed by the county, the jury could not consider the matter of any benefit which the land not taken might receive from the county making it a public road by the condemnation proceedings. In other words, the county having built the road, whatever benefit it was to the adjoining land of appellant had already accrued, that is to say, had accrued when the road was built and consequently no benefit would accrue at the time of the condemnation suit. At the time this condemnation suit was instituted the road was a private road and will remain such until the final judgment of condemnation. The question of who may have built the road is wholly immaterial in this action. The benefit, if any, that accrues to the land not taken, accrues when the road becomes a public highway, that is to say, when it becomes a permanent highway operated, used, and maintained by the public, affording ingress and egress to and from the land not taken. This instruction was properly refused.

Instruction No. 2, proposed by appellant and refused by the court, is as follows: "You are instructed that it has been decided in a prior action by Mr. de Winton against Sonoma County that this road was built by the County in its present location without Mr. de Winton's consent and against his will, and you are required to accept that as a fact conclusively established in this case."

This instruction was also properly refused for the reasons hereinbefore set forth.

This appeal was brought up on a bill of exceptions which set forth briefly the evidence produced by the respective parties, pro and con, as to the value of the land taken, and benefits and damages to land not taken. Other than this no other statement of the evidence produced at the trial of the present action is contained in said bill of exceptions, except the judgment roll in the former case.

[7] Lastly, appellant contends that the judgment in the present action is void for the reason that the jury failed to find by its verdict the amount of the benefit which the land not taken will receive by the construction of the road. Section 1248, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the court or jury must ascertain and assess, first, the value of the land taken; second, the damage which will accrue to the land not taken by reason of the severance; and, third, the benefit, if any, which the construction of the road may be to the land not taken. The verdict of the jury was in the following words: "We, the jury in the above entitled action, render the following verdict: Question No. 1. What is the value of the strip of land of defendant W. W. de Winton, sought to be condemned by plaintiff? Answer, $354.00. Question No. 2. What is the damage, if any, to the balance of the land not sought to be condemned by reason of its severance from the land sought to be condemned by plaintiff? Answer. None." Appellant cites cases from other states, notably, Michigan and Colorado, to the effect that the aforesaid requirements are mandatory, and calls attention to the case of Butte County v. Boydston, 64 Cal. 110, 29 P. 511, which he claims supports this contention. In this latter case no assessment of the value of the land taken, nor damages to that not taken, nor benefits, by the improvement, to the land not taken, were assessed at all, nor payment, or tender of compensation made, and under those circumstances the court held that the owner could not be deprived of his land, and that any judgment rendered against him would be illegal and void, while at the same time the court said: "But the value of the land, the damage, if any, and the benefit, if any, must be separately assessed, in order that the compensation may be adjudged and paid." While section 1248 of the Code of Civil Procedure plainly requires that the value of the land taken, the damage to that not taken, and the benefit, if any, to the remaining land should be separately stated, yet in this case we find that the omission from the verdict of the value of the benefit to the remaining land, by the construction of the road, was mainly brought about by appellant himself.

Instruction No. 24, which was given to the jury at the request of appellant, reads in part as follows: "If you believe that Mr. de Winton's property, on either side or both sides of the proposed right of way, has sustained any special benefit by reason of the construction of this road, you may deduct the value of such benefits from the damages to be awarded to the land on each side of the right of way." Then again, when the jury returned into court with the aforesaid verdict, defendant made no objection to the fact that it failed to state the amount of the benefit, if any, to the remaining land. The case of Ft. Lyon Canal Co. v. Farnan, 48 Colo. 414, 109 P. 861, 862, was an action in eminent domain, where the jury failed to find the benefit to the remaining land, and no objection was made thereto at the time the verdict was returned. The court there said: "Had counsel for petitioner, as it was his duty to do, at the time the verdict was returned and before the jury was discharged, if of opinion that the same was not sufficiently certain, made that objection, the verdict doubtless would have been forthwith corrected to show, with greater particularity if that were necessary, exactly what the jury did in fact pass upon and find. * * * Beside it may well be held that petitioner waived his right to question it, either as to form or substance, by failing to urge objection thereto in apt time." If the verdict is insufficient in not covering the issues submitted, the jury may again be sent out. Section 619, Code Civ. Proc. Had appellant desired to have the verdict of the jury specify the amount of the benefit, if any, to the land not taken by the construction of the road, he should have so informed the court at the time the verdict was returned; otherwise, he waived this requirement. Benson v. Southern Pacific Co., 177 Cal. 777, 171 P. 948; Bloomberg v. Laventhal, 179 Cal. 616, 178 P. 496; Van Damme v. McGilvray Stone Co., 22 Cal. App. 191, 133 P. 995. He also waived it by his instruction No. 24, hereinbefore quoted. It is a fair presumption that following this instruction the jury, in assessing the damage to the land not taken, by reason of the severance, and in assessing the benefits accruing to the remaining land, found that the benefits equaled or exceeded the damage, and therefore could give appellant no damage for the severance.

From an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that the alleged errors of which complaint is made did not result in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

The judgment is affirmed, appellant to recover costs on appeal.

Ex parte BERMAN.

Cr. 1940.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

April 2, 1930.

1. Witnesses $\S$ 305(1) — Deposition — Waiver — Self-incrimination.

Giving deposition was not waiver of privilege against self-incrimination.

2. Witnesses $\S$ 305(1) — Employment as fiduciary — Waiver — Privilege.

By accepting employment as agent or fiduciary, one does not thereby waive or lose privilege against self-incrimination.

3. Witnesses ⇨308 — Answer — Incriminating tendency — Privilege.

Unless it is manifest that answer cannot possibly incriminate, witness' privilege when asserted must be respected.

4. Witnesses ⇨307 — Self-incrimination — Claim of privilege — Court's duty.

When witness asserts privilege against self-incrimination, court, before committing for contempt, must determine that no direct answer could tend to incriminate.

5. Witnesses ⇨307 — Self-incrimination — Claim of privilege — Fraud.

If answer actually tends to incriminate, witness is not guilty of contempt for fraudulently asserting privilege, intending thereby to protect others.

Application by Jacob Berman for a writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure release of petitioner from custody upon a commitment for contempt of court.

Petitioner discharged.

Otto Christensen, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., Robert P. Stewart, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., A. H. Van Cott, and William McKay, Deputy Dist. Attys., Hewitt, McCormick & Crump, Joseph L. Lewinson, and F. Walton Brown, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

[1] The petitioner was ordered confined in the county jail of Los Angeles county for contempt of court in refusing to answer twenty-five questions asked of him upon the taking of his deposition in a cause pending in the superior court, the confinement to continue until he should purge himself of the contempt by making answers to the interrogatories. The reason assigned for his refusal was that to answer the questions might tend to incriminate him.

Testimony was given by the former president of the board of directors of the Julian Petroleum Corporation to the effect that petitioner was employed by him some time in the spring of 1925 and placed in charge of the stock transfer department of that company where he continued to work until May 2, 1927. There was also testimony, and the petitioner admitted, that his deposition had been taken in a case pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county, entitled R. Guenther v. H. J. Barneson et al. All of the questions, for the refusal to answer which the petitioner was committed, relate to this deposition. Thirteen questions and answers therein were separately read to the witness, and he was asked if he had not been asked the question and made the answer. With one exception only, substantially the following question was put to him: "I ask you whether the answer just read is not a true statement of fact in response to the question just read?" In each instance the witness declared his wish to stand upon his constitutional right and refused to answer the question upon the ground that it might tend to incriminate him. The substance of the thirteen questions thus propounded in the Barneson deposition may be stated as follows: (1) Whether the witness had had some connection with the Julian Petroleum Corporation from some time in 1924 until May 3, 1927; (2) a brief description of that connection and when it originated; (3) the nature of the business transactions conducted by the witness with a man named Streeter of Barneson & Co., stockbrokers; (4) whether the witness and Streeter had transactions by which they borrowed money "one from the other"; (5) whether the witness didn't buy and sell stock to, and borrow money from Streeter; (6) when the witness first bought stock from him; (7) whether he bought stock through Streeter; (8) whether the usual transaction under which he placed orders with Streeter to buy stock was to buy it on the Los Angeles stock exchange; (9) over what period of time these transactions extended; (10) during what period of time the witness had business with Streeter by which he sold the latter stock of the Julian Petroleum Corporation; (11 and 12) whether these stock purchases through Barneson & Co. commenced some time in 1926; (13) whether the witness could fix more definitely the time when he first sold stock to Streeter or Barneson & Co. after the former had associated himself with that firm. The superior court judge, before whom the deposition was being taken and who adjudged petitioner to be guilty of contempt, found that the witness had been employed by the Julian Petroleum Corporation and had charge of the transfer of stock of that corporation from about January 1, 1926, until May 2, 1927, and that by reason of such employment he waived any privilege he might otherwise have had against disclosing his transactions in connection therewith or against testifying in the action. He also found that petitioner waived his privilege by giving his deposition in the case of Guenther v. Barneson et al. And he also made a finding to the effect that to answer the questions would not tend to criminate the petitioner of perjury and that he did not claim his privilege in good faith or "through any belief—that his answers to all or any of said questions would or might tend * * * to incriminate him, but the refusal * * * to answer each and all of said questions was * * * for the purpose of shielding and protecting defendants in this case. * * *

We have, therefore, to examine first the contention that petitioner, by giving his deposition in the case of Guenther v. Barneson et al., waived his privilege against testifying, assuming for the purpose of this as well as the succeeding question, that to answer the interrogatories would tend to incriminate the petitioner. The problem is not entirely new. In Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 63 P. 372, 374, the prosecuting witness who had testified at the preliminary hearing of one against whom a criminal complaint had been filed, refused to testify at the trial in the superior court on the ground that his evidence might tend to criminate him. The trial judge thereupon found that the witness had waived his privilege by testifying at the preliminary hearing and sentenced him for contempt. The Supreme Court says, in reviewing the judgment of contempt: "It appears that the trial court based its judgments of contempt largely upon the ground that the witness had, without objection, testified at the preliminary examination of Minnie Campbell, and for that reason had waived his right to refuse to testify at the trial upon the ground that his evidence would tend to convict him of a felony. The position of the trial court in this regard is untenable. This question of waiving the privilege is discussed and decided in Temple v. Commonwealth, 75 Va. 896, and Cullen v. Commonwealth, 24 Grat. [65 Va.] 624. It is said in those cases that the witness' statements elsewhere have nothing to do with the question." We find a like declaration in People v. Cassidy, 213 N. Y. 388, 107 N. E. 713, 715, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1009, as follows: "The weight of authority is against the claim of the people that Walter by giving testimony before Justice Scudder waived his constitutional right to decline to give testimony on the trial of Willett that could be used against him in a criminal case. Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145; Overend v. San Francisco Sup. Ct., 131 Cal. 280, 63 P. 372; State v. Burrell, 27 Mont. 282, 70 P. 982; Temple v. Com., 75 Va. 892; Cullen v. Com., 24 Grat. [65 Va.] 624; Matter of Mark, 146 Mich. 714, 110 N. W. 61; Samuel v. People, 164 Ill. 379, 45 N. E. 728; Georgia R. & [B.] R. Co. v. Lybrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794; Miskimmins v. Shaver, 8 Wyo. 392, 58 P. 411, 49 L. R. A. 831; Boston Marine Ins. Co. v. Slocovitch, 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 718; Cullinan v. Quinn, 95 App. Div. 492, 88 N. Y. S. 963; Com. v. Phoenix Hotel Co., 157 Ky. 180, 162 S. W. 823; State v. Lloyd, 152 Wis. 24, 139 N. W. 514, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 415; Ex parte Wilson, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 630, 47 S. W. 996." These authorities amply establish the rule prevailing in this jurisdiction, and, as we think, in accordance with sound reason.

rate statement of the proposition advanced is, that one who is employed in a fiduciary capacity has no privilege to assert in so far as his testimony relates to transactions occurring in the course of his employment. In other words, if this argument be sound, an agent accused of embezzlement is not accorded the same protection against giving testimony to be used to convict him as is one charged with murder. If this be true it is a strange anomaly in the law. Nor has our attention been called to any authority which directly supports the argument. We have been cited to Johnson v. U. S., 228 U. S. 457, 33 S. Ct. 572, 57 L. Ed. 919, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263, and In re Fuller, 262 U. S. 91, 43 S. Ct. 496, 67 L. Ed. 881, but those authorities simply determine that where the title to one's books and records has passed to his trustee in bankruptcy that the bankrupt has "no constitutional right to prevent" their "use for any legitimate purpose." Furthermore, it cannot possibly be urged that Eggers v. Fox, 177 Ill. 185, 52 N. E. 269, is in point. That case simply decides that where a witness does not assert his privilege it is error for the court to refuse to permit him to testify. No one, of course, can seriously contend that an agent is not under the necessity of accounting to his principal, as is declared in the two English cases relied upon by counsel, Green v. Weaver, 1 Simons Rep. 404, and Robinson v. Kitchin, 25 Law Journal, Equity, New Series, 441 (1855), but it can scarcely be argued that because therein it was held incumbent upon the brokers to relate their transactions even though incidentally they became subject to statutory penalties, not by reason of the things and matters it was sought to discover, but as the result of assuming to act as brokers at all, that those authorities should have the effect of persuading us to limit the natural extent of a constitutional provision adopted for the very purpose of putting an end to the practice of extorting confessions and admissions which once prevailed in the absence of such a guaranty. We are not at all inclined to whittle away at these safeguards of American liberty until they become nothing but shallow pretenses, but rather we would, wherever proper and possible, give them renewed vigor and renewed vitality. Not only from the standpoint of reason but also from precedent in our own jurisdiction do we feel constrained to declare that an agent does not, by becoming such, waive his constitutional right not to give testimony tending to incriminate him. In People v. Millsap, 85 Cal. App. 733, 260 P. 378, 380, the defendant was charged with perjury in having verified an answer to a complaint. The court said: "The allegations which we have summarized from the complaint clearly show that the appellant received money of the plaintiff in said civil action in a large amount; that at the time he received it he was acting in a fiduciary capacity for her; that instead of investing and keeping it for her, which he should have done in the due and lawful execution of his trust, he fraudulently appropriated it to his own use and refused on demand to return it. This is sufficient to make out a case of embezzlement, under sections 503 and 506 of the Penal Code. 10 Cal. Jur. 265; People v. Shearer, 143 Cal. 66, 76 P. 813; People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 328, 65 P. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174; People v. Steffner, 67 Cal. App. 23, 227 P. 699. Although neither the date at which this misappropriation occurred nor the dates on which plaintiff demanded the return of her money are alleged, yet a prosecution for the embezzlement was not barred by the statute, at least as to the sum of $8,500, for that amount was received by appellant within three years before he verified the answer, and, of course, could not have been embezzled before it was received. An admission of the truth of these allegations would therefore have subjected appellant to a criminal prosecution for embezzlement, and he was not required by section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure to verify his answer."

[3] Turning now to the finding of the court that the petitioner's claim of privilege was not asserted in good faith, but, for the purpose of shielding certain of the defendants, let us consider to what extent the court is authorized to decide the questions the witness must answer. It must be obvious, as is said in Overend v. Superior Court, supra, that the witness "is not required to disclose all the facts, as this would defeat the object for which he claims protection." It is equally apparent that the witness cannot arbitrarily refuse to testify without the existence in fact of a real danger; and that some discretion must rest in the court whereby it may prevent the mantle of protection from being turned into a cloak for fraud and trickery. What is the test by which the court and the witness are to be guided in the adjustment of apparently conflicting rights? Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of U. S. v. Burr (In re Willie), 25 Fed. Cas. page 38, No. 14,692e, said:

"When two principles come in conflict with each other, the court must give them both a reasonable construction, so as to preserve them both to a reasonable extent. The principle which entitles the United States to the testimony of every citizen, and the principle by which every witness is privileged not to accuse himself, can neither of them be entirely disregarded. They are believed both to be preserved to a reasonable extent, and according to the true intention of the rule and of the exception to that rule, by observing that course which it is conceived courts have generally observed. It is this:

"When a question is propounded, it belongs to the court to consider and to decide whether any direct answer to it can implicate the witness. If this be decided in the negative, then he may answer it without violating the privilege which is secured to him by law. If a direct answer to it may criminate himself, then he must be the sole judge what his answer would be. The court cannot participate with him in this judgment, because they cannot decide on the effect of his answer without knowing what it would be; and a disclosure of that fact to the judges would strip him of the privilege which the law allows, and which he claims. It follows necessarily then, from this statement of things, that if the question be of such a description that an answer to it may or may not criminate the witness, according to the purport of that answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it would be, to answer the question or not. If, in such a case, he say upon his oath that his answer would criminate himself, the court can demand no other testimony of the fact. If the declaration be untrue, it is in conscience and in law as much a perjury as if he had declared any other untruth upon his oath; as it is one of those cases in which the rule of law must be abandoned, or the oath of the witness be received.

"The counsel for the United States have also laid down this rule according to their understanding of it; but they appear to the court to have made it as much too narrow as the counsel for the witness have made it too broad. According to their statement a witness can never refuse to answer any question unless that answer, unconnected with other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of a crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible but a probable case that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom he is safe; but draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description." (Italics ours.)

That this concise yet comprehensive statement of the celebrated chief justice remains the law to-day is evident from the fact that almost every case throughout the United States, down to and including Mason v. United States, 244 U. S. 362, 37 S. Ct. 621, 61 L. Ed. 1198, has quoted it with approval.

Another leading pronouncement is one by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in Regina v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311, adopted in the case of Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 16 S. Ct. 644, 648, 40 L. Ed. 819, as follows:

"To entitle a party called as a witness to the privilege of silence, the court must see, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from his being compelled to answer, although, 'if the fact of the witness being in danger be once made to appear, great latitude should be allowed to him in judging for himself of the effect of any particular question.'"

"Further than this," said the Chief Justice, "we are of opinion that the danger to be apprehended must be real and appreciable, with reference to the ordinary operation of law in the ordinary course of things; not a danger of an imaginary and unsubstantial character, having reference to some extraordinary and barely possible contingency, so improbable that no reasonable man would suffer it to influence his conduct. We think that a merely remote and naked possibility, out of the ordinary course of the law, and such as no reasonable man would be affected by, should not be suffered to obstruct the administration of justice. The object of the law is to afford to a party, called upon to give evidence in a proceeding inter alios, protection against being brought by means of his own evidence within the penalties of the law. But it would be to convert a salutary protection into a means of abuse if it were to be held that a mere imaginary possibility of danger, however remote and improbable, was sufficient to justify the withholding of evidence essential to the ends of justice." (Italics ours.)

In Ex parte Butt, 78 Ark. 262, 93 S. W. 992, 995, the court quotes from State v. Thaden, 43 Minn. 255, 45 N. W. 447, relative to the rule laid down by Chief Justice Cockburn as follows: "To this we would add that, when such reasonable apprehension of danger appears, then, inasmuch as the witness alone knows the nature of the answer he would give, he alone must decide whether it would criminate him. This, we think, is substantially what Chief Justice Marshall meant by his statement of the rule in the Burr trial." Another phrasing of the rule is contained in Wilson v. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co., 164 Ind. 462, 73 N. E. 892, 893, in these words: "If a witness places his refusal to answer on this ground, his claim of privilege must be respected, unless it be clear from his whole examination that he is mistaken in the supposition that his answer would tend in any degree to criminate him, or else that his refusal is purely contumacious. * * * An admission, for instance, that he had converted moneys which came into his hands as agent of appellant during the time in question would furnish an important item of evidence under an indictment assigning perjury upon the testimony that he gave upon his trial for embezzlement. * * * (Italics ours.) To the same general effect reference may be had to Foot v. Buchanan (C. C.) 113 F. 156; People v. Zazove, 311 Ill. 198, 142 N. E. 543; Ex parte Senior, 37 Fla. 1, 19 So. 652, 32 L. R. A. 133; Floyd v. State, 7 Tex. 215; Poole v. Perritt, 1 Speers (S. C.) 128; Chamberlain v. Willson, 12 Vt. 491, 36 Am. Dec. 356; Ex parte Irvine (C. C.) 74 F. 955; Word v. Sykes, 61 Miss. 649; Kirschner v. State, 9 Wis. 140; U. S. v. Heike (C. C.) 175 F. 852; State v. Edwards, 2 Nott. & McC. (S. C.) 17, 10 Am. Dec. 557; In re Moser, 138 Mich. 302, 101 N. W. 588, 5 Ann. Cas. 31.

We should not close this résumé of precedent law without two or three excerpts from cases bearing particularly upon the question of the good faith of the witness. From People v. Forbes, 143 N. Y. 219, 38 N. E. 303, 306, we select this language:

"The witness who knows what the court does not know, and what he cannot disclose without accusing himself, must in such cases judge for himself as to the effect of his answer; and if, to his mind, it may constitute a link in the chain of testimony, sufficient to convict him when other facts are shown, or to put him in jeopardy, or subject him to the hazard of a criminal charge, indictment, or trial, he may remain silent. While the guilty may use the privilege as a shield, it may be the main protection of the innocent; since it is quite conceivable that a person may be placed in such circumstances, connected with the commission of a criminal offense, that, if required to disclose other facts within his knowledge, he might, though innocent, be looked upon as the guilty party. Adams v. Lloyd, 3 Hurl. & N. 363.

"But it is urged that the relator made use of the privilege, not in good faith, for his own protection from any peril, actual or apprehended, but as a pretext for shielding his friends or associates, and that the facts and circumstances before the learned judge presiding at theoyer and terminator were of such a nature as to warrant him in so deciding as a matter of fact, and that such finding is not reviewable here. The weight of authority seems to be in favor of the rule that the witness may be compelled to answer when he contumaciously refuses, or when it is perfectly clear and plain that he is mistaken, and that the answer cannot possibly injure him, or tend in any degree to subject him to the peril of prosecution. But the courts have recognized the impossibility in most cases of anticipating the effect of the answer. Where it is not so perfectly evident and manifest that the answer called for cannot incriminate as to preclude all reasonable doubt or fair argument, the privilege must be recognized and protected."

In Sovereign Camp Woodmen of World v. Bailey (Tex. Civ. App.) 163 S. W. 683, 684, we find the following:

"When a witness desires to be relieved from answering a question, he must swear that he believes that his answer would incriminate him. He cannot sit silently by and refuse to answer without giving a reason for his silence. Rosendale v. McNulty, 23 R. I. 465, 50 A. 850; Ex parte Stice, 70 Cal. 51, 11 P. 459; Scott v. Miller, 5 Jur. N. S. 858, cited in note to the Ohio case herein cited. The privilege cannot be put forward for the purpose of concealing facts in the interest of some third person. People v. Foundry Co., 201 Ill. 236, 66 N. E. 349; Re Moser, 138 Mich. 302, 101 N. W. 589, 5 Ann. Cas. 31; Lewisohn v. O'Brien, 176 N. Y. 253, 68 N. E. 353.

"In this case, if it should not appear that the evidence asked of the Holzheusers as to the killing of L. H. Bailey would subject them to any danger from a criminal prosecution, but that the rule intended for the protection of accused persons is being used to protect the interests of the minor child, they should be compelled to answer. They should be compelled to swear unequivocally that their testimony would incriminate them, and then the court should be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witnesses from their being compelled to answer."

And in Re Stewart, 121 Wash. 429, 209 P. 849, 852, quoting from what the court designates the modern rule as found in 28 R. C. L. 428, it is said: "There are several English authorities which hold that a witness is the sole judge of whether answering a certain question asked would tend to incriminate him. There are also American authorities which seem to lean to the same view. However, the great weight of authority is to the contrary, and it is now settled, both in England and in this country, that it is the province of the court to determine in the first instance under all the circumstances of the case whether any direct answer to a proposed question has a tendency to criminate a witness, and, of course, it is the duty of the court, while it protects the witness in the due exercise of his privilege, to take care that he does not, under the pretense of defending himself, screen others from justice, or withhold evidence which he might safely give. Otherwise it would be in the power of every witness to deprive parties of the benefit of his testimony, by a merely colorable pretense that his answers to questions would have a tendency to implicate him in some crime or misdemeanor, or would expose him to a penalty or forfeiture, when it is clear that the questions have no such tendency. The court must be able to discern from the character of the question and the other facts adduced in the case some tangible and substantial probability that the answer of the witness might help to convict him of a crime. Sometimes it may be difficult to discern the dividing line, but in all such cases, the doubt should be solved in favor of the witness. Certainly, where the witness, on oath, declares his belief that the answer to the question would criminate or tend to criminate him, the court cannot compel him to answer, unless it is perfectly clear, from a careful consideration of all the circumstances of the case, that the witness is mistaken, or is acting in bad faith, and that the answer cannot possibly have any such tendency. For the purpose of this discussion a question that criminales, or tends to criminate, a witness may be defined as one the answer to which will show, or tend to show, him guilty of a crime for which he is yet liable to be punished." (Italics ours.)

[4, 5] It cannot be doubted, from the authorities from which we have quoted and which we have cited, that the court is first charged with the responsibility of determining whether there is a real danger. Obviously, it can as a matter of law say in a proper case that the statute of limitations has run against the offense. Where complete immunity is provided by law, it can so determine. Where the facts disclose beyond reasonable doubt that the acts which the witness fears to disclose do not in law constitute an offense, it can so declare. In all of the cases cited, however, it is to be observed that the statement is that it is the province of the court to say "whether any direct answer to a proposed question has a tendency to criminate" the witness which is but another way of saying that the court must determine that no direct answer which the witness may make can tend to criminate him. When the petitioner here was asked whether the answers did not relate "a true statement of fact in response to the" questions asked, if he had answered "No," he would have given evidence, which beyond all peradventure of doubt would have tended to convict him of perjury. It would have been a direct answer. How could the trial judge possibly find that no direct answer could tend to criminate him? This is an example of what Chief Justice Marshall had in mind when he said:

"If the question be of such a description that an answer to it may or may not criminate the witness, according to the purport of that answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it would be, to answer the question or not." And likewise

It cannot be gainsaid that if the witness here had answered the interrogatories asking whether he gave the answers claimed to have been given by him in the deposition he would, if he was in fact liable to prosecution for perjury, have forged one of the links in the chain of evidence necessary to convict him. The view we entertain makes it unnecessary to discuss the question whether answers to the interrogatories would also have had a tendency to criminate the witness of the crime of embezzlement in connection with the affairs of the Julian Petroleum Corporation. It is but just to say that there was some evidence introduced indicating a desire on the part of the witness to protect certain defendants in the action. He testified, however, that that was not the reason he refused to testify. Additionally, it should be noted that wherever the fraud of the witness is assigned as a reason why the witness may be compelled to break his silence it is connected with a statement to the effect "that the answer cannot possibly have the tendency" to criminate him. In other words, where the answer does have the tendency to criminate, it can make no difference what other purpose his silence serves. This is the substance of the decision in People v. Forbes, supra.

Petitioner is discharged.

Victor L. Jacobsen was admitted to practice before all of the courts of this state by an order made on June 14, 1926. This is a petition for the revocation of that order. The affidavit of Jacobsen supporting his application for admission contained the following language: "That so far as affiant is aware, no charges of unprofessional conduct or proceedings for disbarment have been filed against affiant before any bar association, court or other body." It is now made to appear, however, that this statement was false; that prior to the application the applicant had been disbarred by the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county, state of Ohio, and that the judgment had been reversed by the Court of Appeals of the Eighth District of that state; that, in addition thereto, other charges had been preferred against him before the Cleveland Bar Association; and that he had appeared before the grievance committee of that body to answer to the charges.

We see no merit in the uncorroborated claim of respondent that he told one of his sponsors before his application for admission here the full details of the complaint, which resulted first in a judgment of disbarment, later reversed by the Court of Appeals, and was by him advised that it was unnecessary to mention the fact. The language of the affidavit is clear, explicit, and comprehensive. Candor and honesty dictated that the facts be set forth. These virtues in the members of the profession have ranked as indispensable for several centuries, and are essential to him who would fulfill his primary duty, that of aiding in the administration of justice. Not only are they time-honored, but their possession is a universal requirement in all enlightened countries. It is impossible, therefore, for a lawyer to shield himself from the consequences of untruthful and false statements

Attorney and client ☞ 40 — Disbarment — Admission to bar — False affidavit.

False statement in attorney's affidavit for admission to bar that no disbarment proceedings had been filed against him warranted revocation of license.

The evidence disclosed that the respondent had been disbarred by the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county, Ohio, and that judgment had been reversed by the Court of Appeals in that state, and that, in addition, other charges had been preferred against respondent before the Cleveland Bar Association. Respondent's affidavit for admission to the bar stated that no such proceedings had been filed against him "before any bar association, court, or other body." The respondent by placing the burden upon another's shoulders. The same response must be made to his claim that he does not remember receiving notice of the hearing upon the other charges before the grievance committee of the Cleveland Bar Association. It is evident that he appeared there and attempted to defend himself. His statement that he thought the charges related to a man named Laudato, who was known to him not to be a lawyer, is too flimsy to merit any consideration, except that it does indicate the insincerity with which he has dealt and apparently hopes to continue to deal with this and other tribunals of justice. We have no hesitancy in applying the words of this court in Re Lasley, 61 Cal. App. 59, 214 P. 284, 285, as follows: "Regardless of whether the charges against him were well or ill founded, it was his duty to report them to this court and to the board of bar examiners, and to set forth in his affidavit a truthful statement of all facts in order that his previous record might be carefully delved into by those charged with that responsibility"—to the facts here.

The order admitting Victor L. Jacobsen to practice law is set aside, and his license revoked.

LESTER et ux. v. SUPERIOR COURT, TULARE COUNTY, et al.

Civ. 308.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

April 15, 1930.

I. Exceptions, bill of $\S$ 48 — Notice — Presentation for settlement.

Party moving to settle bill of exceptions held not required to give notice thereof, where both bill of exceptions and amendments were filed with clerk within ten days allowed by statute (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 650).

Petition for writ of mandamus by H. D. Lester and wife against the Superior Court, Tulare County, and another to compel respondents to settle a bill of exceptions.

Writ granted.

C. W. Braswell, of Long Beach, for petitioners.

Power, McFadzean & Crowe, of Visalia, and James R. McBride, of Lindsay, for respondents.

BARNARD, Acting P. J.

This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondents to settle a bill of exceptions.

The petitioners were defendants in a certain action pending in said superior court. They appealed from an order made and entered in said action striking out their answer and counterclaim and refusing permission to file an amended answer and counterclaim. The said defendants prepared a bill of exceptions and served the same on the attorney for the plaintiffs by mail on December 6, 1929, and filed the same with the clerk of said court on December 9, 1929. On December 11, 1929, the plaintiffs served upon the attorney for defendants certain proposed amendments to said bill of exceptions, and filed the same with the clerk of said court on December 12, 1929. On December 23, 1929, the attorney for defendants served upon the attorney for plaintiffs a notice that the proposed bill of exceptions, with the amendments thereto, would be presented to the judge for settlement on January 6, 1930, at 10 o'clock a. m. When the matter came up for hearing, the plaintiffs objected to the settlement of such proposed bill of exceptions on the ground that the same was not presented to the judge of said court for settlement until after the expiration of the time fixed by law for said presentation. This objection was sustained, and the settlement of the bill of exceptions was refused. Thereupon this proceeding was instituted.

The respondents rely upon the cases of Witter v. Andrews, 122 Cal. 1, 54 P. 276, and Moultrie v. Tarpio, 147 Cal. 376, 81 P. 1112. In the first of these cases there is involved the question of notice, where the bill in question was presented directly to the judge. In the other case the proposed bill of exceptions was neither presented to the judge nor to the clerk within the time allowed. Where, however, the bill of exceptions and the amendments are delivered to the clerk of the court for the judge, no notice on the part of the moving party is required. Mellor v. Crouch, 76 Cal. 594, 18 P. 685; Curtin v. Ingle, 155 Cal. 53, 99 P. 480. Section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the adverse party may propose amendments to a bill of exceptions within ten days after the service of such bill upon him. It then provides: "The proposed bill and amendments must, within ten days thereafter be presented by the party seeking the settlement of the bill, to the judge who tried or heard the case, upon five days' notice to the adverse party, or be delivered to the clerk of the court for the judge." The section then provides that, when they are received by the clerk, he must deliver them to the judge, who must then designate the time at which he will settle the same, and the clerk must immediately notify both parties of such time of settlement. In commenting upon the provisions of this section and also similar provisions of section 659 of the same Code, as they then existed, the court in Mellor v. Crouch, supra, said as follows:

"The obvious purpose of these provisions is that the parties may have notice of the time when the statement will be settled. When the statement and amendments are presented directly to the judge there is no provision for any notice of the time of settlement to be thereafter given by either the judge or clerk; and in such case, therefore, the five days' notice mentioned in section 659 must be given by the party himself. But when the papers are delivered to the clerk for the judge, the purpose of the Code is effected through the requirement that then the judge must designate a time for the settlement, and the clerk must give notice of it. The provision about the five days' notice in section 659 qualifies, we think, only the preceding clause of the sentence, and is not applicable to the case when the statement and amendments are delivered to the clerk for the judge."

Both the bill of exceptions and the amendments were filed with the clerk within the ten days allowed. Having been so filed within the time provided in the statute, it was the duty of the clerk to deliver the same to the judge, of the judge to fix the time for settling the same, and then of the clerk to notify the parties. No notice of the time of settlement was required to be given by the defendants under such circumstances. The notice given by the attorney for defendants that the matter would be presented to the judge on January 6, 1930, was unnecessary. While the trial court was under no obligation to settle the bill of exceptions at that time, it was its duty to fix a time for the settlement of the same. It follows that the order refusing to settle said bill of exceptions upon the ground that the same, and the amendments thereto, were not presented for settlement until after the time fixed by law for said presentation had expired, was erroneously entered. It is the duty of the respondents to designate a time at which said bill of exceptions will be settled, and, after notice given to the parties by the clerk, to proceed to settle the same.

It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed for.

1. Brokers ⇨86(1) — Commission — Action — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence held to support judgment for plaintiff suing to recover broker's commission for sale of land sold by defendants.

The testimony indicated that defendants' listings of the property must have been intended and understood by all parties to have been with plaintiff, that the original contract between seller and purchaser was initiated by plaintiff's employee, and that the purchaser was actually procured by him acting for plaintiff.

2. Appeal and error ⇨916(3), 931(1) — Objections in lower court — Pleadings — Proof — Sufficiency — Presumption.

Doubt respecting sufficiency of pleadings and proof should be resolved against appellant raising question for first time on appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⇨193(5), 209(2) — Objections in lower court — Pleadings — Proof — Sufficiency.

Alleged failure of broker suing for commissions to plead and prove license held not reversible error, where question was raised for first time on appeal (St. 1919, p. 1259, § 20).

Plaintiff apparently attempted to plead compliance with St. 1919, p. 1259, § 20, regulating real estate brokers and providing for licenses, and the action was tried on the theory that the allegations of the complaint were sufficient to comply with the statute.

C. Ray Noll, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NORTON, Justice pro tem.

This is a suit by plaintiff to recover a broker's commission for the sale of certain real property sold by defendants to the American born children of one K. Muto, a native of Japan. In the superior court judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellants make the point that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment, in that there was no evidence that Thomas Munson, who conducted the negotiations upon which plaintiff bases her claim, was actually an agent of or in the employ of plaintiff at the time of these negotiations, nor that the listings of the property for sale made by appellants were made with plaintiff, nor any evidence that either Thomas Munson or plaintiff or any one acting for her actually procured the purchaser to whom appellants sold the property.

[1] The evidence in this case is to some extent conflicting, but, after a careful examination of the testimony, this court has no doubt but that there is ample evidence to sustain the findings of the trial judge in all the particulars complained of by appellants. The testimony and all the circumstances and evidence in the case indicate strongly that the two listings of the property executed by appellants must have been intended and understood by all parties to have been with plaintiff, and that Thomas Munson was acting for her and as her employee. There is likewise sufficient evidence to justify the trial judge in his conclusion that the original contract between seller and purchaser was initiated by plaintiff's employee, and that the purchaser was actually procured by him acting for plaintiff. Due, perhaps, to defective knowledge of the English language on the part of K. Muto, the testimony is not clear and definite as to the status of his relations during the negotiations with his cousin H. Muto, who to some extent appears to have represented him during the transaction. It is apparent, however, from the evidence that H. Muto was, during his association with the transaction, acting with the consent of and for K. Muto, who furnished the funds to purchase the property, and, in the opinion of this court, the conclusion of the trial judge that the plaintiff was the procuring and inducing cause of the sale is fully sustained by the evidence.

Appellant specifies certain rulings of the court in excluding and admitting evidence which are alleged to be error, but in the opinion of this court the contention of appellant in this regard is without merit.

[2, 3] A more serious ground for reversal urged by appellant is the claim that plaintiff failed to allege in her complaint and also failed to prove that she was a duly licensed real estate broker at the time the alleged cause of action arose, as required by section 20 of the Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1259) creating a state real estate department and regulating real estate brokers and salesmen. Plaintiff in her complaint apparently attempted to plead compliance with this act, but her allegations in this regard are criticized by appellants as not being a statement of her status as a real estate broker at the time the cause of action arose. The complaint was verified and no denial of the allegations therein contained in this behalf was made in the answer. At the commencement of the trial plaintiff's attorney stated the licensing of plaintiff in practically the language of the complaint and asserted that it was admitted by the pleadings and further replied in the affirmative to the question of the trial judge as to whether plaintiff was licensed to sell real estate as provided by the statute. Immediately thereafter attorney for appellant moved to dismiss as to one defendant, on the ground that the pleadings set forth no cause of action against her, but made no mention of the alleged defect, which is complained of on this appeal. The point was not made at any subsequent phase of the trial, and, so far as disclosed by the record, is raised for the first time on appeal to this court.

We cannot escape from the conclusion that the action was tried on the theory that the allegations of the complaint were sufficient to comply with the statute and were admitted by the parties to the action. There is no question but that the attorney for plaintiff so believed, and that the trial judge was led to concur in this belief, apparently with the knowledge and acquiescence of defendants' counsel.

In the circumstances, any doubt as to the sufficiency of the pleadings and proof should be resolved against the appellant. Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, at page 272, 200 P. 55; Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 663, 57 P. 572; Collection Service Corp. v. Conlin (Cal. App.) 277 P. 749.

The judgment is affirmed.

Though appellant's showing for relief was not strong and it did not appear that it was very diligent in making application therefor, appellant being a municipality was required to rely entirely upon its officers and agents; the value of the property involved was large, and respondents had suffered no prejudice from the delay in filing the brief.

From a judgment dismissing the application for writ of mandate to compel cancellation of all assessment certificates of sale for delinquent taxes and tax deeds of certain lands in Mono County, the City of Los Angeles appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal, and on motion to be relieved from default.

Motion to dismiss denied, and motion for relief from default granted.

Charles L. Hayes and A. Boyer, Dist. Atty., both of Bridgeport, and Platt & Sanford, of Carson City, Nev., for respondents.

FINCH, P. J.

This is a motion to dismiss the appeal therein on the ground that the appellant has failed to file its opening brief in due time. The appellant has applied to be relieved from such default on the grounds of inadvertence and excusable neglect.

The appeal is from a judgment denying appellant's application for a writ of mandate to compel the cancellation, pursuant to the provisions of section 3804a of the Political Code, of all assessment certificates of sale for delinquent taxes and tax deeds of its lands in Mono county, on the ground that such land is exempt from taxation.

The transcript on appeal was filed in the Supreme Court June 20, 1929. Appellant's time to file its opening brief was extended by stipulation to January 1, 1930. On February 18, 1930, respondents filed notice of motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground stated. Thereafter the cause was transferred to this court, and on March 1 respondents filed notice that they would move for a dismissal of the appeal on March 24 on the ground stated in the first notice. Appellant's opening brief was delivered to the clerk of this court on March 20, and its application to be relieved from its default was filed on the same day.

[1] It appears from the affidavits filed in support of the appellant's application, among other alleged excuses, "that in the year 1929, there was an office system in force in the legal division of the department of water and power whereby attorneys in charge of court cases were notified as to dates of appearances, hearing on appeal, time briefs were due, etc., so that the attorneys would be advised in advance in sufficient time to make their appearances and file briefs"; that a clerk in the legal division of the department of water and power "was required to keep a record of all civil actions * * * and a calendar of appearances, hearing, appeals, brief due dates, etc."; that through oversight and inadvertence such clerk neglected to notify the attorneys for the appellant "that the time in which to file appellant's opening brief * * * would expire January 1, 1930"; that the attorneys for appellant "relied upon said system" and did not know until the notice to dismiss the appeal was served "that the time had elapsed within which to file appellant's opening brief." The affidavits further show that the proceeding involves the title to 11,720 acres of land of the value of $300,000.

[2] It must be conceded that appellant's showing for relief is not strong and that it was not very diligent in making application therefor. On the other hand, it may be said that the appellant, being a municipality, must rely entirely upon its officers and agents; that the value of the property involved is large; and that it is apparent that the respondents have suffered no prejudice from the delay. "It is the policy of the law to favor, wherever possible, a hearing on the merits." Waybright v. Anderson, 200 Cal. 374, 377, 253 P. 148, 149. "Generally lawyers who are actively engaged in professional duties adopt a system or plan by which their manifold duties may be directed to their attention, and they become so accustomed to the functioning of the system that, when a break in the chain occurs, they should not be held to the same strict accountability as though the habit of reliance upon the system had not been formed." H. G. B. Alexander & Co. v. Martz, 90 Cal. App. 360, 361, 265 P. 881, 882. Reliance upon some such system is manifestly necessary in the legal department of a great city. The following additional cases illustrate the liberality exercised by the courts in relieving parties from their defaults where relief can be granted without injustice to other parties: Gorman v. California Transit Co., 199 Cal. 246, 248 P. 923; Haviland v. Southern California Edison Co., 172 Cal. 601, 158 P. 328; Marde-sich v. City of Los Angeles (Cal. App.) 279 P. 810; Yolo W. & P. Co. v. Edmands, 45 Cal. App. 410, 187 P. 755; Borgmeyer v. Solomon, 39 Cal. App. 106, 178 P. 544; Pacific Power Co. v. State, 31 Cal. App. 719, 162 P. 641; Hagenkamp v. Equitable L. Assurance Soc., 29 Cal. App. 713, 156 P. 520.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the motion for relief from default is granted.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

Petitioners F. M. Shrode, since deceased, and Daniel F. Collett, claiming to be employees of the city of Long Beach, in Los Angeles county, each petitioned the superior court for a writ of mandamus requiring the approval, allowance, and issuance of his warrant for salary. A demurrer to the petition of Shrode was overruled, and after trial on the merits judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants. A like demurrer to the petition of Collett was sustained without leave to amend. Upon the demise of F. M. Shrode, the executrix of his estate was substituted for the purposes of these proceedings. The petitioners appeal from the adverse rulings above mentioned.

In all of the respects pertinent to a discussion of the pleadings each case presents the same questions. It is alleged that the petitioners were employed under and were subject to the provisions of rules and regulations adopted in accordance with the city charter, which were in force and effect at all of the times mentioned. The enabling provisions of the charter, and the material portions of such rules and regulations, are set forth in the petition. The petitioners aver that while so employed they were notified in writing by the city manager that, effective within one day from the date of notice, they would be "laid off," "out of your order of seniority," "for the good of the service." Within three days thereafter, Shrode "made application for an appeal from the aforesaid order or notice." Previously to such notification, Collett, having been advised by an assistant to the city manager that his services would be terminated about one year later, and being informed by said official that such decision was final, made application for an appeal; but it is not alleged that he sought an appeal from the order laying him off. Each employee requested that he be presented with specific reasons or grounds for the action taken, and that he be afforded a hearing thereon. Neither a hearing nor an appeal was permitted in either instance. Thereafter petitioners presented themselves as ready, able, and willing to perform their former duties, but were not reinstated. Their warrants for compensation during the succeeding months were rejected, whereupon they petitioned the superior court for mandatory relief, as already stated.

It is contended by petitioners that "each and all of the aforesaid acts and conduct * * * were had without sufficient reasons being specifically stated in writing for such suspension, discharge and reduction in rank and/or compensation; that said plaintiff * * * was denied an opportunity to be heard on appeal, * * * was denied a trial and hearing before such civil service board under the rules and regulations of such board and the provisions of the city charter of said city." Various provisions of the city charter and of the rules and regulations of said municipality are pleaded, among which are the following:

Rule XIV: "Sec. 2. Whenever, for lack of work or lack of funds or other necessary cause, it becomes necessary in any department to reduce the force in any employment within the civil service, the employee last certified for employment in such classification, who has been accepted, shall be laid off first; providing that the good of the public service shall at all times be considered and the board shall have power to waive this provision. Where individual rights conflict with public rights it is understood that the former must give way."

Section 106 of the city charter: "No employee in the classified service shall be discharged or reduced in rank or compensation until he has been presented with reasons for such discharge or reduction in rank or compensation specifically stated in writing; and has been given an opportunity to be heard before the board in his own defense."

Section 107 of the city charter: "Any employee of any department in the city in the classified service who is suspended, reduced in rank, or dismissed from a department by the head of that department or the city manager may appeal from the decision of such officer to the civil service board. * * *

[1, 2] There are further allegations of fact and of legislative enactment, but from the foregoing it is apparent that their recital could serve no purpose of the petitioners. It is obvious that their recital of the charter and rules by which respondents are governed do not specially enjoin the performance of an act, or entitle the petitioners to the use or enjoyment of a right from which they are precluded, when construed in the light of admitted circumstances and conditions. Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. It nowhere appears that they performed any service for which the demanded compensation is due them, nor is it denied that the municipal departments to which they are attached were invested with discretionary powers as recited in section 2 of rule XIV. It does not lie within the province of a judicial tribunal to say as a matter of law that such discretion was in this instance abused, nor is it attempted to be asserted that the authority conferred by said charter or rules was unjust or oppressive, or that it was discriminatory as to the petitioners. The only argument or citation of legal persuasion anywhere offered in their briefs relate solely to the procedure available to officers or employees, discharged, suspended, or reduced in rank or compensation, without cause or without an opportunity to be heard upon specified charges. In the instant case the petitioners were laid off for the good of the service, out of their order of seniority, and for aught that we may decide, as a necessary reduction of the force under circumstances wherein public rights prevailed as against individual preference. No provision of any rule or statute to which our attention is directed brings an employee who may have been laid off under the express authority of section 2, rule XIV, within the purview of sections 106 and 107 of the city charter. Collett requested that charges be filed, and that he have a hearing thereon, and demanded that he be afforded an appeal, before he was notified that his department would lay him off. He had neither been laid off nor discharged when he sought to invoke this jurisdiction of the municipal board or council. Shrode merely demanded the filing of specific charges, a hearing, and an appeal within three days after receipt of the order laying him off. The intent and purpose of these orders were properly expressed by the board in response to Collett's request by a communication which stated, "Your appeal is not properly before us, for the reason that you are still in the employ of the city." It results that no grounds for mandatory relief are presented by either petition.

The order sustaining the demurrer to the petition of Daniel F. Collett, and the judgment, are affirmed; and the judgment entered against J. Evelyn Hayes, as executrix of the estate of F. M. Shrode, deceased, is affirmed.

Property settlement alleged as defense to claim for alimony held merely partial payment of existing indebtedness, wife receiving no consideration.

OWEN, Justice pro tem.

This action was originally appealed to the Supreme Court, and, by appropriate order, transferred by that court to this court for decision, and is an action instituted by the plaintiff against her husband for a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint, and set up a property settlement as a defense to plaintiff's prayer for support for herself and two minor children.

The sufficiency of the proof adduced on the trial as to cruelty, and the wife's right to all, or any part, of the sum of $50 per month awarded by the court, are the only questions involved in this appeal.

[1] No appellate court may gauge or measure the degree of susceptibility of a party in a divorce proceeding to a course of cruel conduct on the part of the other spouse. That which may be infinitely cruel to a person of intelligence, delicacy of sentiment, and innate refinement may not be cruel to a person lacking in these estimable qualities. The trial judge, sounding his judgment on the conduct of the parties, their apparent manner of living, the degree of their refinement, and the scope of their intelligence is in a position to determine if a given course of conduct by one party will result in extreme cruelty to the other. A reading of the transcript herein shows that the defendant's conduct would be extreme cruelty to a woman of refinement and delicacy of feeling. The trial judge had the plaintiff before him. His judgment as to her susceptibility to extreme cruelty will not be disturbed. Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 P. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660.

[2] The property settlement set up as a defense to the wife's claim for alimony is dated July 24, 1923. Subsequent to that date the parties lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, and the two children were born to them. No immediate separation was had, and the contract so entered into may not alter the legal relations of the parties. Civ. Code, § 159. Notwithstanding this fact, it appears from an examination of the so-called property settlement that it was nothing but a compromise, whereby the defendant paid his wife and mother-in-law the sum of $3,000 to avoid a suit for about $8,000 due them on promissory notes and other indebtedness. It was also in evidence that he threatened to go into bankruptcy if they did not execute the agreement. After thus settling his debt for about 40 cents on the dollar, and after bringing two children into the world as the husband of the plaintiff, he appeals from the judgment of the lower court awarding the mother and children $50 per month as support.

There was no property settlement between the parties. The defendant merely paid the plaintiff and her mother what he owed them, discounting the same 60 per cent. Settling a prior obligation with no consequent benefit to one of the parties cannot be held to be a property settlement. So far as the plaintiff was concerned, there was no consideration for the agreement. Stroud v. Thomas, 139 Cal. 274, 72 P. 1008, 96 Am. St. Rep. 111.

The judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC FINANCE CORPORATION v. McGOWAN.

McGOWAN v. PACIFIC FINANCE CORPORATION et al.

Civ. 5847.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

April 14, 1930.

1. Sales — Caveat emptor rule — Applicability — Seller's false statements.

Rule of caveat emptor is inapplicable where seller knowingly makes false statements, falsity of which is not known to purchaser.

2. Evidence — Parol evidence — False representations — Written contract.

Seller's false representations may be proven by parol evidence, notwithstanding that there was written sale contract, since writing may be impeached for fraud.

3. Sales — Rescission — False representations — Intent.

Where buyer relies on seller's false representations, deliberate intent to defraud is not requisite to rescission (Civ. Code, § 1572).

4. Sales — Rescission — False representations — Automobile — Model — Estoppel.

Buyer of used automobile held not estopped to claim rescission for false representations respecting model because space in contract for year model was left blank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Actions by the Pacific Finance Corporation against Major D. McGowan, and by Major D. McGowan against the Pacific Finance Corporation and another, were consolidated. From judgment in favor of McGowan, Pacific Finance Corporation and another appeal.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The plaintiff and appellant Pacific Finance Corporation, having instituted an action in replevin against the respondent McGowan for possession of an automobile, the latter joined issue therein, and commenced an action for rescission of a contract of conditional sale under which he acquired the same, naming said corporation and appellant Western Motors Company as defendants. The cases were consolidated, and after trial judgment was rendered rescinding the contract, and awarding to the plaintiff in the second action all moneys alleged to have been paid by him thereunder. Both companies appealed.

Certain of the findings of fact are uncontroverted. It appears that on August 17, 1922, respondent, accompanied by his son, Dorrell McGowan, were shown a Mercer automobile at the sales rooms of Western Motors Company, which he agreed to purchase, and for which he paid on account the sum of $75 in cash, and gave a Buick car for which he was allowed a credit of $400. He signed an order designated "Customer's Deposit Receipt," which described the machine as "one used Mercer automobile, touring 4 Pass.," and recited the price as $1,000, from which were deducted the above credits, and "Leaving balance due and unpaid $525.00/xx Terms P. F. C. 12 mo." Thereafter, on the same date, the parties executed a contract which provided, in part, as follows:

"The seller agrees to sell and the purchaser hereby agrees to buy the following described personal property, to wit:

— Mercer	4-Pass. Tour	2295
Serial No.	State License No.	New or Used No. of Cyls.
397794	Used	4

for the sum of $1,137.52, gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard, payable as follows: $475 upon the signing of this contract, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the balance of $662.52 as follows: (specifying twelve monthly payments of $55.21 each) together with such other sums as are hereinafter provided for, it being understood and agreed that the purchase price of the said personal property as above set forth includes interest on the deferred balance to the maturity of each payment thereof, time sale and other charges, if any.

"All deferred payments to bear interest from date of maturity at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable monthly, and if the interest is not so paid it shall be added to and become a part of the principal, and thereafter bear the same rate of interest."

On the same date the vendor Western Motors Company sold and transferred to appellant Pacific Finance Corporation all its right and interest in the contract. On September 17 an installment of $55.21 was paid, but none was paid during the month of October. After the third installment became due, respondent tendered $110.42, which was declined except upon condition that he also pay about $80, as expenditures incurred in maintaining the replevin suit, which was then pending. Allegations of fraud and usury were on motion of the plaintiff stricken from the answer of respondent in that proceeding. In his complaint praying a rescission of the contract, it was alleged that the Mercer car was of an older model, and of less value, than it had been represented by the seller, and that whereas it had been stated and the plaintiff had agreed that he should pay about 12 per cent. interest upon deferred installments, the rate specified in the contract amounted to more than 20 per cent. per annum; that said representations were false and fraudulent, were made for the purpose of inducing the execution of the contract; that he relied upon and innocently accepted them as true, and would not otherwise have signed the instrument in controversy. Each of these allegations was denied by appellants, and it is here contended that there was no evidence before the trial court which justified the conclusion at which it arrived.

Although the evidence is conflicting, there is evidence tending to support the allegations as to the character of car which was exhibited and which respondent was informed he was getting, and as to that which he actually received. It is not denied that he was uninformed as to models, mechanism, or values of automobiles, and was unable to operate one; that he was accompanied by his son who did the driving; and that both made inquiries of the agents of appellant Western Motors Company. They both testified that after protracted watching of the advertisements in newspapers, they visited the company's establishment in response to a list displayed in various publications which included a "1917 Mercer, 4 Pass. with extra equipment, $1000," for which they asked; that they had previously been offered a Mercer car of 1916 model for $900; and that so stating they endeavored to obtain a reduction in appellant's price, without success. Respondent testified that he "then told them distinctly and repeatedly that we were giving them a hundred dollars more because their car was a 1917 car which we preferred to the 1916"; further, that "Mr. Rogers first and Mr. Nichols afterwards, told us it was a 1917 Mercer"; "I would not know anything about the car if he told me everything there was to tell about it. I am absolutely ignorant on the matter of automobiles"; and in answer to the question, "You observed, then, that the column headed 'Model—year' and the column headed 'Serial Number' (in the contract) were both left blank?" he replied: "I did not." The son also testified: "Mr. Nichols said in comparison of the two cars that naturally the 1917 would be better than the 1916. * * * I wanted to buy an axle from them, but it was a 1917 axle and it would not fit my model"; that a mechanic informed him "it was a 1915 and not a 1917, the first time I took the car in there," about four months after the purchase. Said mechanic testified: "I was to sell some parts for the car, and the part they asked for would not fit in that car. * * * That was a 1915 automobile by the Mercer factory"; and that the 1917 model was of greater value than that of 1915. The positive refutation or defective memory of appellants' witnesses of any conversation or even mention of the year model is remarkable. In the order slip and contract, respectively, prepared by this appellant for respondent's signature, it was merely described as "one used Mercer automobile," and as "—— Mercer 4-Pass. Tour 2295 Serial No. ——." Yet appellant Pacific Finance Corporation reported and registered the machine as "Year Model 1917," "Model 22-72 Year Model 17." From the foregoing it is obvious that the respondent was led to believe that the 1915 car was manufactured in 1917. The difference between the order and the final contract as to price of the machine was also attributed by the parties to causes the legitimacy of which is disputed. As heretofore quoted, it appears in the former as $1,000, and in the latter as $1,137.52. Reduced to its final analysis during the trial it appears that the amount contested was ultimately found to be about $30, which appellants contended consisted of necessary incidental charges, whereas the respondent insisted it amounted to an illegal interest exaction. It is nowhere asserted, however, that respondent was informed that this item would be included, and the court found that the seller had misrepresented to him in this respect.

[1, 2] Appellants attack the judgment upon the ground that there was an absence of actual fraud, and that respondent so relied upon the judgment of others as to have waived any latent defect. This latter argument is founded upon the fact that the car was demonstrated prior to its purchase, and that it operated properly. Complaint is not made, however, that it would not run, but the grounds alleged for rescission were that it was much older, and of much less value, than as stated by the seller, and that its cost was then even added to after the price had been agreed upon. The issue presented here arose in Ferguson v. Koch, 204 Cal. 342, 268 P. 342, 344, 58 A. L. R. 1176, and various points urged by appellants in the instant case are so aptly discussed and decided, that we need but quote therefrom:

"The general rule is well established that, where parties deal fairly or at arm's length, the rule of caveat emptor applies, but, where honest dealing is departed from by the vendor making false statements as of his own knowledge, the falsity of which is not known to the purchaser, such purchaser has the undoubted right to rely implicitly upon such statements, and the principle has no application. In other words, the vendor must stand mute, or at least refrain from making statements calculated to deceive.

"* * * The evidence shows that the vendee was not familiar with the different types of motors in use in Reo cars, but had merely heard that those used in the speed wagon type of auto were very good machines. The mere circumstance, therefore, that the vendee made an independent investigation of the truck does not necessarily show that he relied on his own judgment rather than upon the representations of the other party, nor does it give rise to the presumption of law to that effect. A purchaser has a right to rely on the representations of his vendor as to facts not within his knowledge, and the vendor cannot escape responsibility by showing that the purchaser might have ascertained upon inquiry that the representations were untrue. Sullivan v. Helbing, 66 Cal. App. 478, 226 P. 803; Whiting v. Squeglia, 70 Cal. App. 108, 232 P. 986. The trial court having found that the false representations were made, and there being ample evidence in the record to support the conclusion, the judgment must stand unless it can be said that the evidence concerning the false misrepresentations was improperly received.

"This brings us to the question whether or not parol evidence is proper to prove false representations where there is a written contract of sale. The rule is, of course, well settled that, where the parties have reduced to writing what appears to be a complete and certain agreement, it will, in the absence of fraud, be conclusively presumed that the writing contains the whole of the agreement between the parties, and that it is a complete memorial of the same, and parol evidence of prior, contemporaneous or subsequent conversations or representations or statements will not be received for the purpose of adding to or varying the written instrument. * * * It is equally well settled, however, that a writing may be impeached for fraud, and a parol warranty really made may then be relied upon rather than the written one thus shown to be fraudulently imperfect or defective. * * * Appellant has cited us to certain earlier cases in our reports which he claims make a distinction between fraudulent representations going to induce the making of a contract and representations in the nature of warranties. There is no reason why any such distinctions should exist, and, in fact, none does exist."

[3] In the cited case it appeared that the purchaser had been assured that the motor of the automobile in question was of a type used in 1925 machines; that the machine was demonstrated, and apparently satisfactory, but that later discovery that the motor in the car was a 1917 model furnished ground for rescission of the contract in an action by the vendor thereon after default in the payment of installments. That actual intent to defraud is not requisite to rescission in such cases has repeatedly been decided. In Scott v. Delta Land Co., 57 Cal. App. 320, 207 P. 389, 392, it was said: "In a civil action the good faith of the party who procures the assent of another to the making of a contract by material misrepresentations is of no moment. 'Many courts lay down the rule that the misrepresentation * * * is considered to be constructively fraudulent because of its effect of imposing upon and deceiving the person to whom it is made.' 12 R. C. L. p. 343, par. 98. The rule of the criminal law requiring proof of a specific intent to defraud in false pretense cases does not apply to civil actions."

Other decisions applying these familiar rules in recent cases are: American Soda Fountain Co. v. Martin (Cal. App.) 279 P. 680; Pashley v. Wukejevich (Cal. App.) 285 P. 910. Grounds for civil relief are embraced within the provisions of section 1572 of the Civil Code; that is to say: "The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true," or "the positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true."

It follows that whether the seller's agents disbelieved or were otherwise unwarranted in making the representations becomes immaterial, since deliberate intent to defraud is not indispensable to rescission. And, in view of considerable substantial evidence that the representations were made, we are not authorized to say that the trial court was not justified in concluding that material facts were suggested or positively asserted which, within the contemplation of said section, affected the validity of the transaction.

[4] It is urged that respondent is estopped to defend upon these grounds for the reason that the year model having been left blank he was put upon his inquiry, and that he did in fact learn of the defect in September, when the installment was paid for that month. However, he positively testified that he implicitly relied upon the seller in this respect after having made diligent inquiry, that the latter discouraged his reading the contract stating that he would forget the first part by the time he had read toward the last, and that he did not notice the omission. Respondent also swore positively that he did not learn that it was a 1915 model until December, or nearly four months after the sale, when informed of the pendency of the claim and delivery action, and within but a few days prior to serving notice of rescission. Here again the trial court may well have deemed the omission of significance and as indicating an intentional attempt to obscure the facts rather than as a warning of necessity for inquiry. It was warranted in believing any substantial evidence tending to sustain the findings rendered. Meyer v. Meyer, 82 Cal. App. 313, 255 P. 767.

From what has been said it becomes unnecessary to discuss at length other points urged by the parties, and particularly respondent's challenge of the validity of the contract under the finding that excessive interest was being added to deferred payments. By complete rescission the judgment restores them as nearly as may be to their former status. St. 1919, p. lxxxiii, § 2; Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Forceful entry and detainer § 4 — "Forceful entry" — Breaking locks.

Breaking of locks by landlord is sufficient to constitute "forceful entry."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Forceful Entry," see Words and Phrases.]

Tenant lawfully in possession of premises who is evicted from them may recover damages.

3. Landlord and tenant § 277(2) — Tenant's default — Statutory notice.

Under statute, tenant was entitled to three days' notice within which to comply with terms of lease, and landlord had no right to possession without such notice (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161).

4. Landlord and tenant § 180(3) — Action for eviction — Complaint.

Complaint alleging tenant was in possession of premises, that certain acts of landlord deprived him of rents, issues, and profits of premises, and praying for damages, disclosed action for damages for eviction.

5. Landlord and tenant § 180(3) — Action for eviction — Nonjoinder of plaintiffs.

In action for eviction, landlord could not raise question that there was nonjoinder of plaintiffs because original lessees were plaintiff and another, where evidence showed landlord knew the other lessee had gone away.

6. Landlord and tenant § 180(3) — Action for eviction — Pleadings — Evidence admissible.

In action for eviction, evidence that landlord threw away seeds and turned loose horses held inadmissible under pleadings.

The complaint alleged that landlord's acts deprived tenant of rents, issues, and profits of premises.

Action by George K. Saferian against A. L. Baer for damages for eviction. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

BARNARD, J.

This is an action by a tenant for damages for an eviction by his landlord.

The evidence shows that a written lease, covering a small farm, was entered into between the defendant, as lessor, and the plaintiff and one Costic Stomatou, as lessees, for the term of three years commencing on April 15, 1924, and ending on April 15, 1927, at an annual rental of $300, payable $150 on April 15 and $150 on October 15 of each year. The lessees took possession of the property, and about two months later the said Costic Stomatou became sick and left, whereupon the plaintiff continued to live upon and farm the property. On October 15, 1926, the defendant entered into a new lease with the plaintiff, covering the same property; said lease being for a period of five years, commencing with April 15, 1927. This lease provided for the same annual rental as the first lease, and acknowledged receipt of $150 cash upon its execution and delivery. There was added to the second lease the following clause: "The second party owes to first party $50.00 additional, and agrees to pay in sixty days." There was evidence that this $50 was the balance of the rental on the lease first referred to. The $50 was not paid within sixty days, and on the 14th day of February, 1927, at 5 o'clock p. m., in the business district of Fresno, the defendant handed the plaintiff a written notice, to the effect that the plaintiff was in default under both of said leases, in that he had failed to keep the buildings and fences in good repair, and had failed to pay the $50 above mentioned. The notice further stated that the defendant "does hereby and now, avail himself of his option to terminate said lease, and to oust and eject any and all persons therefrom, and he does hereby and now, avail himself of said option to terminate said lease and does hereby and now, demand of you the immediate possession of said premises." No three-day notice or alternative demand that he comply with the terms of the lease or vacate the premises was contained in this notice. Upon returning to the premises, shortly after receiving the notice, the plaintiff found the defendant in possession thereof. The defendant had broken the lock on the gate and the lock on the door of the house, had removed plaintiff's personal property from the house, turned his horses loose, and thrown away a quantity of seed. Defendant informed plaintiff that he would no longer be allowed on the place. The plaintiff handed $50 to his lawyer for the purpose of paying the balance on the old rent and sent his lawyer to see the defendant. The defendant told the lawyer that he would have no more dealings with the plaintiff.

The complaint in this action sets forth that on or about the 12th of February, 1927, the plaintiff was in the peaceful and actual possession of the property in question; that said possession had been obtained by written lease from the defendant, dated October 15, 1926; that on or about February 12, 1927, while the plaintiff was so in possession of said premises, the defendant forcibly entered thereon and in a forcible manner ejected the plaintiff, breaking locks on the gates and on the doors of the residence; that the defendant has unlawfully withheld the possession of said premises from the plaintiff since that date, and the plaintiff alleges that he has been damaged in the sum of $10,000, and the prayer is for a judgment for that amount, for the unlawful entry and detainer of said premises. The answer, in addition to denying the matters set up in the complaint, alleges as a special defense that the plaintiff was in default in the payment of $50, above referred to, and that he had failed to keep the buildings, fences, and other improvements in a good state of repair, and there is included a cross-complaint for $1,000 for damages alleged to have been suffered in connection with said fences and buildings. The case was tried without a jury, and from a judgment for $500, in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant has appealed.

[1, 2] The appellant contends that the respondent has not proceeded under the forcible entry or unlawful detainer act, as outlined in section 1159 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and succeeding sections; that procedure under that act was the exclusive remedy of respondent; and that under the law an owner cannot be held liable for damages for dispossessing a tenant, except as incidental to proceedings on the part of the tenant for restitution of the premises. Appellant, in support of this contention, relies upon the cases of Canavan v. Gray, 64 Cal. 5, 27 P. 788; Burnham v. Stone, 101 Cal. 164, 35 P. 627, and Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 94 P. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61. These cases hold that where a person who is wrongfully in possession is dispossessed by the owner of the property, having the right of entry, and where no excessive force is used by the owner, the only remedy of such person so dispossessed, under these code provisions, is to seek restitution of the property, and in such a case the court has the right to allow damages. These cases, however, have no application to a situation where a tenant who is rightfully in possession, is forcibly evicted by the owner. The breaking of locks is sufficient to constitute a forcible entry. Rutledge v. Barger, 82 Cal. App. 356, 255 P. 537. Where a tenant who is lawfully in possession of the premises is evicted from them, he may recover damages. Klein v. Lewis, 41 Cal. App. 463, 182 P. 789. Even a constructive eviction is sufficient. Riechhold v. Sommarstrom Invest. Co., 83 Cal. App. 173, 256 P. 592. The circumstances in the instant case show not merely a constructive eviction, but an actual ouster. And the eviction was preceded by a forcible entry.

[3] For the purposes of this appeal it must be taken that the plaintiff was rightfully in possession. The defendant alleges that the buildings and fences had been allowed to depreciate, contrary to the terms of the lease, but the court found to the contrary. There was $50 of the rental provided for in the first lease unpaid, but the time for its payment had been once extended. It would seem that any right of forfeiture had been waived by appellant, at least until the giving of notice. In any event, under section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the respondent was entitled to three days' notice, within which he had the right to comply with any terms of the lease in which he was in default. That respondent would have availed himself of such an opportunity, if such had been given, is indicated by the fact that when appellant served such notice as he did serve, the respondent promptly attempted to get the $50 to him. And without such notice the appellant had no right of entry for the purpose of taking possession.

[4] At the trial one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, who stated he had lately come into the case, made this statement: "This is a case brought under section 1159—forcible entry." Just what this attorney had in mind does not appear, but his statement does not control the nature of this action. The complaint does not ask for restitution of the premises. It alleges that the plaintiff was in the peaceful and actual possession of the premises; that certain acts of the landlord had deprived him of the rents, issues, and profits of the premises; alleges damages; and the prayer is for damages. We think the action is one for damages for eviction.

[5] Appellant contends that this action cannot be maintained, for the reason that the original lessees were respondent and another, and that there is a nonjoinder of plaintiffs. There was evidence that about two months after the first lease was executed, and after respondent had begun to work the place according to the lease, the other lessee became sick and went away, and that the respondent took over the obligation to take care of the place. The respondent was in actual possession of the property during the seasons of 1924, 1925, and 1926. It is not questioned that he paid all of the rent, except the last $50. Appellant renewed the lease for five years in the name of respondent alone. When appellant desired to take the place back, the notice he served referred to both leases, but was addressed to the respondent alone, and served upon him. In speaking of another man, who was going to help the respondent in paying his rent, the appellant testified: "He disappeared like the first man that rented from me in 1924. He disappeared and I have never seen him any more." We think sufficient knowledge on the part of appellant is shown, with his later dealings with respondent, to prevent appellant from successfully raising that point. A further consideration is that this action is one for damages suffered by the respondent personally, through losing the enjoyment of the profits of the place for the ensuing five years under his own lease.

[6, 7] Appellant also assigns as error the introduction of evidence as to the value of certain personal property destroyed by appellant, when he took possession of the premises in question. Respondent was allowed to testify that appellant threw away about fifty pounds of Turkish melon seeds, worth about $3 a pound, and ten pounds of other seeds worth about $1 a pound. Also, that he spent $34 in searching for and locating horses turned loose by the appellant. An eviction entitled a tenant to recover any damages he may have sustained. Hamer v. Ellis, 40 Cal. App. 57, 180 P. 30. Under the pleadings of the instant case, however, respondent was limited to such damages as he suffered by being deprived of the rents, issues, and profits of the premises in question. The evidence in question should not have been admitted. We think, however, that this does not require a reversal. The last lease itself provided that after three years the lessor had the right to cancel the lease upon the payment of $300 to the lessee. This is some evidence of the value of the use of the property for that portion of the time. Appellant had also received $100 in advance on this lease, above the balance of rental due him, and for which nothing had been received by the respondent when the eviction took place. There was other evidence that the rental value of the property in question varied from nothing to $25 an acre per year. There is ample evidence to sustain the finding of the court as to the amount of damage.

[8] Objection is made to the findings of the court on the ground that they are not supported by the complaint or by the evidence. The principal objection is that one of the findings is to the effect that the respondent was in possession under the lease of April 9, 1924, whereas the complaint stated that he was in possession under the lease of October 15, 1926. The material part of the allegation is that he was in the peaceful and actual possession of the property. The finding to that effect is amply supported.

[9] Again, the court found "that all of the allegations of defendant's answer and cross-complaint are not true." It is claimed that the allegation in the cross-complaint that respondent had failed to pay the last $50 of rental on the first lease was true. This was immaterial, since the plaintiff was entitled to recover, regardless of whether or not he had failed to pay the $50 in question. A similar contention that there is no evidence to support the finding that respondent made demand for possession of the premises is without merit for the reason that no demand was necessary where respondent elected to sue for damages for eviction, rather than pursue his remedy for restitution of the premises.

The complaint, the evidence, and the findings are sufficient to support a judgment for damages under the circumstances. It appears that appellant took the law into his own hands in place of pursuing his legal remedy. He was satisfied to renew the lease for five years after an experience of nearly three-years with respondent; he extended the remainder of the last payment under the old lease; and then within four months, without further demand, and with no opportunity to respondent to make good in respect to any claimed default, he suddenly claimed a forfeiture, and by breaking locks, entered and took possession of the premises. The trial court was justified in believing the evidence that there was another and different reason why appellant desired possession of the place.

The judgment is affirmed.

Burr A. Brown, of Long Beach, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The petitioners herein, who are four of several defendants in a civil action pending in the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, were awarded judgment, and the plaintiffs duly served upon respective counsel for each of the defendants a notice of intention to move for a new trial. Thereafter, and on August 12, 1929, plaintiffs' counsel, whose offices were in the city of Long Beach, mailed to counsel for petitioners at their offices in the city of Los Angeles, in the same county, but not less than twenty-five miles distant, notice in writing that said motion would be heard on August 16, 1929, at 9 o'clock a. m. The motion was then submitted upon oral argument and a memorandum of points and authorities, in the absence of petitioners and their counsel, and on August 29, 1929, it was granted. During the following month petitioners moved to set aside the order granting a new trial, which was denied, whereupon the plaintiffs set the case for trial. These petitioning defendants pray a writ of prohibition restraining further proceedings as to them, alleging that the notice of hearing was insufficient and that the trial court is without jurisdiction to again try the issues as to themselves.

The question presented is governed by rule XIX, subdivision 4 (204 Cal., p. lxxvii), and sections 1005 and 1013 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which prior to the amendments of the codes and on the date of mailing provided as follows:

"* * * Upon the filing of the notice of intention to move for a new trial, the clerk forthwith shall call the same to the attention of the judge who presided at the trial of the action or proceeding, or the Presiding Judge, as the case may be, and such judge thereupon shall designate the time at which a hearing will be had on said proposed motion. Five (5) days' notice by mail shall be given thereof by the clerk to the respective parties. * * *

"When a written notice of a motion is necessary, it must be given, if the court is held in the county in which at least one of the attorneys of the party notified has his office, five days before the time appointed for the hearing; otherwise, ten days. When the notice is served by mail, the number of days before the hearing must be increased one day for every twenty-five miles of distance between the place of deposit and the place of service. * * *

"In case of service by mail, the notice or other paper must be deposited in the post-office, in a sealed envelope. * * * The service is complete at the time of the deposit, but if, within a given number of days after such service, a right may be exercised, or an act is to be done by the adverse party, the time within which such right may be exercised or act be done is extended one day for every twenty-five miles distance between the place of deposit and the place of address; such extension, however, not to exceed thirty days in all."

It is to be observed that the five days' notice of hearing upon a motion for new trial must be given before the time appointed, as specified by section 1005 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that said section and section 1013 of the same Code require an additional day for every twenty-five miles distance in such cases.

It is argued on behalf of the respondent that it is "self-evident" that the rule is directory only in providing that the clerk perform this function, and that it was adopted to conform with newly enacted amendments to the Codes soon becoming effective and containing a similar provision. Since the petitioners make no issue as to the mode of service, and in either event at least six days' notice by mail was upon the admitted facts indispensable, the point becomes immaterial. It is further insisted that since section 1005 of the Code of Civil Procedure also provides that in the event of greater distances the time may be increased "not to exceed in all thirty days; but in all cases the court, or a judge thereof, may prescribe a shorter time," the notice as given was sufficient. However, it is not even intimated that the court did shorten the time, and the plain mandates are obviously controlling.

Counsel for the respondent also contend that petitioners had notice of the hearing other than that which was mailed, for the reason that they had received a notice of intention to move for a new trial, and that on the date of the hearing, August 16, 1929, they were furnished a copy of respondent's points and authorities. But the provisions above quoted do not afford an arbitrary or alternative method, nor is our attention directed to any other provision of the law which sanctions a substitution therefor. It follows that the petitioners were not given the legal period of time within which to prepare and present any opposition which they might have had to the motion for a new trial.

The petition for a writ of prohibition is granted, as prayed.

2. Appeal and error ⇨348(1) — Judgment — Notice of entry — Appeal — Time.

Notice of entry of judgment need not be given to start running of time within which appeal from judgment may be taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Action by R. R. Adams, doing business as the Creditors' Adjustment Bureau, against Mathilde P. Bates, administratrix of the estate of Guy A. Bates, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

H. W. Shaw, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Richardson & Scherrer, of Riverside, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

On the 7th day of November, 1929, the court below rendered judgment sustaining respondent's demurrer to appellant's third amended complaint, without leave to amend. On that day judgment was rendered and entered in favor of respondent. No notice of entry of judgment was given to appellant. On February 3, 1930, appellant filed his notice of appeal. Respondent has moved this court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that this notice was not given within sixty days after the entry of judgment. No motion for new trial was made.

[1, 2] Section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an appeal must be taken by filing with the clerk of the court, in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice of appeal within sixty days from the entry of the judgment or order, if no motion for new trial is made. The time for filing the notice of appeal in this case expired on the 28th day of January, 1930, and therefore the notice of appeal given was ineffectual. The Code does not require a notice of entry of judgment to be given to start the running of the time within which an appeal from a judgment may be taken. Schainman v. Kierce, 199 Cal. 249, 248 P. 905; Cook v. Cook (Cal. Sup.) 282 P. 385.

It follows that the appeal must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

1. Master and servant §405(2) — Workmen's Compensation Act — Domestic servant — Evidence.

Undisputed evidence disclosing injuries while returning from purchasing bread for mistress' table held to show employee was domestic servant, not entitled to compensation (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act).

Employee contended that she was assistant manager of bungalow court, and that part of her compensation as such was her board and lodging; that bread which she was on her way to procure was to be used on table where she was to receive her board, and therefore part of compensation for services as assistant manager; and that she was therefore collecting compensation at time of her injury on public street.

Certiorari by Viola L. Douglas, employer, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Julia L. Krummel, employee, for injuries sustained.

Award annulled.

F. Britton McConnell, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

YORK, J.

On petition for writ of review.

This is an application to annul an award in favor of one Julia L. Krummel against Viola L. Douglas, the commission finding, as a basis for its award, that at the time of the injury which Miss Krummel undoubtedly sustained, she was employed by the petitioner, Viola L. Douglas, as assistant manager of a bungalow court, and that both the employer and the employee were subject to the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended).

This application to annul the award is based upon the contention of the said Viola L. Douglas that at the time of the injury which Miss Krummel sustained she was employed by petitioner as a domestic servant, or at least that the labor or work which she was performing at the time of her injury was that of a domestic servant only.

The undisputed evidence discloses the fact that at the time of her injury, which injury was occasioned by an automobile backing into her, the said Julia L. Krummel was proceeding back to the bungalow court after the purchase of some bread to be used on the table of the said Viola L. Douglas.

The commission justifies its award on the ground that the said Julia L. Krummel was the assistant manager of the bungalow court, and that part of her compensation as such assistant manager was her board and lodging; that the bread which she was on her way to procure was bread which was to be used on the table where she was to receive her board, and therefore was part of her compensation for her services as assistant manager of the bungalow court, and that she was therefore collecting her compensation at the time of her injury on the public street.

This is a rather too far-fetched theory that the bread was to be a part or portion of her compensation. She was, as is disclosed by the evidence, also on a personal errand for herself, but was primarily making the trip to purchase bread to be used on her mistress' table, which duty was a part of her household domestic service, and therefore necessarily excluded from the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act. She was not injured while performing some duty in showing empty bungalows to prospective tenants, or in the care of or supervision of the bungalows rented by her employer.

The evidence beyond dispute shows that the only service she was attempting to render for her employer, when she received her injury, was securing bread, and this is necessarily limited to that part or that portion of her employment as a domestic servant only. We do not believe that the fact that she secured a portion of her wages by reason of her board being furnished to her by her employer could possibly by any stretch of the law or the evidence herein justify the commission in finding that she was at the time of her injury performing any service for her employer other than that of a household domestic servant.

The award is therefore annulled.

Motion granted, and appeal dismissed.

A. J. Stebenne, of Redwood City, for appellants.

James T. O'Keefe, of Redwood City, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J.

[1] Motion to dismiss appeal upon the ground that appellant has failed to file his transcript within the time prescribed by law. The action was one brought on a promissory note, and it was filed on March 15, 1928. The case was tried without a jury on September 25, 1928, and was submitted. After its submission the parties entered into negotiations for a settlement, but nothing came of the matter. On April 19, 1929, the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendants in the sum of $500. Notice of appeal was filed May 3, 1929. No attempt was ever made to propose a bill of exceptions or to obtain the preparation of a transcript pursuant to the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure until January 24, 1930, when the transcript was filed herein. It thus appears that a period of more than eight months have elapsed since the notice of appeal was filed and two days after a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was made. Rule I of the court requires that the transcript shall be filed within 40 days after the appeal is perfected; and if the appeal is taken on a bill of exceptions or in pursuance of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, the time for filing the transcript shall begin to run from the date on which the bill of exceptions or transcript is approved and certified as required by law, or from the date the proceeding to obtain the transcript has been terminated in the court below by dismissal or otherwise. Rule V provides in effect that, if the transcript is not filed within the time prescribed by law and is not on file at the time notice of motion to dismiss the appeal is given, the appeal may be dismissed. It is apparent, therefore, that under the rules above mentioned respondent is entitled to have the appeal dismissed, unless it can be said that appellants have made a showing of excusable neglect, legally sufficient to meet the requirements of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] In opposition to the motion to dismiss, a single affidavit has been filed which merely states that, subsequent to the filing of the notice of appeal, negotiations were carried on for a settlement. This statement is flatly contradicted by affidavits filed on behalf of respondents, wherein it is averred that such negotiations were had while the case was under submission in the trial court, but not after judgment rendered. Assuming, however, that the negotiations for a settlement were made after the notice of appeal was filed, as contended for, such fact does not serve legal grounds for the relief sought. Appellants made no effort to obtain a stipulation or order extending the time to file the transcript. The cases uniformly hold that such neglect precludes an applicant from resisting a motion to dismiss the appeal. Shain v. People's Lumber Co., 98 Cal. 122, 32 P. 878; McFadden v. Dietz, 115 Cal. 697, 47 P. 777; Weinmann v. Factor, 63 Cal. App. 592, 219 P. 461; Waugaman v. Richardson, 72 Cal. App. 10, 236 P. 207.

3. Attorney and client ⇨ 89 — Retraxit — Attorney — Authority.

4. Stipulations ⇨ 8 — Attorney of record — Authority — Client.

While there is attorney of record, no stipulation regarding conduct or disposition of action should be entertained, unless signed or assented to by attorney.

5. Judgment ⇨ 460(4) — Vacation — Extrinsic fraud — Amended complaint — Sufficiency.

Amended complaint in action to set aside judgment setting up extrinsic fraud in procuring judgment held sufficient.

Amended complaint alleged, in substance, that plaintiff had never been served with summons and had no knowledge of commencement or pendency of action until bank account was levied upon; that by reason of defendant's action in procuring judgment by means of false and fraudulent representations and return as to service of process known to them to be false when made, and made with intent to obtain judgment by default, judgment sought to be set aside was obtained, and that, by reason of execution levy, plaintiff's credit had been impaired, his health injuriously affected, and his bank deposit seized.

6. Dismissal and nonsuit ⇨ 29 — Extrinsic fraud — Vacation — Several defendants — Dismissal against two — Effect.

Dismissal as to two defendants, though operating as retraxit of cause of action for damages against all, held not to effect cause of action for vacation of judgment obtained by remaining defendant.

Complaint improperly joined cause of action in equity to vacate judgment, and one for damages against three defendants as joint tort-feasors. Cause of action for damages was dismissed as to two defendants which operated as a retraxit of cause of action for damages in favor of all, because they were sued as joint tort-feasors.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem.

The appeal is taken upon the judgment roll, which discloses the record to be as follows: The original complaint named as defendants H. S. McLaughlin and H. Sidney McLaughlin in addition to O'Dea, who is the respondent here. It alleged that in June, 1924, O'Dea, through his attorney, H. S. McLaughlin, had filed a complaint seeking recovery of money claimed to be due on the rental of certain real property; that the return on the summons showed personal service thereof by H. Sidney McLaughlin, and that thereafter judgment by default was entered against the appellant on which a writ of execution was served over two years after the commencement of the action, by virtue of which appellant's money on deposit in a bank was seized and turned over to O'Dea and H. S. McLaughlin, and his safe deposit box attached; that appellant was never in fact served with summons and had no knowledge of the commencement or pendency of the action until October of 1926, when his bank account was levied on; "that if this plaintiff had any knowledge in due time of the issuance of said summons and complaint he would have defended said action or had he the knowledge that a default had been entered therein he would have moved to have said default set aside and vacated on the ground that the plaintiff had then, and now has a good, meritorious defense to said action, to-wit: That he paid the moneys claimed by said O'Dea in his said complaint, also on the ground that he never received said summons and complaint and never knew of their issuance until October 29, 1926, as aforesaid"; that by reason of the acts of the three defendants in thus procuring a judgment by means of a "false and fraudulent representation and return" as to service of process, known to them to be false when made and made with intent to obtain judgment by default, and by reason of the execution levy, the plaintiff's credit had been impaired, his health injuriously affected, and his bank deposit seized. The relief prayed for as against all three defendants was $3,156 compensatory and $3,000 punitive damages, and that the judgment in the former action be set aside and the action dismissed.

Demurrers having been sustained, appellant dismissed the action as to the two McLaughlins and filed an amended complaint in which O'Dea was named as sole defendant. The allegations and prayer of this amended complaint are substantially the same as in the original pleading, except that punitive damages are not sought.

The respondent demurred to the amended complaint upon the ground, among others, that several causes of action were improperly united and not separately stated, to wit, one in equity to vacate a judgment, and one for damages. He also moved for a judgment of dismissal upon the ground that the plaintiff had dismissed the action as against his codefendants "with prejudice," and that, as they had all been sued as joint tort-feasors, the release of the McLaughlins by dismissal of the action as to them operated as a release as against respondent also. The demurrer and motion coming on for hearing at the same time, the motion was granted, the demurrer was ordered off calendar, and there followed the judgment of dismissal, from which this appeal is taken.

[1, 2] The original complaint set up two distinct causes of action without attempting to state them separately. One of the causes of action so pleaded was for damages alleged to have been suffered by appellant as a result of the "false and fraudulent representation and return" as to service of summons upon him, made, as the complaint alleged, "with intent to deceive in order to obtain said default judgment." According to the allegations of the original complaint, all three of the defendants joined in the commission of the tort-giving rise to this cause of action, and hence a retraxit of the cause of action in favor of any of them operated as a release of all of them. As said in Chetwood v. California National Bank, 113 Cal. 414, 45 P. 704, 707:

"While plaintiff may sue one or all of joint tort feasors, and while he may maintain separate actions against them, and cause separate judgments to be entered in such actions, he can have but one satisfaction. Once paid for the injury he has suffered, by any one of the joint tort feasors, his right to proceed further against the others is at an end. Where several joint tort feasors have been sued in a single action, a retraxit of the cause of action in favor of one of them operates to release them all. The reason is quite obvious. By his withdrawal, plaintiff announces that he has received satisfaction for the injury complained of, and it would be unjust that he should be allowed double payment for the single wrong. It matters not either whether the payment made was in a large or in a small amount. If it be accepted in satisfaction of the cause of action against the one, it is in law, a satisfaction of the claim against them all." (Italics ours.) In Flynn v. Manson, 19 Cal. App. 400, 126 P. 181, the action was against several defendants for the recovery of damages for tort. The plaintiff dismissed as to one of the defendants, the dismissal however, containing a provision that it was not the intention of the plaintiff to release the other defendants from liability. The remaining defendants moved for dismissal of the action as to them, upon the same ground as that urged in the instant case. Affirming the judgment of dismissal which followed the order granting this motion, the court held that the release, notwithstanding the saving clause, was a discharge, not only as to the defendant as to whom the dismissal was filed, but as to his codefendants. To the same effect are the decisions in Tompkins v. Clay Street R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 P. 1165, and Urton v. Price, 57 Cal. 272. We are not unmindful of the decisions in Drinkhouse v. Van Ness, 202 Cal. 359, 260 P. 869, 877, in which it was held that a dismissal as to one of the defendants did not amount to a retraxit. But in that case there was testimony to the effect that the defendant released had paid nothing for the release, that the plaintiff had no claim on him, and that the dismissal was executed for the purpose of relieving him of costs in the suit. The court said: "The question whether Chase was a joint tort-feasor with Van Ness had not been determined. On the evidence subsequently admitted it would appear that he was not." This appeal being on the judgment roll alone, and no evidence being before us, we cannot assume that the plaintiff received nothing from the defendants, as to whom he dismissed, by way of settlement of his claim for damages. We have no means of ascertaining what, if any, evidence on this subject was presented to the court below on the hearing of the motion for dismissal as to O'Dea, and all intendments will be made in support of the judgment on an appeal of this nature, and all proceedings necessary to its validity will be presumed to have been regularly taken. Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 27 P. 411.

[3, 4] Appellant further urges that the dismissal signed by his attorneys cannot operate as a retraxit, because a retraxit cannot be given by an attorney, but only by the plaintiff in person. This was the rule at common law, but is not the rule in California, where, under the statutory provisions relating to attorneys at law (section 283, Code Civ. Proc.), "this authority must be considered to be conferred upon the attorney of record in a cause." Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542; Westbay v. Gray, 116 Cal. 660, 48 P. 800. Under our practice the client himself has, in fact, no authority to enter a dismissal since: "While there is an attorney of record, no stipulation as to the conduct or disposal of the action should be entertained by the Court unless the same is signed or assented to by such attorney." Commissioners v. Young, 29 Cal. 147, 87 Am. Dec. 164.

[5, 6] As to the cause of action sounding in tort, the motion to dismiss was properly granted, but, as we have said, two causes of action are stated in the amended complaint. The facts alleged therein are sufficient, irrespective of any question as to damages by reason of wrongful conduct, to state a cause of action against the respondent for the vacation of a judgment obtained by him against the appellant by the employment of extrinsic fraud. Dunlap v. Steere, 92 Cal. 344, 28 P. 563, 16 L. R. A. 361, 27 Am. St. Rep. 143; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 77 P. 1007; Belle v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 689, 82 P. 327. This cause of action was in equity. The judgment obtained was in favor of respondent alone, and no one else was a necessary party defendant to a cause of action to obtain the equitable relief of a decree setting it aside and vacating it. Manifestly the dismissal as to the two defendants from whom, as well as from respondent, appellant sought to recover damages for the injuries which he claimed resulted from the wrongful acts of all of them as joint tort-feasors did not and could not affect the cause of action for vacation of the judgment as against the one defendant in whose favor it had been entered. Had the pleading been properly drawn, with each of these causes of action separately stated, the plaintiff could, of course, have dismissed as to either one without jeopardizing the other just as he might have dismissed as to one action and proceeded with the other had he filed two separate actions, one to set aside the judgment on the ground that it had been obtained by the employment of extrinsic fraud, and the other for the recovery of damages. The fact that the two causes of action were improperly united in one complaint and were not separately stated does not alter the situation.

Instead of ordering the demurrer off calendar the court below should have sustained it with leave to amend, thus enabling appellant to separate his equitable cause of action from that sounding in tort, and, upon dismissal as to the latter, to proceed to trial upon the former. The dismissal as to the equitable cause of action was clearly erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

Suit by J. Chaban against L. Pittler. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles J. McDonnell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued in two common counts for labor and materials furnished in the interior renovation of an apartment house. The cause was tried without a jury and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,357.75. Defendant appeals on the judgment roll alone.

The first count was on an express contract for the sum of $2,500, of which $1,250 had been paid. The second count was for the reasonable value of labor and materials alleged to be $357.75. The defense was based on allegations that the original contract had not been performed according to specifications, and that the labor and materials covered by the second count were not furnished and were of no value. The defendant also filed a cross-complaint for damages in the sum of $2,000 for inefficient work and defective materials.

The trial court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, generally, save that plaintiff did not strictly perform the contracts and that the reasonable cost to defendant of performing would be $250, which sum she was awarded as damages. The allegations of the answer and cross-complaint were found untrue, except as to the matter of damages above noted.

[1, 2] On this appeal the appellant argues that the findings are conflicting, and that they are merely conclusions of law containing nothing in the nature of ultimate facts. The argument that the findings are conflicting is predicated on the form of the answer setting up a special written contract and guaranty covering the performance of the services. In finding that the allegations of the answer were all untrue "save and except that * * * it is true that plaintiff did not strictly perform and complete said contracts," it would seem that the trial court found that the written contract was executed as alleged in the answer, because that is the only contract upon which the allegations of the answer are based. If this was the intention of the court, there would appear to be some conflict in the findings, but, from the state of the record, we are unable to say whether this is prejudicial to appellant. We are, of course precluded from any consideration of the evidence in this appeal based on the judgment roll. If the answer had set up the terms and conditions of the written guaranty so that the inconsistency between the allegations of the complaint and answer would be apparent, appellant's case would be simple. However, so far as can be determined from the pleadings, the amount sued for may be well within the terms of the written guaranty. In relation to the appellant's claim that respondent failed to comply with the terms of the guaranty as to the character of labor and materials furnished, the findings are adverse to appellant, and we cannot say that they are not supported by substantial evidence.

[3, 4] Upon the second point we are also stopped by the method employed by appellant in presenting her appeal. The findings were as broad and specific as the averments of the complaint, and this is all that is necessary to support the judgment. Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 91, 93, 44 P. 331. If the court failed to find on any issue raised by the answer, it would be necessary to have the evidence before we could say there was error. In the absence of such showing, we must presume that if a finding were made it would be adverse to appellant. Fairbanks v. Macready,

Civ. 6275.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

April 14, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 14, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 12, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨790(1) — Denying new trial — Appealing from judgment — Dismissal.

Appeal from order denying new trial was dismissed, alleged error in order being open to consideration on simultaneous appeal from judgment.

2. Automobiles ⇨245(10) — Passenger alighting from street car — Injury by truck — Negligence — Jury question.

On conflicting evidence, whether plaintiff alighting from street car into safety zone was negligently injured by truck held for jury.

The truck driver testified that at speed of ten miles an hour he could stop truck within fifteen or eighteen feet; and, although going only four or five miles an hour, he first saw plaintiff about fifteen feet distant. It was conceded that truck proceeded through intersection after striking plaintiff, but it was not clear whether traffic signals were set against plaintiff as she started to walk from safety zone to sidewalk, following path or area reserved for pedestrians.

3. Automobiles ⇨160(1) — Pedestrians — Vehicles — Equal rights.

Pedestrians and vehicles have equal rights in public streets.

4. Automobiles ⇨220(5) — Pedestrian's violating ordinance — Recovery.

That plaintiff after descending from street car started towards curb in violation of traffic ordinance would not alone preclude recovery for negligent injury by truck.

5. Automobiles ⇨164(1) — Driver's duty — Anticipating pedestrians — Attendant circumstances.

Truck driver's duty was to anticipate probable presence of pedestrians, especially at street car stops, and consider attendant circumstances as truck's weight and brakes.

Harry B. Ellison and E. E. Bennett, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

6. Automobiles ⇨246(32) — Instruction — Contributory negligence.

Instruction that plaintiff, injured by truck after alighting from street car, could not recover if contributorily negligent held proper.

7. Negligence ⇨136(26) — Contributory negligence — Matter of law.

To find contributory negligence as matter of law, evidence must not be conflicting and must support only one reasonable inference.

8. Automobiles ⇨246(32) — Instructions — Traffic signals — Negligence.

Instructions that if plaintiff struck by truck after descending from street car, started toward curb against traffic signals she was negligent as matter of law held properly refused.

The instructions purported to be based upon a traffic ordinance forbidding pedestrians to cross roadway other than with released traffic, but ordinance did not specify duties of pedestrians who might find themselves within safety zone upon change of traffic signals.

9. Automobiles ⇨246(30) — Instruction — Pedestrian's degree of care.

Instruction that pedestrian need exercise less care than motorist, who must use every reasonable precaution to insure safety, held proper.

The jury were instructed that pedestrians have equal rights with vehicles in public streets, but degree of care required of driver of motor vehicle is much greater than that of pedestrian; that driver is required to use every reasonable precaution to insure safety to himself and to pedestrians; that if plaintiff used ordinary care for her own safety, defendant company, whose truck injured plaintiff when she attempted to cross street from safety zone where she had descended from street car, was legally at fault.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Margie Morgan against the Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Appeal from order dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Joe Crider, Jr., and J. S. Garnett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

[1] The respondent was awarded a verdict and judgment for personal injuries inflicted upon her by a truck of the Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Corporation; a motion for new trial was presented, which was denied, and the defendant appealed from both the judgment and the order denying said motion. The asserted error in the order denying a new trial will be considered upon the appeal from the judgment, and the appeal therefrom is therefore dismissed. Heine Piano Co. v. Bloomer, 183 Cal. 398, 191 P. 900.

It appears that the plaintiff was struck by defendant's machine as she alighted from a westbound street car at the northeast corner of Pasadena avenue and San Fernando road, or Avenue 20, in the city of Los Angeles; she alleged that the truck was following the car at an excessive rate of speed, without proper control, and in violation of a city ordinance; that as she attempted to walk toward the curb the driver of the truck proceeded through the intersection, throwing her to the pavement. Issue was joined, and the defendant affirmatively alleged that the accident was unavoidable, and also that the accident resulted proximately from the plaintiff's contributory negligence in venturing into the pathway of the approaching truck. It is conceded that she alighted from the car into a space reserved for boarding and departing passengers, known as a "safety zone," about fifteen feet from the northerly curb and sidewalk, between which points a space is also marked for pedestrians to follow across that portion of the main thoroughfare; that the defendant's truck, loaded with gravel, and weighing about 32,000 pounds, ran into this last-mentioned space or area after the street car had left, the traffic signals had changed, and respondent had started to cross from the safety zone to the curb. Respondent testified that she had noticed the truck about fifteen feet away, traveling in the same direction as her car, but that she expected it to stop; that as she stepped into the main roadway the signal changed, whereupon she returned to the safety zone, and did not again proceed until the signal indicated that her way would be clear. The motortruck continued westerly after the signals had started traffic in a northerly direction, and ran upon the respondent, causing her injuries. It is also admitted that the accident occurred at about noon, and that the day was clear.

Appellant devotes a major portion of its briefs to evidence and argument as to the operation of signals, the legal duties and privileges of pedestrians and drivers of vehicles, and principally relying upon the provisions of the ordinance, insists that respondent was herself so negligent as to preclude her right of recovery. Sections 5 and 12 of said provisions recite in part: "When such bell is sounded no traffic shall enter an intersection until a green or 'Go' signal is shown." "At intersections where traffic is directed by a police officer or by a traffic signal, it shall be unlawful for any pedestrian to cross the roadway other than with released traffic." To quote appellant's theory: "At the time Miss Morgan was proceeding in a northerly direction across the northerly half of Pasadena avenue traffic in all directions was 'blocked.' The signals were 'against her.' In a nutshell, it is our contention that if Miss Morgan had obeyed the ordinance she would not have left the safety zone and started for the north curb until the ringing of the second bell, at which time the traffic signals at the southeast corner and at the northwest corner would have displayed the word 'Go,' and while said last-mentioned traffic signals displayed the word 'Go' the traffic signal located at the northeast corner, and which controlled the movement of defendant's truck in a westerly direction, would have displayed the word 'Stop.'"

We are cited to no authority holding that the mere violation of traffic regulations, even if conclusively shown by the evidence, is sufficient to bar recovery by a pedestrian who, during the exercise of ordinary care, may have been injured by an automobile which entered an intersection when "traffic in all directions was blocked." In fact, appellant cites no authorities whatever except to distinguish varying conditions and circumstances wherein no different rules of conduct or of procedure in such cases are recognized or followed.

[2-5] The ordinance is not definite or clear as to the right or duty of a pedestrian, unavoidably left by a street car near the center of the street, upon the changing of signals. However, it is obvious that respondent did not "enter an intersection" of the highways, as the term is commonly accepted and understood, and we are not to be understood to say as a matter of law in the face of her denials that in any event she attempted to cross in the pedestrians' area in violation of the provisions relied upon by appellant. She testified that she was watching the signals, and believed that she was crossing "with released traffic," and in anticipation that the truck would be so controlled as to let her pass. Appellant's driver testified that with properly adjusted and operating brakes he could stop his truck within a space of fifteen to eighteen feet when driving at a rate of ten miles per hour; and while it appears that he was at the time in question going but four or five miles an hour, he first saw respondent at a distance of about fifteen feet. Diagrams in the record, marked by witnesses at the trial, indicate that he continued through the street intersection after striking respondent. He also tested his brakes in the morning, but was aware that oil could and that it might leak into them. From this and an abundance of like evidence it is apparent that while grave doubt may have arisen in the minds of the jury as to whether respondent had violated the law or was negligent, they were not unwarranted in concluding that the allegations of her complaint were amply sustained. However, if her momentary haste did contribute to her injuries, pedestrians and vehicles have equal rights in public streets, and a violation of the ordinance would not alone be sufficient to bar recovery. Robinson v. Clemons, 46 Cal. App. 661, 190 P. 203; Giorgetti v. Wollaston, 83 Cal. App. 358, 257 P. 109, 111; Saltzen v. Associated Oil Co., 193 Cal. 157, 244 P. 338. It was incumbent upon the driver to foresee the probable presence of pedestrians upon the street, especially where street cars receive and discharge their passengers, and to bear in mind the weight of his load, the condition of his brakes, and other attendant circumstances. The rules in such cases were announced in Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066, 1068, as follows:

"The negligent act or omission of a plaintiff which will exculpate a defendant from responding to the plaintiff in damages resulting from the plaintiff's negligent act or omission must be a contributing, proximate cause of the damages. Flynn v. San Francisco & S. J. R. R. Co., 40 Cal. 14, 19, 6 Am. Rep. 695; Basler v. Sacramento Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 514, 519, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642, 111 P. 530. 'The formula is, not that any degree of negligence on the part of the plaintiff which directly concurs in producing the injury * * * will constitute a defense; but if the negligence of the plaintiff, which amounts to the absence of ordinary care, shall contribute * * * proximately to the injury, the plaintiff shall not recover.' Robinson v. Western Pacific R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 409, 422, 423; Strong v. Sacramento & Placerville R. R. Co., 61 Cal. 326, 328. * * *

"The right of drivers of automobiles to use public highways is not superior to that of the humblest pedestrian, and in the exercise of a common right to the use of the public highways, all persons using the same must exert constant care and caution for the conservation of their correlative rights, commensurate with the special hazard which is peculiar to and nowadays ever present in the use of public highways. Accordingly, the driver of an automobile 'has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances and at all times he must be vigilant and must anticipate and expect the presence of others. * * * The fact that he did not know that any one was on the highway is no excuse for conduct which would have amounted to recklessness if he had known that another vehicle or person was on the highway.' Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 159, 201 P. 471. Even though the operator of an automobile may be rigidly within the law, 'he still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires he must slow up and stop.' Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125, 127."

[6] In the instant case the jury were instructed fully in these well-established principles, and that they must find "that the evidence failed to show, by a preponderance thereof, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence contributing proximately thereto, else they could not legally award her damages but must render a verdict for the defendant." This is in accord with the rules announced by the Supreme Court in Giorgetti v. Wollaston, supra, in the following language: "The failure of any person to perform a duty imposed upon him by law raises a presumption of negligence, and if such negligence proximately contributes to his injury, he cannot recover. McKune v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 486, 42 P. 980; Berkovitz v. American River Gravel Co., 191 Cal. 195, 215 P. 675; Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 P. 109. This presumption, however, is not conclusive, but may be overcome by evidence that the failure was excusable or justifiable under the circumstances and not inconsistent with the exercise of due care."

[7] As we have seen, it may seriously have been questioned as to whether the plaintiff in this case disobeyed a signal or was not excusable for her movements under all of the circumstances. The evidence in this regard was at least conflicting, and, any question as to the dereliction of either party, was one for the jury to determine. This being true, an appellate tribunal is not authorized or inclined to disturb their conclusions as expressed by their verdict. It cannot be said as a matter of law that acts or omissions of the plaintiff proximately contributed to the accident unless the court is impelled to say that the evidence is not in conflict upon the facts, and that reasonable men can draw but one inference therefrom which points unerringly to the plaintiff's negligence. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125. That such a case is not here presented is too obvious to justify further discussion.

[8] The trial court refused requested instructions to the effect that if they should find that the plaintiff stepped from the street car to the safety zone with intentions of crossing the street, it was her duty to await a signal releasing traffic, and that, if she started before the signal so indicated, she was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. As already observed, the ordinance does not specify the duties of pedestrians who may find themselves within a safety zone upon a changing of signals, and, under other facts and circumstances appearing, the question as to respondent's exercise of care was not one of law, but one of fact.

[9] It is next complained that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that pedestrians have equal rights with vehicles in public streets, but that the degree of care required of the driver of a motor vehicle is far greater than that of the pedestrian; that the driver is required to use every reasonable precaution to insure safety to himself and to pedestrians; that if they should find that the plaintiff at the time used ordinary care for her own safety, the defendant was legally at fault in causing her injury. This instruction stated again the rules announced, in language used, by our Supreme Court. Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743. Appellant criticises it because authorities in which it was upheld are distinguishable in many respects as to positions of parties, local conditions, and other points of fact, but since the fundamental principles announced consist of recognized rules applicable generally, the cases are not so distinguishable. As said in Weihe v. Rathjen Mercantile Co., 34 Cal. App. 302, 167 P. 287, following Raymond v. Hill, supra: "When the instructions are read together and construed as a whole, they are consistent with each other and not confusing, and appear to fairly cover the point discussed. It cannot be said, therefore, that the jury was misled." In the instruction in question, it may be that a better word might have been selected than "insure." However, we think it was meant in the sense of "assure" and must have been so understood by the jury.

Minor objections are raised as to rulings upon the evidence, etc., which we think are covered by what has been said, and it is not necessary to consume the time required by their consideration in detail.

The judgment is affirmed.

RICHARDS, J.

This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and respondent rendered and entered after a jury had returned a verdict against the defendant in an action commenced by the plaintiff to compel the defendant to support her illegitimate son, of whom she alleged, and according to the judgment established, the defendant was the father. During the trial of the cause it was sufficiently shown that the child of the plaintiff had been born in the due course of gestation in the month of June, 1924. The plaintiff testified, and the jury apparently accepted her statement, that the act or acts of illicit intercourse between herself and the defendant occurred in Los Angeles during the last week of September, 1923, and that as a result thereof the child had been conceived. The defendant did not very seriously or successfully controvert the plaintiff's evidence as to his intercourse with her at said time, but rested his defense chiefly upon the ground that the plaintiff had been similarly intimate with other men at or sufficiently near the time of her intercourse with him as to render it possible for the jury to draw the inference that another than the defendant was the father of the child. In the course of this attempted proof, the defendant offered evidence to the effect that during the latter part of September, 1923, and while the plaintiff was in the city of Los Angeles, there was also living in that city a man named Raiche, whom the plaintiff had previously known in the city of Sacramento, and whom she met upon several occasions during the period of her stay in Los Angeles, and with whom she was apparently upon friendly terms. Having made this showing, the defendant offered proof that during the month of April, 1922, and while she was living in Sacramento, the plaintiff was the mistress of Raiche and lived for a time during that year in that illicit relationship with him. The basis upon which the defendant made the latter proffer of evidence was, not that such former illicit intercourse, admittedly beyond the possible period of gestation, was directly admissible for the purpose of showing another paternity of the child, but that such evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing that the former relationship between the plaintiff and Raiche during 1922, coupled with the fact that the plaintiff and Raiche remained friendly up to and including the month of September, 1923, and were shown to have met each other in the city of Los Angeles and to have been in company there upon two or more occasions during the very period when the plaintiff was maintaining illicit sexual relationship with the defendant, would be sufficient to entitle the jury to draw the inference that the past intercourse between herself and Raiche had been there resumed, and that the latter and not the Bastards — Prior illicit relationship — Excluding proof.

In action for support of illegitimate child, excluding proof of plaintiff's illicit relationship with another more than one year prior to period within which plaintiff's child must have been begotten held not error.

To make such proof admissible, it was incumbent upon defendant to sufficiently show that during period when child was begotten, and when plaintiff and other party were together, there existed both the desire and opportunity on the part of each for the resumption of their past illicit relationship, and defendant failed to make a sufficient showing in that regard.

defendant was the father of the child. The trial court, however, took the position that the defendant had not so far succeeded in showing such opportunity for the plaintiff and Raiche to resume their past illicit relation while in Los Angeles at said time as would suffice to open the door for the admission of such evidence, and the trial court, consistently and repeatedly refused to permit the defendant to introduce the same. It is this refusal of the trial court which the defendant assigns as prejudicial error upon this appeal.

After a careful examination of the entire record, we are of the opinion that the trial court was correct in its refusal to permit the defendant to make proof of the plaintiff's illicit relationship and intercourse with Raiche as of a time at least one year prior to the period within which the plaintiff's child must have been begotten. That such evidence would not be directly admissible in such an action as this was fully established by this court in Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 534, 108 P. 499, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131, wherein it was held that evidence of illicit relation on the part of the mother of an illegitimate child with men other than the defendant, whom she alleges to be its father, must be directed to a time at or about the time when, in the ordinary course of nature, the child must have been begotten. The authorities cited in said decision, as well as those to which our attention has been directed upon this appeal, are in practical accord to the foregoing effect. It was therefore incumbent upon the defendant in this action to sufficiently show that during the period in the month of September, 1923, when the plaintiff and Raiche were at the same time in the city of Los Angeles, there existed both the desire and opportunity on the part of each for the resumption of their past illicit relationship. We are constrained to hold that the defendant failed to make anything like a sufficient showing in the foregoing regard, for while it is true that the plaintiff and Raiche met upon two or more occasions while they were together in said city, there is no evidence whatever that at any such time of meeting an opportunity existed for sexual intercourse between them, the uncontradicted evidence in the case being that upon each occasion of such meeting or meetings between the plaintiff and Raiche they were never alone together, but were upon each occasion in the company of others and in such circumstances as would render it practically impossible for such intercourse to have occurred, even if the resumption of their former relationship had been desired by either. Raiche was not called as a witness in the case, and from the testimony of the plaintiff, under a most rigid cross-examination, it appeared that she had so far transferred her affections and desires toward the defendant herein as to have no wish to renew a past illicit connection with Raiche. This being the state of the record, we are constrained to hold that the trial court was correct in its refusal to permit the defendant to introduce the proposed evidence as to whatever prior illicit relationship might have been shown to exist between the plaintiff and Raiche as of a period long prior to the possible term of gestation.

This being the only question involved in the present appeal, it follows that the judgment of the trial court should be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEHEW.

Cr. 3287.

Supreme Court of California.

April 18, 1930.

1. Criminal law §519(3) — Confession — While under arrest — Voluntary character.

That confession was made to officer while accused was under arrest does not necessarily render confession inadmissible.

2. Criminal law §519(9) — Confession — Answer to questions.

Mere fact confession is made in answer to questions will not authorize its rejection.

3. Criminal law §1141(2) — Appeal — Admitting confession — Review.

Reviewing court cannot say trial court erred in admitting confession, unless error appears as matter of law from record presented.

4. Criminal law §736(2) — Confession — Voluntary character — Determination — Discretion.

Whether confession is free and voluntary is preliminary question addressed to trial court who has considerable discretion in determining it.

5. Criminal law §531(3) — Confession — Admission.

In murder prosecution, court did not abuse discretion in admitting confession, where there was ample evidence warranting conclusion it was voluntarily made when defendant was in full possession of faculties.

6. Criminal law §525 — Confessions — Hysterical condition — Not affecting admissibility.

Evidence showing defendant was in hysterical condition at time of confession would not affect admissibility, but could be considered by jury in determining weight to be given to it.

7. Criminal law §829(11) — Appeal and error — Refusing instruction — Covered by another instruction.

Refusing instruction relating to disregarding confession, if defendant could not appreciate what he said, held not error, because covered by instruction given.

The requested instruction read in part that, if jury found from evidence that defendant's mind was by reason of his mental weakness, if any, at time of making statements, in such condition that he did not know and could not appreciate what he said, jury should disregard such statements in their entirety so far as they tended to incriminate him, and the instruction given stated in part that, unless jury believed that confession was freely and voluntarily made by defendant with full knowledge of its meaning and effect, jury should disregard confession entirely.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Thomas Lehew was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lilburn I. Gibson, of Ukiah, for the People.

WASTE, C. J.

The defendant, Thomas Lehew, was charged by information filed by the district attorney of the county of Mendocino with the murder of Teresa Johnson. The deceased, a schoolgirl about seven years of age, living with her parents near Mendocino City, was last seen alive on May 23, 1929, when she left another little girl at the forks of the road leading to their respective homes when on their way from school. She did not reach home, and a search for her resulted in the discovery, first, of her lunch pail, sweater, cap, and school books, and, subsequently, of her dead body. She had been choked to death and sexually abused. Suspicion was almost immediately directed to the defendant, who was arrested and made a purported confession. On arraignment, he entered pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity. The plea of not guilty by reason of insanity was subsequently withdrawn.

The jury returned a verdict of murder in the first degree, without recommendation. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the defendant was sentenced to pay the extreme penalty. From the judgment of conviction and sentence he has appealed.

The evidence points unmistakably to the appellant as the murderer of Teresa Johnson. We find it unnecessary, however, to detail the unpleasant facts and circumstances surrounding the commission of this most heinous offense, for the appellant raises no issue as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support a conviction. In his closing brief he states that he "has never urged that a new trial should be granted because of the failure of the evidence to support the verdict," and that he "has devoted no portion of his brief to a claim that the verdict cannot be sustained, on appeal, because of the insufficiency of the evidence."

In support of a reversal of the judgment the appellant urges that the trial court erred when it admitted his "alleged" confession in evidence. The confession was made in the office of the district attorney of Mendocino county on Tuesday, June 4, 1929, twelve days after the homicide, and in the presence of the district attorney, the official phonographic reporter of the county, and a deputy sheriff. In response to certain interrogatories propounded by the district attorney, appellant admitted his connection with the crime. During the course of the trial, and after having satisfactorily established the corpus delicti, and having introduced certain other evidence tending to connect the appellant with the murder of Teresa Johnson, the prosecution called to the witness stand the reporter who had reported in shorthand the conversation between the district attorney and the appellant, wherein the latter had admitted his guilt. In response to certain preliminary questions, this witness testified that he had reported the entire conversation in shorthand, and had subsequently transcribed his notes, and that no threats, promises, or inducements had been held out to the appellant by any one present. Counsel for the appellant then agreed, subject to an objection to the introduction in evidence of the confession, that the witness might read into the record his transcribed notes of the proceedings in the district attorney's office. The objection to the introduction of the confession was based upon the twofold ground that it had been obtained by means of threats and duress, and at a time when the appellant did not know or realize what he was doing. The appellant was thereupon granted permission by the trial court to "offer any testimony * * * on the question of whether or not the proposed conversation or confession * * * was freely and voluntarily given." Taking the stand solely for the purpose of narrating the conditions and circumstances under which he had confessed his guilt, the appellant testified that he thought the sheriff and his deputies had drugged his food while in the county jail; that while so incarcerated he felt "dizzy and everything blurred"; that his heart pounded, his head ached, and his condition grew progressively worse up until the time the confession was made; that he was unable to remember anything that happened between Sunday night, June 2d, and Wednesday, June 5th, but that he distinctly recalled the happenings of Wednesday, June 5th; that he did not recollect talking with the district attorney on Tuesday, June 4th, and confessing his guilt; that between the time of his arrest and Sunday night, June 2d, a number of threats had been made by the sheriff, and that he did not sleep for two weeks while in the county jail. On cross-examination he stated that he had never seen any one put anything in his food or drink, but knew it to be the fact because he could taste it and smell it; that while he was constantly aware that his food and coffee were being drugged and had a peculiar effect on him, he never refused the nourishment offered him; that his mind was a complete blank between Sunday night, June 2d, and Wednesday, June 5th, and that he did not therefore recall confessing his guilt to the district attorney on June 4th or signing the purported statement introduced in evidence.

Dr. Sidney K. Smith, a specialist in nervous and mental diseases, called by the defense, testified that he had examined the appellant and found no evidence of insanity or feeble-mindedness; that there was nothing abnormal about appellant, except that he was not of high-grade intellect; that he placed no credence in the appellant's belief that he had been doped or drugged while in the county jail; that a person, and particularly one of low-grade mentality, under emotional stress and strain, might reach a state of hysteria and not know what he was doing. Cross-examined, he stated that at the time he examined the appellant he found no signs of hysteria; that it would not be strange or peculiar for a man who had murdered and sexually abused a seven year old child to suffer from headaches and heart pounding; that in his opinion the appellant did not know of the confession and statement above referred to, and that he based his conclusion upon the appellant's childish recital of the affair and his apparent inability to recollect what had transpired between Sunday, June 2d, and Wednesday, June 5th.

In rebuttal of this evidence the prosecution called Dr. Donald R. Smith, superintendent of the state hospital, who testified that the appellant was brought to the state hospital on June 15th, and that he then had occasion to examine him; that it would be impossible for a person, under the circumstances set forth in a lengthy hypothetical question, to forget that he had made or signed a statement; that he found no evidence of a previous condition of hysteria in the appellant. On cross-examination the witness stated that in most cases it is possible to detect symptoms of hysteria in an hysterical individual, and that he found none in the appellant.

Dr. Charles E. Sisson, assistant superintendent of the state hospital, testified that he had examined the appellant between June 16th and 23d; that he found no evidence of hysteria; that the appellant had admitted to him that he remembered everything that occurred between Sunday, June 2d, and Wednesday, June 5th, but that he did not recall making a confession; that appellant's forgetfulness was "very unusual"; that on Sunday morning, June 16th, the appellant said, "Well, I guess I have talked too much already."

The sheriff and his several deputies in charge of the jail denied the making of any threats, promises, or inducements, and also denied that any drug or dope had been placed in the appellant's food, drink, or smoking material.

With this evidence before it, the trial court overruled the appellant's objection, and permitted the prosecution to introduce in evidence the confession made by the appellant in the office of the district attorney on the afternoon of June 4, 1929. In admitting this piece of evidence, the court took occasion to admonish the jury that it was for them ultimately to determine whether it was freely and voluntarily made. The appellant attacks the trial court's ruling admitting the confession in evidence upon the ground that "he was not possessed of sufficient mental capacity to make a voluntary confession," and that "he was suffering from hysteria, of such a nature as to deprive him of any understanding as to the nature of the act he was doing."

[1-4] Whether a confession is free and voluntary is a preliminary question addressed to the trial court and a considerable measure of discretion must be allowed that court in determining it. People v. Connelly, 195 Cal. 584, 598, 234 P. 374; People v. Castello, 194 Cal. 595, 599, 229 P. 855; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 394, 95 P. 863, 866; People v. Wilson, 79 Cal. App. 709, 713, 250 P. 879. In People v. Siemsen, supra, it is declared that the "admissibility of such evidence so largely depends upon the special circumstances connected with the confession that it is difficult, if not impossible, to formulate a rule that will comprehend all cases. As the question is necessarily addressed in the first instance to the [trial] judge, and since his discretion must be controlled by all the attendant circumstances, the courts have wisely forbore to mark with absolute precision the limits of admission and exclusion." The mere fact that the confession was made to a police or other officer of the law while the accused was under arrest does not necessarily render the confession involuntary and inadmissible. So, also, the mere fact that a confession is made in answer to questions will not authorize its rejection, though the fact of its having been so obtained may be an important element in determining whether the answers were voluntary. People v. Hoge, 25 Cal. App. 456, 458, 143 P. 1072; People v. Quan Gim Gow, 23 Cal. App. 507, 512, 138 P. 918. A reviewing court cannot say that the trial court committed error in admitting a confession of guilt, unless such error appears as a matter of law from the record presented. The trial court is clothed with considerable discretion in determining whether or not the confession was free and voluntary, and, where the evidence is conflicting on the subject, it must be assumed that the testimony concerning a defendant's admissions was properly admitted. People v. Castello, supra, at page 600 of 194 Cal., 229 P. 855; People v. Shaffer, 81 Cal. App. 752, 756, 757, 254 P. 666; People v. Tugwell, 28 Cal. App. 348, 152 P. 740.

[5, 6] We are not prepared to say that the court below abused its discretion when it admitted the appellant's confession in evidence. There is ample evidence in the record, some of which is outlined above, warranting the conclusion that it was not induced by threats, promises, or inducements, but was freely and voluntarily made at a time when the appellant was in full possession of his faculties. Moreover, any evidence tending to establish that appellant was in an hysterical condition, and, perhaps, not in full possession of his faculties at the time he confessed his guilt, would not affect the admissibility in evidence of the confession itself, but would be evidence to be considered by the jury in determining the weight or effect to be given to it. People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69, 71, 72, 87 P. 12; People v. Cokahnour, 120 Cal. 253, 254, 52 P. 505; People v. Elder, 55 Cal. App. 644, 648, 204 P. 29. As indicated above, the jury was admonished and instructed that it was for them to ultimately determine whether the confession was freely and voluntarily made.

[7] It is next contended that the court below erred in refusing to give the following requested instruction: "You are instructed that in weighing and considering any evidence that may have been submitted to you of statements purported to have been made by the defendant, adverse to his interest, you have a right and it is your duty to consider the condition of the mind of the defendant at the time of making of such alleged statements. And in this connection, I charge you that if you find from the evidence in this case that the defendant's mind was by reason of his mental weakness, if any, at the time of the making of any such statements, was in such condition that he did not know and could not appreciate what he said, it then becomes your duty, under your oaths, to disregard such statements in their entirety so far as they may tend to incriminate him." Without passing upon the propriety of an instruction so worded, we are of opinion that it was not error to refuse the same, because the following instruction, given by the court, sufficiently covered the subject:

"You are further instructed * * * that before you can consider any confession of the defendant as evidence against him, if you find that defendant has made a confession, you must believe that such confession was freely and voluntarily made and was not the result of inducement, coercion, intimidation, threats, promises or duress exercised by any officer of the law, or any other person over the defendant. Unless you believe that such confession was freely and voluntarily made by the defendant with full knowledge of its meaning and effect, then you must disregard such confession entirely from your consideration. (Italics added.)

"I further instruct you that in considering the testimony in this case, you should view with caution all evidence, if any, of the oral admissions of the defendant made out of court."

The italicized portion of the foregoing instruction very definitely informed the jury that they were to disregard the confession unless they were satisfied and believed that it was made by the appellant "with full knowledge of its meaning and effect."

Appellant's contentions being without merit, it is unnecessary to determine whether the asserted errors resulted, as urged, in a miscarriage of justice within the meaning of article 6, section 4½, of the Constitution.

The judgment is affirmed.

CURTIS, J.

This is an action for an accounting of a Chinese partnership brought by the plaintiff, Ng Yee Yin, against the defendants, M. H. Lee and Chew Chung Kew. The action is in reality only against M. H. Lee, as he was the only defendant served, and he will hereafter be referred to as the defendant. The partnership involved herein was known as the Man Hing Lee Company, and was composed of the plaintiff, the defendant, and the said Chew Chung Kew. The trial was had and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

On this appeal the controversy has narrowed down to two items involved in the account. These items are for $6,800 and $5,100, respectively.

[1] It is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant received the sum of $6,800 from the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company and unlawfully applied all of said sum in payment of a debt due from said company to the defendant. At the time the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company made said payment to the defendant, said company was also indebted to the partnership of Man Hing Lee Company in a large sum of money approximating $40,000. The plaintiff contends that when said sum of $6,800 was paid, the defendant, being the managing partner of said partnership, should have applied said sum pro rata between the copartnership and himself in proportion to the respective amounts due from said company to the partnership and to the defendant. The partnership in which the parties hereto were members had previously entered into an agreement and lease with the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company, in which it was agreed that the partnership should construct certain buildings upon the leased premises for the use and benefit of certain laborers employed by the partnership in working the lands covered by said lease. It was further agreed that the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company should repay to the partnership all sums of money expended by the partnership in the construction of said buildings. When the time arrived for the construction of said buildings, the Man Hing Lee Company was without funds to construct the same. The defendant from his own funds advanced to the partnership over $8,000 for the purpose of constructing said buildings. Thereafter the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company paid to defendant the sum of $6,800 for the partnership which the defendant applied on the indebtedness due him from the partnership by reason of the expenditures made by him in constructing said buildings. The only criticism which the plaintiff makes regarding this transaction is based upon the assertion that the buildings in question were to be erected by the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company and not by the partnership, and therefore, when the defendant advanced the money for their construction, he advanced it to the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company and not to the partnership. But the claim that the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company was to erect said buildings has no foundation in fact, as the written lease in evidence plainly and conclusively shows to the contrary. As the buildings were to be constructed and paid for in the first instance by the partnership, when, therefore, the defendant advanced the money for their construction, he advanced it for the use of the partnership and not for the Maxwell Irrigated Farms Company. The company, accordingly, was not indebted to the defendant for the money thus advanced. On the other hand, as we have seen, the partnership was indebted to the defendant for the money advanced by him. This indebtedness was still outstanding when the company paid to the defendant for the partnership said sum of $6,800. This being so, the defendant had the right to offset said payment as against the amount due him from the partnership in so far as the same would satisfy his debt.

We have treated this transaction as if the sum of $6,800 had actually been paid in cash. The evidence, however, shows that no money really changed hands, but that the transaction involved a series of credits between the parties. This fact does not change the legal relations of the parties, nor affect our conclusion that the whole of the $6,800 item was correctly credited to the account in favor of the defendant.

[2, 3] The claim regarding the item of $5,100 rests upon equally untenable grounds. The defendant and his copartners in the Man Hing Lee Company were also members of another partnership by the name of the Sam Hop Wo Company. They owned by far the largest interest in said last-named company, the other partners being a number of small shareholders consisting of laborers and persons of small means. The Sam Hop Wo Company became financially embarrassed, and it was decided to close out its business and terminate its existence. In order to do so it was necessary to pay up the indebtedness of this company. The small shareholders were unable to meet their share of this indebtedness, and it was agreed by the partners of the Man Hing Lee Company that the defendant should attempt to collect the amount and settle the bills, but that in case it was impossible for him to do so, the Man Hing Lee Company would advance the money. In accordance with the written agreement to this effect, the defendant paid out of the funds of the Man Hing Lee Company $5,102 in behalf of the small shareholders. It was the understanding that an assessment would be levied upon the small shareholders to repay this amount, and a notice was accordingly sent out to them. Plaintiff claims that at least a part of these assessments was paid, although there is no contention that any substantial, or, for that matter, that any definite or specific amount had been paid to defendant to reimburse the Man Hing Lee Company in this matter. The only evidence in the case regarding these payments is found in the testimony given by the defendant. He was asked by plaintiff's attorney regarding this matter and stated that if these assessments had been paid the Man Hing Lee Company would have received its money back, but that most of them had not been paid. Plaintiff relies upon this evidence as proof that some of these assessments had been paid. Although from this testimony of the defendant it might possibly be inferred that the defendant had received money from the payment of assessments which he had not accounted for, this evidence is not clear and satisfactory and falls short of being sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment by this court. Moreover, just preceding this testimony, the defendant had been asked practically the same question as that just referred to; that is: "If all of the parties paid up their assessments you would have gotten back $5,102?" To this question he answered: "No, the partners never paid." It will thus be seen that the very testimony of the witness relied upon by the plaintiff, assuming that the testimony of the defendant to the effect that most of the partners didn't pay is equivalent to testimony that some of the partners did pay, is contradictory within itself. In this state of the record, the judgment of the trial court is binding upon us.

We are satisfied that the conclusion of the trial court that the two items above referred to were correctly accounted for by the defendant finds ample support in the evidence.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

S. F. 13903.

1. New Trial ⇐155 — Determining motion — Time.

Statutory provision motion for new trial "shall" be determined not later than ten days before expiration of time for passing thereon is directory (Code Civ. Proc. § 661).

2. New trial ⇐155 — Granting motion — Time.

Where notice of entry of judgment was served January 25, court, granting new trial March 26, acted within jurisdictional limits (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 660, 661).

Code Civ. Proc. § 660, provides that time, within which court has power to pass upon motions for new trial, expires sixty days after service on the moving party of written notice of entry of judgment.

In Bank.

Petition by Theodore Pappadatos for an alternative writ of prohibition against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and Hon. C. J. Goodell, Presiding Judge thereof, to restrain further steps in connection with an order granting a new trial.

Petition denied.

Charles A. Christin, Knight, Boland & Christin, and Whalen, Harzfeld & O'Brien, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

The petition for alternative writ of prohibition is denied.

In a certain action brought by petitioner for injunctive relief, a final decree was rendered in his favor and duly entered on January 25, 1930, on which day also notice of entry of judgment was served upon defendants therein. On March 26, 1930, after due proceedings, defendants' motion for new trial was argued before a judge other than the trial judge, was submitted, and an order entered granting a new trial. Petitioner thereupon moved to set aside said order upon the ground that it was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court because the proceedings were in violation of jurisdictional provisions of section 661, Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that motion for new trial "shall be heard and determined," except in case of his inability, by the trial judge and "shall be submitted" not later than ten days before the expiration of the time within which the court has power to pass upon it. Such time, under section 660 of said code, expires sixty days after service on the moving party of written notice of entry of judgment; therefore, petitioner claims, the motion for new trial here was submitted about seven days too late. The court, however, denied petitioner's motion to set aside the order granting a new trial and the cause, after due proceedings, was reset for trial April 17, 1930. Petitioner thereupon filed his petition herein praying that this court issue an alternative writ of prohibition to restrain the taking of any further steps in connection with said order granting a new trial for the reasons aforesaid.

[1, 2] In denying it, we recognize that, as a general rule, where specified in the Code with respect to motions for new trial, time is usually jurisdictional, but, in our opinion, the provisions here in question are directory, intended only to direct a wise procedure for the disposition of such motions. The word "shall" as employed therein has, in the interpretation of statutes, often been held merely directory (Board of Education v. Board of Trustees, 96 Cal. 42, 30 P. 838; Board of Education v. Board of Trustees, 129 Cal. 599, 62 P. 173; In re Chadbourne, 15 Cal. App. 363, 369, 114 P. 1012; People v. High School Dis- trict, 62 Cal. App. 67, 73, 216 P. 959). For noncompliance with said provisions no penalty is prescribed and the clause therein as to time does not purport to curtail but confirms the sixty-day period specified in section 660. Inasmuch, therefore, as section 661 contains no penalty for the omission of this procedure and the motion was submitted and passed upon within said sixty-day period provided by law, we hold that the court below acted within its jurisdictional limits. In further support of such ruling, attention is directed to the reasoning employed and doctrine announced in City of Los Angeles v. Hannon, 79 Cal. App. 669, 251 P. 247, and cases therein cited, construing as directory only section 632 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the time within which decisions of trial courts should be made on questions of fact submitted to them.

Sac. 4057.

Supreme Court of California.

April 1, 1930.

Rehearing Granted April 28, 1930.

1. Evidence ⚡53 — Presumption — Outweighing positive testimony.

A presumption is evidence and may outweigh positive evidence adduced against it.

2. Automobiles ⚡242(1) — Railroads ⚡346(5) — Presumption — Exercise of ordinary care — Evidence.

Statutory presumption that automobile guest exercised ordinary care constituted evidence in action for death at railroad crossing (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4).

3. Witnesses ⚡276 — Statute — Construction — Examination of adverse party.

Statute permitting party to examine adverse party should receive construction which would accomplish purpose thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

Code Civ. Proc. § 2055 provides a party to the record may be examined by the adverse party as if under cross-examination, subject to the rules applicable to the examination of other witnesses. The party calling such adverse witness shall not be bound by his testimony, and such testimony may be rebutted.

4. Evidence ⚡591 — Testimony — Binding on party calling witness.

Ordinarily, party calling witness is bound by testimony of such witness.

5. Evidence ⚡591 — Testimony — Adverse party — Weight.

Testimony of adverse party called as witness is not when weighed against presumption evidence of party calling witness (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

6. Evidence ⚡591 — Testimony — Adverse party — Weight.

Testimony of adverse party called as witness does not dispel presumption contrary thereto in favor of party calling adverse witness (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

7. Trial ⚡140(2) — Testimony — Adverse party — Weight — Question for jury.

Weight of testimony of adverse party called as witness is for jury and not for court on motion for nonsuit or directed verdict (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

8. Evidence ⚡591 — Adverse party — Testimony — Consideration by jury.

Jury may disregard testimony of adverse party called as witness, as against presumption (Code Civ. Proc. § 2055).

9. Evidence ⚡591 — Testimony of automobile driver — Presumption that guest used due care.

Testimony of automobile driver, called as witness by adverse party in action for death at railroad crossing, that deceased guest made statement, "It's all clear; let's go," held not sufficient to dispel presumption guest exercised ordinary care (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2055, 1963, subd. 4).

10. Automobiles ⚡245(87) — Railroads ⚡350(21) — Injuries to automobile guest — Exercise of due care — Question for jury.

Testimony of automobile driver, called as witness by adverse party in action against driver and railroad for death at crossing, that deceased guest made statement, "It's all clear; let's go," created conflict with presumption that guest took ordinary care, making question for jury (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2055, 1963, subd. 4).

11. Negligence ⚡93(1) — Negligence of driver — Imputation to guest.

Negligence of automobile driver in driving in front of approaching train could not be imputed to deceased guest.

The evidence disclosed that the automobile driver was in sole control of the automobile, and that guest was in no degree responsible for the automobile being driven in front of the approaching train.

12. Automobiles ⚡245(87) — Railroads ⚡350(21) — Automobile guest — Railroad crossing accident — Contributory negligence — Question for jury.

Contributory negligence of deceased automobile guest struck at railroad crossing held for jury in action against automobile driver and railroad.

The evidence disclosed that automobile was stopped at crossing to permit freight train to pass on side track, and that after freight train had passed the driver drove automobile over side track and was struck by approaching train on main line.

13. Death ⚡11 — Action for wrongful death — Widow and children — Statute.

Widow's and children's right to maintain action for death of husband and father is statutory (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

14. Death ⚡9 — Liability for death of guest — Limiting statute — Effect — "Gross negligence."

Statute limiting liability of automobile driver and owner for wrongful death of guest, except for "gross negligence," held not to destroy right under wrongful death statute; "gross negligence" being defined as want of slight diligence. (California Vehicle Act, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

California Vehicle Act, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, relieves automobile owner or driver of liability for death of guest, except in case of death resulting from intoxication, willful misconduct, or gross negligence of the owner or driver.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Gross Negligence," see Words and Phrases.]

15. Automobiles ⚡244(20) — Death of guest — Gross negligence of driver — Evidence — Sufficiency.

In action for death of automobile guest in railroad crossing accident, evidence held to make prima facie case of gross negligence against driver (California Vehicle Act, § 141¾, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

16. Constitutional law ⚡186 — Retroactive laws — Power of Legislature.

Legislature has power to pass retroactive laws which do not impair obligations of contracts or disturb vested rights.

17. Constitutional law ⚡23 — Statutes ⚡263 — Retroactive construction — Express declaration — Necessary implication.

No statute or constitutional provision will be construed as to give it retroactive effect, to divest vested rights, or affect pending litigation, unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied.

CURTIS, J.

The general facts in this case were correctly stated in our former opinion (276 P. 338, 339) rendered in this court. This statement of facts is as follows:

"This appeal is taken from a judgment for defendants upon a directed verdict returned by the jury in an action brought by the widow and four minor sons of Robert S. Smellie, deceased, to recover damages for the death of said decedent, who was killed when the automobile truck in which he was riding as the guest of defendant L. Ireland, the driver and owner thereof, was struck by a train of defendant Southern Pacific Company. The court held at the conclusion of plaintiffs' case that the evidence established as a matter of law contributory negligence on the part of said decedent, and directed a verdict to be returned in favor of defendants. The correctness of this ruling is here challenged.

"The accident occurred at about 5 o'clock p. m. on June 25, 1926, in the city of Madera. The truck in which decedent was riding * * * was of the Reo manufacture, and was used by Ireland in a general trucking business conducted by him. Ireland was called by plaintiffs as their witness under the provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. He testified that he turned off the state highway, on which he had been traveling in a northerly direction, into Ninth street. The situs of the accident seems to have been in an outlying district of the city of Madera. He proceeded easterly on Ninth street to a point between 20 and 25 feet from the westerly rail of a side track of defendant Southern Pacific Company which intersects Ninth street, and there brought his car to a stop to permit a freight train to pass. No signal of any kind was maintained at the intersection. The freight train was moving south at a speed of 5 or 6 miles an hour, and 6 or 8 cars remained to pass the intersection when Ireland brought his truck to a stop. East of the side track and parallel thereto was the main line track of the Southern Pacific Company. The distance between the center line of the side track and the center line of the main track was 13 feet. Both Ireland and decedent had resided in Madera for many years, and Ireland testified as to his familiarity with the crossing. Doubtless the decedent was also generally familiar with existing conditions. The moment the caboose, which was the rear car of the freight train, cleared the crossing, Ireland started his truck and crossed the side track, and, in an attempt to cross the main track, the auto-truck was struck by the Fresno Flyer, north bound, which was traveling on the main track at a rate of speed estimated to be about 55 miles an hour. The accident happened so quickly that not more than an interval of a second intervened between the time Ireland saw the train and the time his truck was hit by it. He looked before starting, but the outgoing freight train blocked a view of the main track, and consequently his view to the south was obstructed, and he did not see the approaching passenger train. He listened, but did not hear the passenger train because of the noise made by the passing freight train. The distance which the passenger train traveled before it could be brought to a stop furnishes some evidence as to the speed at which it was moving. Upon cross-examination by counsel for the codefendant Southern Pacific Company, Ireland testified that both he and Smellie looked before Ireland started the truck, and Smellie, who was seated by his side, said, 'It's all clear; let's go.' The testimony of Ireland was not contradicted by that of any other witness. Respondents did not offer any evidence in their own behalf, but, upon the conclusion of plaintiffs' case, made motions for nonsuits and directed verdicts, and the court granted the motions for directed verdicts, upon which the judgment appealed from was entered."

In granting defendants' motion for a directed verdict, the trial judge expressly stated that he discarded entirely the testimony of the defendant Ireland, that deceased had said to him just before the truck was started on its fatal trip across the railroad tracks, "It's all clear, let's go." He based his order for a directed verdict upon the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence to have existed at and immediately prior to the collision, leaving entirely out of consideration the statement of Ireland that the deceased had said, "It's all clear, let's go." The trial judge disregarded this testimony of Ireland, for the reason, as stated by him, that the jury in the case, if the cause should be submitted to them for decision, had the right, if they disbelieved the testimony of Ireland, to reject the whole of it. Notwithstanding the fact that the trial court disregarded the statement of Ireland as to what the deceased said just prior to the collision, the respondents have insisted during all the stages of this appeal that the statement attributed to the deceased by the defendant Ireland was not only properly before the court, but that it of itself furnished sufficient legal grounds to justify the order of the trial court directing a verdict in favor of the respondents. In so doing, however, respondents have not abandoned the ground upon which the trial court granted said motion, and they still insist that the order granting a directed verdict should be affirmed, irrespective of any question of this testimony of the defendant Ireland.

In our former opinion, which was first rendered in department ([Cal. Sup.] 269 P. 657), and thereafter and on rehearing adopted by the court in bank ([Cal. Sup.] 276 P. 338), the judgment was affirmed upon the ground that the evidence before the court, inclusive of that given by the defendant Ireland as to the last words of the deceased, showed, as a matter of law, that said deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. The rendition of this opinion brought forth, not only a petition for a rehearing from the appellants and an answer thereto by the respondents, but numerous amici curiæ have been granted permission, and have taken advantage of such leave, to file briefs in support of the respective contentions of the parties hereto.

The legal battle thus waged by these various participants has centered around Ireland's testimony as to the decedent's last words, "It's all clear, let's go," and the force and effect to be given to this testimony. The appellants, and those amici curiæ arrayed on the side of the appellants, contend that the testimony of Ireland in this regard only produced a conflict in the evidence upon the question of whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore it was the duty of the court to disregard this conflict and submit the case to the decision of the jury. The basis of this argument by the appellants, and those allied with them, is that the plaintiffs at the trial in the lower court were entitled to avail themselves of the presumption that the deceased took ordinary care of his own concerns (section 1963, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.), and that the testimony of Ireland as to the statement made by the deceased only produced a conflict in the evidence, which conflict, upon a motion for a directed verdict, the court was in duty bound to disregard and submit the issue thus tendered to the consideration of the jury.

On the contrary, the respondents, and those amici curiæ supporting the cause of the respondents, contend that the presumption relied upon by appellants, being merely a disputable presumption, was entirely overcome and dispelled by the testimony of Ireland, and therefore that the undisputed evidence before the trial court showed that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, in that he advised Ireland that the way was clear and that they should proceed to cross the railroad tracks. Accordingly, the respondents and those amici curiæ insist that the order of the trial court in directing a verdict upon this state of the evidence was proper, and that the judgment based thereon should be affirmed.

[1] The question is, therefore, directly raised and presented as to whether this presumption, that the deceased exercised due care for his safety, has been overcome and dispelled as a matter of law by the testimony of Ireland. That a presumption is evidence and may in certain cases outweigh positive evidence adduced against it has long been the settled law of this state. People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 P. 833; Sarraille v. Calmon, 142 Cal. 651, 76 P. 497; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 95 P. 863; Pabst v. Shearer, 172 Cal. 239, 156 P. 466; Thompson v. Davis, 172 Cal. 491, 157 P. 595; Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066; Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 204 P. 393; Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269; Pacific Portland Cement Co. v. Reincke, 30 Cal. App. 501, 158 P. 1041; Grant-ham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 182 P. 73, 76.

A few quotations from the foregoing authorities will, we think, remove all doubt from this question. In People v. Milner, supra, at page 179 of 122 Cal., 54 P. 833, 837, the court said: "Against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a disputable presumption has no weight; but, where it is undertaken to prove the fact against the presumption, it still remains with the jury to say whether or not the fact has been proven, and, if they are not satisfied with the proof offered in its support, they are at liberty to accept the evidence of the presumption." In Sarraille v. Calmon, supra, at page 655 of 142 Cal., 76 P. 497, 498, the court said: "The presumption of nonpayment arising from possession of uncanceled notes, admittedly executed by defendant, was evidence that they were not paid, and produced a conflict with the evidence of defendant's witnesses." In People v. Siemsen, supra, at page 390 of 153 Cal., 95 P. 863, 865, we find the following language: "But the court, in determining whether or not to accept Mr. Greeley's testimony, had a right to consider the presumptions raised by law. One of these is that 'official duty has been regularly performed'; another that 'a writing is truly dated.' * * * These presumptions, while disputable, are in themselves evidence (citing authorities) and will support a finding made in accordance with them, even though there be evidence to the contrary." In Pabst v. Shearer, supra, at page 242 of 172 Cal., 156 P. 466, 467, this court stated the rule as follows: "It must be remembered that a presumption declared by statute, although disputable, is itself evidence, and that it is for the trial court to say whether the evidence offered to overthrow the presumption has sufficient weight to effect that purpose." In Thompson v. Davis, supra, at page 493 of 172 Cal., 157 P. 595, 596, this court again said: "Under the express provision of section 164 of the Civil Code, as that section has read since the year 1897, such deed to the wife raised the presumption that the title was thereby vested in her as her separate property. This presumption is, to be sure, not conclusive. 'It may be overcome by evidence sufficient to satisfy the court that the property in question, although conveyed to the wife, was in fact community property.' (Citing authority.) But the presumption, 'although disputable, is itself evidence, and * * * it is for the trial court to say whether the evidence offered to overthrow the presumption has sufficient weight to effect that purpose.'" In Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., supra, at page 24 of 188 Cal., 204 P. 393, 395, this court sustained an instruction in the following words: "The presumption is that every man obeys the law and the presumption in this case is that the plaintiff was traveling at a lawful rate of speed and on the proper side of the highway at all times. This presumption is in itself a species of evidence and it shall prevail and control your deliberations until and unless it is overcome by satisfactory evidence." In Pacific Portland Cement Co. v. Reinecke, supra, at page 504 of 30 Cal. App.,

158 P. 1041, 1043, we find the following language: "The presumptive evidence of the time of the making of the indorsement and guaranty and the consideration therefor may be resorted to in aid of the findings even though it be assumed, as counsel for the defendant contends, that it stands alone and was opposed by direct evidence to the contrary. The general rule that as against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a disputable presumption has no weight, is subject to the exception that where, as in the present case, an endeavor is made to establish a fact contrary to the presumption, the fact in dispute still remains to be determined upon a consideration of all of the evidence including the presumption." In Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, supra, at page 7 of 190 Cal., 210 P. 269, 272, this court has again said: "There seems to be some confusion in the decisions of this state with respect to the extent to which under various circumstances presumptions of law are to be regarded as evidence of facts. The Code expressly declares them to be evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1957, 1963), and admonishes the trial judge to instruct the jury on all proper occasions 'that they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a * * * presumption.' Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2. Among the decisions of this court recognizing and applying the foregoing rule may be mentioned the following: Sarraille v. Calmon, 142 Cal. 651, 76 P. 497; Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19, 77 P. 712; Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 723, 91 P. 616; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 390, 95 P. 863; Freese v. Hibernia Sav., etc., Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 73 P. 172; Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066."

[2] The presumption, therefore, that the deceased exercised ordinary care for his safety was evidence in the present action in favor of the plaintiffs. Did the testimony of defendant Ireland, which was contradictory to this presumption merely produce a conflict in the evidence, or did it entirely overcome and dispel it?

In the case of Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, supra, this court held that, where a fact is proved against a party relying on the presumption "by the uncontradicted testimony of the party himself or of his witnesses, under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony is the product of mistake or inadvertence; and that, when the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, the latter is dispelled and disappears from the case." From the rule thus enunciated in this last-cited case, it would appear that a fact which will dispel a presumption as a matter of law can only be proven by the admission or testimony of the party relying on the presumption, or by his witnesses.

In the present action, as already stated, Ireland, although examined by the plaintiff, was called under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section reads as follows: "A party to the record of any civil action or proceeding or a person for whose immediate benefit such action or proceeding is prosecuted or defended, or the directors, officers, superintendent or managing agent of any corporation which is a party to the record, may be examined by the adverse party as if under cross-examination, subject to the rules applicable to the examination of other witnesses. The party calling such adverse witness shall not be bound by his testimony, and the testimony given by such witness may be rebutted by the party calling him for such examination by other evidence. Such witness when so called, may be examined by his own counsel, but only as to the matters testified to on such examination."

It will be noted that this section provides in the first place that a party to the record "may be examined by the adverse party as if under cross-examination." Furthermore, "the party calling such adverse witness shall not be bound by his testimony, and the testimony given by such witness may be rebutted by the party calling him for such examination by other evidence."

[3, 4] This section of the Code was enacted in 1917. Prior to its enactment, a party might call an adverse party as a witness if he desired to do so, but he was obliged to call him as his own witness, and he was bound by his testimony in the same manner and to the same extent as he was by other witnesses called by him. This rule often worked a hardship on litigants, and often prevented the true facts of the case from being brought out in the evidence. It was to temper the rigor of this rule that section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure was enacted. It is a statute remedial in character, and as such should receive a construction by the courts which will carry into effect and accomplish the intent and purpose of the Legislature in enacting it. This intent was, as we read the section, to enable a party to an action to call an adverse party as a witness for the purpose of eliciting such facts as said witness may testify to which are favorable to the party calling him, without being bound by any adverse testimony which said witness may give. Only by such construction can the full remedial purposes of said legislation be effected. Not only so, but we think the express terms of said section clearly and plainly indicate that such was the purpose of the Legislature in the enactment of said section. As before noted, the adverse party, when called as a witness, is examined by the party calling him "as if under cross-examination" and the party calling him "shall not be bound by his testimony." It is difficult to conceive of language more direct and explicit. It can have but one meaning, in our opinion, and that is the meaning which we have above given to it. Such a witness does not stand in the same relation to the party calling him as does a witness who is called under ordinary conditions. He is more in the nature of a witness of the adverse party. A party is expressly forbidden to cross-examine his own witness, but when he calls an adverse party as a witness he is expressly given the right to examine him under the rules of cross-examination. A party calling a witness under the ordinary rules of procedure is bound by the testimony of such witness, but by the express provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, the very opposite rule prevails. Such a witness has none of the characteristics of a witness called by a party under the ordinary rules of procedure, but many of the characteristics of a witness called by the adverse party.

This construction of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, is not new in this state. In Cioli v. Kenourgios, 59 Cal. App. 690, 697, 211 P. 838, 841, the present question was before the court, and it was held: "The fact that plaintiff called the alleged conspirators to the witness stand did not compel approval by him of their testimony. He could use their appearance on the stand, their words, their acts—in fact anything they could furnish in his favor, and reject the rest. The salutary provision of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure * * * was designed to prevent as far as possible parties to an action from perpetrating fraud and dishonesty. It strips them of former barriers used for shielding falsehood."

In the case of Grantham v. Ordway, supra, the plaintiff called as a witness one of the defendants, Ordway, under said section 2055. The action was one to recover damages for injuries sustained in an automobile accident, and was brought against said Ordway and the Pacific Acreage Company. The automobile was owned by the company, but was driven by its codefendant Ordway at the time of the accident. Ordway testified that he was on business of his own at the time of the accident, and that he was in no way acting for the company or transacting business for the company at the time. The trial court granted a nonsuit, and on appeal the judgment was reversed. A petition to have the case heard by the Supreme Court was denied. This case is on all fours with the present action. It was written by Chief Justice Waste, then presiding justice of said District Court of Appeal and was concurred in by Justice Richards, then on said court, and Justice Nourse, acting temporarily as a justice of said court. As to the construction to be placed on section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, the court said: "Furthermore, plaintiff is not bound by Ordway's testimony. 'A party to the record of any civil action * * * may be examined by the adverse party as if under cross-examination, subject to the rules applicable to the examination of other witnesses. The party calling such adverse witness shall not be bound by his testimony, and the testimony given by such witness may be rebutted by the party calling him for such examination by other evidence.'"

That case is of further importance by reason of its ruling upon the question of whether the testimony of Ordway destroyed the presumption that the automobile was being used for the benefit of the Pacific Acreage Company by reason of its ownership thereof at the time of the accident. Upon this phase of that case the court said: "The automobile being admitted to belong to the defendant Pacific Acreage Company, a presumption arose that it was used for its benefit and on its own account. That presumption was not destroyed as matter of law by the testimony of defendant Ordway. 'Even though his explanation of the use of the car would absolve him, if credited, the question of whether it should be credited was one of fact for the jury.' (Citing authorities.)" On this same subject the court in that case also said: "Whenever, under a given state of facts a presumption arises, such presumption is itself evidence. Courts and jurors are not bound to decide in conformity with the declaration of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a less number, or against a presumption, or other evidence, satisfying their minds. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2. A presumption, even if disputable, will raise a conflict which is sufficient to support a finding made in accordance therewith, even though there be evidence to the contrary. Whether a presumption has been controverted is a question of fact. (Citing authorities.)"

The effect of evidence given by an adverse party under section 2055 was commented on by this court in the recent case of Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 679, 269 P. 329, 532. In that case we said: "While the two trainmen, who were called for cross-examination under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, testified that they gave the required signals, both by ringing the bell and sounding the whistle, the plaintiffs, especially upon a motion for a nonsuit, would not be concluded by their evidence; it being the duty of the court upon a motion for a nonsuit to accept the evidence most favorable to the plaintiffs."

As opposed to the foregoing rule and the authorities cited in support thereof, the respondents rely principally upon the case of Figari v. Olcese, 184 Cal. 775, 195 P. 425, 428, 15 A. L. R. 192, but we find nothing in that case contrary to the views hereinbefore expressed, or to the authorities last cited. In that case the court held, upon the trial of an action in which the evidence had been produced by the calling of an adverse witness under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the evidence of such witness might be given its proper weight in the final determination of the issues of the case. As bearing out our construction of said section, this court in that case held: "In other words, such testimony is to be treated as though given on cross-examination."

Neither do we think that in any of the following cases, cited by respondent, is there anything to be found which is contrary to the construction we have placed upon section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure: Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., 39 Cal. App. 738, 179 P. 697; Preo v. Roed (Cal. App.) 278 P. 92; Andrews v. Waldo (Cal. Sup.) 272 P. 1052; Heiter v. Hirschfeld (Cal. Sup.) 271 P. 1051; Koster v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 788. In Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., supra, and in Koster v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., supra, no reference is made to section 2055. While in the other cases witnesses were called under said section, no question was presented nor discussed in the opinion of any of these cases as to the force and effect of such evidence against a disputable presumption.

[5-7] Our conclusion, therefore, is that the testimony of a witness called under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not, when weighing it against a presumption, to be considered, nor is it really, evidence of the party calling such witness, and that the evidence thus produced does not dispel a presumption contrary thereto, but in favor of the party calling such adverse witness. This testimony is, of course, evidence in the case and may be considered in determining the issues of the case upon the trial or final hearing by the court, or, if the case is before a jury, by the jury. When the action is before a jury, however, the duty of weighing this evidence is with the jury and not with the court upon a motion for a nonsuit or directed verdict.

[8] Besides, the testimony of Ireland has certain elements of weakness which render it of doubtful probative value, and which, we think, presents additional reasons why it should not, as a matter of law, be held to be conclusive of the fact to which it relates. In the first place it is the testimony of an adverse party, and a jury may disregard the testimony of such a witness as against a presumption if the latter satisfies them. Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 19, 77 P. 712; Everett v. Standard Accident Insurance Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 187 P. 996; Keating v. Morrissey, 6 Cal. App. 163, 91 P. 677.

Then again the testimony of Ireland related to a declaration of another person. Evidence of the declarations or oral admissions of a party are always received with caution. Code Civ. Proc., § 2061, subd. 4. The reason for this rule is that: "In most cases it is impossible, however honest the witness may be, for him to give the exact words in which the declaration or admission was made. Sometimes even the transposition of the words of a party may give a meaning entirely different from that which was intended to be conveyed. The slightest mistake or failure of recollection may totally alter the effect of the declaration or admission." 10 Cal. Jur., p. 1081; Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, 44, 85 Am. Dec. 157.

A third inherent weakness to be found in the testimony of Ireland is that it purports to give the statements or declarations of a deceased person. Regarding testimony of this character, this court said: "The evidence is of oral admissions against interest by a man whose lips are sealed in death. What then does the law say of such evidence (assuming now its admissibility)? The Code of Civil Procedure declares (2061, subd. 4) that the evidence of oral admissions of a party ought to be received with caution by the jury. In Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 P. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87, this court in bank said, 'no weaker kind of testimony could be produced.' Again in bank (Austin v. Wilcoxson, 149 Cal. 24, 84 P. 417) this court has said: 'It is not stating it too strongly to say that evidence so given under such circumstances must appear to any court to be in its nature the weakest and most unsatisfactory.'" Estate of Emerson, 175 Cal. 724, 727, 167 P. 149, 151. We might go on and cite many other authorities, but the above are sufficient for our present purpose. To invoke a rule which would deprive a party of the right to have a jury pass upon the weight of evidence of this character would be contrary to an unbroken line of decisions of this court, and its effect would be in many instances to deprive a party to an action of the right, guaranteed to him by the law of this state, to a trial by jury.

[9, 10] We are, therefore, of the opinion that the testimony of Ireland, as against the presumption that the deceased took ordinary care of his own concerns, was not sufficient as a matter of law to dispel said presumption, but, on the other hand, merely tended to create a conflict with said presumption, which it was the right of the appellants to have passed upon by the jury in its final deliberations, and not by the court on a motion for a directed verdict.

The respondent, the Southern Pacific Company, contends that, as between it and the appellants, the testimony of Ireland must be regarded as evidence of the appellants, and, therefore, under the rule enunciated in Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, supra, it entirely overcame and dispelled the presumption of due care on the part of the deceased. Said respondent cites no authority to support this contention, and we think to assent to it would be to place an unauthorized limitation upon the remedial provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

However, both the respondents contend that, aside from the testimony of Ireland, the evidence conclusively shows that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in not avoiding the danger which was apparent to him from the presence of the railroad track.

[11, 12] We have already set forth a general statement of facts in the first part of this opinion. There are minor details not included in the foregoing general statement, but we do not think that it will be necessary to set the evidence out more fully than has already been done. From the facts as they are contained in the record, it appears that the defendant Ireland was in sole control of the truck in which he and the deceased were riding just prior to and at the time of the collision; that the deceased was merely a guest of Ireland; and that the deceased was in no degree responsible for Ireland's driving his truck in front of the approaching train. Under such circumstances the negligence of Ireland cannot be imputed to the deceased. Carpenter v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 51 Cal. App. 60, 195 P. 1073; Ilardi v. Central California T. Co., 36 Cal. App. 488, 172 P. 763; Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319; Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 85 P. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059; Tousley v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 457, 137 P. 31; Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 679, 269 P. 529. It follows, therefore, that there must have been some act performed by the deceased, or a failure to do some act required of him, which proximately contributed to his death, before he could be held to be guilty of contributory negligence. The evidence is silent as to any overt act on the part of the deceased, aside from the statement of Ireland already quoted, which, in the least degree, can be said to show that the deceased was guilty of negligence. As to his failure to take the precautions which a person of ordinary prudence would take in the position in which he was placed in order to avoid the danger incident to the crossing of the railroad track under the circumstances shown, we think the evidence is far from satisfactory. There is no evidence that he did not look and listen for the train; in fact, the evidence is to the contrary. Ireland, after the freight train had passed, according to his own statement as shown in evidence, "pulled right in behind the caboose" and started across the tracks. The distance between the center lines of the two tracks was only thirteen feet. Ireland after starting the last time did not stop until he was on the main track when he was hit by the north-bound train. It must all have happened in a very few seconds of time. Of course, as respondents suggest, the deceased might have stepped from the car before Ireland started it up the last time. But there is no evidence that he then knew, or had any reason to believe, that Ireland intended to cross the tracks without looking for the approaching train. If he were ever aware of Ireland's intention to cross the main track in front of the train, it must have been only an instant before Ireland actually drove upon the main track. It was evidently then too late for him to leave the machine or to otherwise avoid the danger. Under these circumstances, we seriously doubt whether the action of the deceased just preceding the collision amounted as a matter of law to contributory negligence on his part. In the recent case of Shields v. King (Cal. Sup.) 277 P. 1043, 1044, we quoted with approval the following rule enunciated in prior decisions of this court: "The duty of a passenger to remonstrate against excessive speed or to withdraw from the vehicle, a reasonable opportunity therefor being afforded, is not absolute, the question whether by failing to do either he is wanting in ordinary care being dependent upon the circumstances of the particular case."

"Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury. * * * In all other cases the question of contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury." Flores v. Fitzgerald, 204 Cal. 374, 268 P. 369, 370; Borland v. Key System Transit Co. (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 194.

The respondents, in support of their contention that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, cite the two cases of Heitman v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 10 Cal. App. 397, 102 P. 15, and Barnett v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 278 P. 443. In the first of these two cases, the deceased and one Caseboom were associated in the transfer business. They were riding together in a wagon drawn by a pair of mules with Caseboom driving. They drove upon the railroad tracks of the defendant, and a collision occurred between the car of the defendant and the wagon in which Caseboom and the deceased were riding. It was conceded in that case "that the negligence of the driver of the mules is to be imputed to and regarded as the act of the deceased." In view of this admission, the only question passed upon by the court in that case was whether or not the driver was guilty of negligence. That case, therefore, can have no bearing upon the question before us, which concerns entirely the negligence of one who was riding as a guest.

In the case of Barnett v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., supra, five men were in an automobile, one of whom was driving said machine. They were all held to be guilty of contributory negligence. In that case, however, the automobile was being backed upon the railroad track by the driver at a speed of about five miles per hour. All of the men were perfectly familiar with the conditions surrounding the crossing and knew of the frequency of trains on the track. The bell of the engine was ringing continuously. Six or seven hundred feet from the crossing the engineer had blown the station whistle, and, when the automobile was approximately fifteen feet from the track, the engineer sounded four sharp warning whistles. While they were thus approaching the crossing, the driver was looking to the left and to the rear of his machine. The three men in the rear seat of the machine had their heads down and were examining some minnows in a sack on the floor of the machine. None of them either looked or listened for an approaching train before their machine was driven onto the railroad track, or took any other precaution whatever to observe the danger into which they were being driven. Parks, who was not a party to said action, and who was on the front seat with the driver, observed the train and called to his companions to jump. He jumped free of the machine and was not injured. The three men in the rear seat and the driver were seriously injured and three of them died as a result of their injuries. No mention of the rule applicable to guests is to be found in that entire case. The four men injured were treated as if they were equally guilty of negligence. The uncontradicted evidence shows that none of these made any attempt whatever to ascertain the presence of the train upon the track or to escape from the danger into which they were heedlessly running. Furthermore, we think the evidence in that case shows that all five of these men were interested in a common venture, and that the driver of the machine was simply acting as the representative of the others.

Neither of these cases, in our opinion, are applicable to the facts in the present action. The facts before us do not, we think, point unerringly to the negligence of the deceased. On the other hand, they show that, as far as the deceased was concerned, he did nothing to bring upon himself the injury which resulted in his death. It is problematical whether he could have taken any action, after he realized he was in danger, which would have enabled him to escape from injury. Under these circumstances, we think it was for the jury to say as a matter of fact, and not for the court to hold as a matter of law, whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

On behalf of the respondent Ireland, it is further argued that by the recent amendment of the California Vehicle Act, whereby a new section known as section 141¾ was added to said act, appellants' cause of action against Ireland, if any ever existed, has abated. Section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 1580) was enacted at the recent meeting of the Legislature and became effective August 14, 1929. It reads in part as follows:

"Any person who as a guest accepts a ride in any vehicle, moving upon any of the public highways of the State of California, and while so riding as such guest receives or sustains an injury, shall have no right of recovery against the owner or driver or person responsible for the operation of such vehicle. In the event that such person while so riding as such guest is killed, or dies as a result of injury sustained while so riding as such guest, then neither the estate nor the legal representatives or heirs of such guest shall have any right of recovery against the driver or owner of said vehicle by reason of the death of the said guest. * * *

"Nothing in this section contained shall be construed as relieving the owner or driver or person responsible for the operation of a vehicle from liability for injury to or death of such guest proximately resulting from the intoxication, wilful misconduct, or gross negligence of such owner, driver or person responsible for the operation of such vehicle; provided, that in any action for death or for injury or damage to person or property by or on behalf of a guest or the estate, heirs or legal representatives of such guest, the burden shall be upon plaintiff to establish that such intoxication, wilful misconduct or gross negligence was the proximate cause of such death or injury or damage.

"For the purpose of this section the term 'guest' is hereby defined as being a person who accepts a ride in any vehicle without giving compensation therefor."

[13-15] The present action was instituted, and the appeal from the judgment therein was perfected long prior to the enactment of said section 141½. Appellants' right to maintain this action is statutory and arises by virtue of the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No such right of action existed under the common law. 8 Cal. Jur. pp. 948 to 951; Clark v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 527, 150 P. 357, L. R. A. 1916A, 1142; Dickinson v. Southern Pacific Co., 172 Cal. 727, 730, 158 P. 183; McLaughlin v. United Railroads, 169 Cal. 494, 147 P. 149, L. R. A. 1915E, 1205, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 337. Section 377 gives to the heirs or personal representative of a person killed by the wrongful act of another a right of action for damages against the person causing his death. The right of action given under said section of the Code is based upon the want of ordinary care on the part of the person wrongfully causing the death of the person killed. By section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act, above quoted, when the person killed by the wrongful act of another is riding at the time as a guest of the party causing his death, the latter is liable in damages only in case of his own intoxication, wilful misconduct, or gross negligence. This section of the act must, therefore, be held to be a limitation upon the right to sue for the death of one killed by the wrongful act of another given by section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It does not, however, deprive the heirs or legal representatives of the right to sue for the death of the person wrongfully killed while riding as a guest of another, but only requires proof of a greater degree of negligence, that is, gross negligence, or wilful misconduct, or intoxication. Gross negligence has been defined to be "the want of slight diligence." Redington v. Pacific P. T. C. Co., 107 Cal. 317, 40 P. 432, 48 Am. St. Rep. 132; Walther v. Southern Pacific Co., 159 Cal. 769, 775, 116 P. 51, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 769. Undoubtedly the appellants in this action made out at least a prima facie case of gross negligence against the respondent Ireland. If the deceased were not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, then the appellants have made out a case for the jury even under section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act. It is true the appellants did not plead gross negligence as against the respondent Ireland, but in the event of another trial the appellants should be permitted to so amend their complaint as to bring themselves within the terms of said section 141½. Especially should this privilege be accorded them in view of the state of evidence before us which makes out a prima facie case of gross negligence against the respondent Ireland.

[16-18] Appellants insist, however, that the provisions of section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act are not retroactive, and that they have no application to pending actions, or to any cause of action which arose prior to the going into effect of said section. We find the general rule upon this section stated as follows: "While the legislature has power to pass retroactive laws which do not impair the obligations of contracts or disturb vested rights, yet it is established, not only as a doctrine of the common law, but as a principle of general jurisprudence, that no statute or constitutional provision shall be so construed as to give it a retroactive effect, to divest individuals of rights vested previous to its passage, or to affect pending litigation, unless such intent is expressly declared, or necessarily implied in the language of the provision to be construed." 5 Cal. Jur., p. 750. The rule thus enunciated finds support in the following decisions from the courts of this state: Montecito County Water District v. Doulton, 193 Cal. 398, 224 P. 747; East Bay Municipal Utility District v. Garrison, 191 Cal. 680, 218 P. 43; Estate of Frees, 187 Cal. 150, 201 P. 112; Vanderbilt v. All Persons, 163 Cal. 507, 126 P. 158; Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 123 P. 276, Ann. Cas.

1913C, 1392; Bascomb v. Davis, 56 Cal. 152; State Commission in Lunacy v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 129 P. 974; James v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 785, 103 P. 1082. "It is a canon of interpretation that statutes are not to be given a retrospective operation unless it is clearly made to appear that such was the legislative intention." In re Matter of Clyde E. Cate (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 131, 133.

We find nothing in section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act from which we can draw the slightest indication that its provisions should operate retroactively. In fact, the entire phraseology of the section indicates an intention to apply said section to actions which might arise after its enactment and effective date.

Respondent Ireland relies upon the case of Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90, and People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148, in support of his contention that, by virtue of the change in the law, applicable to appellants' right of action, the same has abated. The action of Moss v. Smith, supra, was brought against the directors of a corporation to recover under section 309 of the Civil Code, which makes participating directors liable for debts of the corporation created in excess of its subscribed capital stock. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained on the ground that, after the creation of said excessive indebtedness, section 309 of the Civil Code was amended in so far as it contained inhibitions against the creation by public utility corporations of indebtedness in excess of their authorized or subscribed capital stock, and providing that the provisions of said section should have no application to public utility corporations. The corporation of which the defendants were directors, and as such they were alleged to have created said excessive indebtedness, was a railroad corporation, and was therefore a public utility corporation. It was held that section 309 of the Civil Code "is highly punitive so far as the directors are concerned," and that the amendment of the Code section, making it inapplicable to public utility corporations, destroyed the right of action against the directors, as the repealing statute contained no saving clause. In People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, supra, according to the syllabus, it was held that, "where a judgment rendered under the Banking Act of 1903, declaring a defendant bank insolvent and ordering it into involuntary liquidation, had been affirmed on direct appeal therefrom and thus become final, the subsequent repeal of such statute by the Banking Act of 1909, pending an appeal from an order refusing a new trial of the action in which the judgment was rendered, without supersedeas or stay-bond, does not have the effect to destroy the judgment, nor necessitate the dismissal of the action in which it was rendered." These cases we think can be readily differentiated from the present case. Moss v. Smith, supra, was an action to recover a penalty and was punitive in character. The present action is one to recover compensatory damages only. A much stricter construction is always given to statutes which have for their purpose the infliction of a penalty, than to those which merely give a right of action for injuries actually sustained. In People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, supra, it was held that the repealing statute did not apply to the judgment involved therein. In each of these cases there is to be found language which by itself would tend to support respondent's contention, but such language was not necessary to the decision in which it was rendered, and therefore cannot be held to possess any great authoritative value.

In the recent case of Krause v. Rarity (Cal. App.) 285 P. 879, the effect of the enactment of section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act upon pending litigation was directly in issue, and it was there held that said statute was not retroactive and, therefore, had no bearing upon actions that were pending at the effective date of said section. We are in accord with the conclusion reached by the court in that cause.

For the reasons stated herein the judgment is reversed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; LANGDON, J.; SHENK, J.

I dissent: RICHARDS, J.

SEAWELL, J. (concurring).

I concur in the judgment upon the sole ground that there is evidence in the record to the effect that the driver of the automobile stopped, looked, and listened before he attempted to cross the railroad track under such existing circumstances that his going forward thereafter cannot be said to constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law.

PRESTON, J. (concurring).

I concur in the conclusion reached in this case. I concur also in the reasoning advanced to show that the testimony of defendant Ireland was not of that clear, positive, and unimpeachable character that as a matter of law dispelled the presumption that the deceased took ordinary care of his own concerns. Section 1963, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.

But I am unable to concur in so much of the opinion as restricts the source from which the testimony must arise which would dispel the presumption. In my view of the law it makes no difference whether the testimony arises from plaintiff's own case or from an examination of the defendant under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure or from defendant's own showing. The question, and the sole question, is: Does the evidence meet the test as to strength and reliability sufficiently to overcome the presumption in question? The holding in the foregoing opinion seems to be that the evidence must arise either from admissions or the testimony of the parties relying upon the presumption. I see no reason for any such restriction of the rule.

For example, suppose the cause of action in favor of plaintiff depended upon the ineligible alienage of the defendant, and that he was compelled to and did rely solely upon the statutory presumption arising from the fact that defendant was a member of an ineligible race of people; yet if defendant upon examination under said section 2055, or as a part of his own case, showed to the court that he was born in the United States, or that he enlisted in the military forces of the country, thereby obtaining citizenship, and there was nothing to throw suspicion upon the authenticity of his birth certificate or his certificate of citizenship, could it be said that the presumption in favor of plaintiff had not been overcome? My view is that in such a case the presumption in favor of plaintiff would be entirely dispelled.

In fact, the case of Clendenning v. Parker, 69 Cal. App. 685, 231 P. 765, furnishes a concrete illustration of the position I am contending for. It appears that there Michael Haley and wife lived together as such in the city of Seattle from November 22, 1915, the date of their marriage, until the latter part of September, 1916, when Mrs. Haley went to Los Angeles. On the 9th day of October, 1916, and only a few days after she left Seattle, a marriage ceremony was performed between herself and the defendant Parker. The records of the courts of the county in which the city of Seattle was situated were examined and showed that no proceeding for a divorce or annulment of her marriage with Michael Haley had ever been instituted in said court. She had not lived in California sufficiently long to have acquired the right to institute an action for divorce. It was held, therefore, that the presumption of the legality of the marriage of Mrs. Haley with defendant Parker had been completely rebutted and overcome by the evidence that no decree of divorce had ever been granted as between Mrs. Haley and her husband Michael Haley. In that case the evidence was so clear and convincing that it amounted to practically a demonstration that the pretended marriage with defendant Parker was void, and it was therefore sufficient to dispel as a matter of law the presumption that such marriage was legal.

The above case, and perhaps other cases also, give clear proof of the wisdom of the rule which I here advocate.

Civ. 3787.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

April 4, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 3, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 2, 1930.

1. Automobiles $\S$ 181(1) — Liability to injured guest — Limiting statute — Retroactive effect.

Statute limiting liability of automobile driver and owner for injuries to guest held not retroactive and not applicable to cause of action arising before its adoption (California Vehicle Act, $\S$ 141 $\frac{3}{4}$, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580).

California Vehicle Act, $\S$ 141 $\frac{3}{4}$, as added by St. 1929, p. 1580, relieves automobile driver and owner of liability for injuries to guest, except in case of injuries arising from intoxication, willful misconduct, or gross negligence of driver or owner.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 204(1) — Competency of evidence — Questioning for first time on appeal.

Competency of evidence admitted without objection in trial court could not be questioned for first time on appeal.

3. Negligence $\S$ 108(1) — Pleading.

Negligence may be pleaded in general terms.

4. Negligence $\S$ 108(2) — Complaint — Allegations of negligence — Sufficiency.

Complaint is sufficient if it alleges specific acts which constitute negligence complained of.

5. Automobiles $\S$ 238(5) — Injuries to automobile guest — Complaint — Sufficiency.

Automobile guest's complaint against driver and owner for injuries sustained when guest was thrown from seat to floor of automobile held to state cause of action.

The complaint stated that driver was operating automobile as agent of owner, and that the road over which the automobile was being driven was rough, rugged, bumpy, and jagged, that driver knew condition of road, that the automobile was operated in negligent and careless manner, in that driver operated automobile at excessive speed, and that guest riding in back seat was thrown to floor of automobile injuring her back.

6. Negligence $\S$ 136(10) — Conflicting evidence — Question for jury.

Negligence is for jury, where evidence is such that inferences may be drawn for or against existence thereof.

7. Automobiles ⇨245(24) — Injuries to guest — Negligence of driver — Question for jury.

Negligence of automobile driver held for jury, where guest had been thrown from back seat to floor of automobile and injured.

The evidence produced by the automobile guest was to the effect that the road at point where accident occurred was rough and full of potholes and ruts, that the culvert where guest was thrown from her seat was in bad shape, and at time of accident automobile was traveling at the rate of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour, and that the driver had been over road on several occasions and knew condition thereof.

8. Trial ⇨235(1) — Instructions — Evidence — Ambiguity.

Instruction that jury could not indulge in speculation, guess, or conjecture as to whether automobile driver's negligence caused injuries to guest, but in such event jury must find for defendants, held properly refused as ambiguous.

9. Automobiles ⇨246(20) — Instruction — Negligence of driver — Injury to guest.

Instruction that, in determining whether automobile driver used due care, as regards injury to guest, and drove automobile at reasonable speed, jury should consider all circumstances influencing conduct of ordinarily prudent driver, held proper.

The instruction was objected to because it omitted all reference to element of knowledge on part of driver as to condition of road, and failed to confine consideration of jury to condition of road as it was known to driver at time of accident.

10. Damages ⇨213 — Instruction — Recovery for aggravation of disease.

Instruction existence of disease would not prevent recovery by automobile guest from driver and owner, but recovery could be had for aggravation of disease, held proper.

The evidence disclosed that the guest's injured vertebra had been weakened by disease before accident, but that the accident broke down the diseased vertebra and necessitated an operation, resulting in permanently stiffened back.

11. Damages ⇨159(3) — Plea of general damages — Evidence as to earning capacity — Admissibility.

Under plea of general damages, evidence as to wages and earning capacity prior to personal injuries held admissible.

12. Evidence ⇨151(4) — Injuries to guest — Fast driving — Statement showing motive — Admissibility.

Testimony of automobile driver that her daughter at church was on her mind held admissible in guest's action for injuries as showing motive for fast driving.

13. Automobiles ⇨243(3) — Evidence — Condition of road — Injury to guest — Admissibility.

Admitting evidence that road for quarter of mile in approaching place of accident was rough held admissible, in guest's action for injuries.

14. Evidence ⇨474(8) — Guest — Competency as witness — Speed of automobile.

Automobile guest suing for injuries held competent to testify as to speed of automobile.

15. Automobiles ⇨244(30) — Wife using husband's automobile — Presumption of agency.

Proof that wife operated automobile with husband's consent created prima facie case authorizing inference that wife was using automobile as husband's agent.

16. Automobiles ⇨244(30) — Wife driving automobile — Agent of husband — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence that at time of accident wife was acting as husband's agent in driving automobile held sufficient to sustain judgment against husband, in guest's action for injuries.

The evidence disclosed that the husband had driven automobile to country club and turned automobile over to wife and requested her to call for him later in the day, and that, as wife was returning from country club, automobile guest was thrown from seat to floor of automobile and injured.

17. Damages ⇨132(3) — Personal injuries — Excessive award.

$12,500 for breaking down of diseased vertebra of woman, forty years of age, before injuries receiving $16 to 18 per week, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm O. Glenn, Judge.

Action by Mary Perry against Porter McLaughlin and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying motion for judgment notwithstanding verdict, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The original submission of this cause was set aside and a further hearing had in order that the effect of section 141¾ of the California Vehicle Act of 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1580) might be considered in relation to the issues presented upon this appeal.

[1] That the above section has no retroactive effect and does not apply to causes of action arising before its adoption appears to be definitely settled by the following cases: Betty Krause et al. v. Rarity & A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 285 P. 879, and Lillie D. Smellie et al. v. Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, et al. (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 343, opinion filed April 1, 1930, in which the same questions were involved, and in which the holding in the Krause Case is expressly approved. As all the other points involved in this appeal are thoroughly and completely covered by an opinion prepared by Hon. F. M. Jamison, sitting as the justice pro tem, and which meets our concurrence, we hereby adopt the same as the opinion of the court:

"This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondent, upon a verdict of a jury in an action for damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by respondent while riding as a guest of appellants in an automobile owned by appellant Porter McLaughlin, and operated by appellant, Pauline McLaughlin, at the time of the accident that caused the injuries. Also, an appeal from the orders of the court denying motions of appellants for a new trial, and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

[2] "Appellants are husband and wife, and were such on the 15th day of May, 1927. On that day appellant Pauline McLaughlin invited respondent to attend at the St. Francis church, in the city of Sacramento, to witness the ceremony of the first communion of appellants' eldest daughter. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the daughter not being ready to leave the church, appellant Porter McLaughlin wished to drive out to the Del Paso Country Club and invited respondent to accompany himself and wife in his automobile. Respondent accepted the invitation and got in the automobile. Upon arriving at the country club appellant Porter McLaughlin got out of the automobile, turned the wheel over to his wife, and requested her to call for him later in the day. Appellant Pauline McLaughlin then started to drive back to the said church where she had left her daughter, returning over the same road which they had just traversed in going to said country club. Respondent was in the back seat of the automobile, which was a Packard sedan, and with her in the back seat were the younger daughter of appellants' and their Japanese cook, respondent being seated on the left-hand side of said automobile, the daughter next to her and the cook on the right-hand side and appellant Pauline McLaughlin being alone in the front seat. At a point about one-quarter of a mile from said club, and near a bridge or culvert which crosses the road at that point, respondent was thrown from her seat with force sufficient to fracture or break the eleventh vertebra of her spine. The evidence produced upon the part of the respondent tended to prove that the road at the point where the accident happened was a dirt road, was rough and full of potholes and ruts, and that the said bridge or culvert was in bad condition, and the approach to it was full of ruts and potholes, with a sway in the road near the said bridge or culvert, and that at the time of the accident appellant Pauline McLaughlin was driving the automobile at the rate of from thirty to thirty-five miles per hour; that the automobile swayed back and forth across the road before the final bump or shock that threw respondent from her seat. Appellant Pauline McLaughlin denied that she was driving said automobile, at the time of the accident, in excess of twenty or twenty-five miles per hour, and denied that the front part of said automobile swayed or swerved at all. She further testified that she was under the impression that the rear wheel of her automobile went into a rut which caused the jolt that threw respondent from her seat. The principal witness produced by respondent to prove the condition of the road at the point where the accident happened was A. H. Becker, who testified that for the past five or six years he had been in the habit of passing over what he called the back road from Sacramento to the said club, twice a week, and did so in May, 1927; that from the club to the culvert or bridge, being approximately a quarter of a mile, the road was always rough, full of potholes, and that the approach to the culvert was in bad shape, that is, was rough, full of ruts and potholes, with a sway before hitting the culvert. Appellants raise the point in their brief that the testimony of Becker should not be considered for the reason that the road, regarding which he testified, was not identified as being the identical road upon which the accident happened. Appellants made no cross-examination of this witness, except to ask him a few formal questions; made no objection before the trial court to this testimony upon the ground that the road about which the witness testified was not the road upon which the accident happened; nor moved to have the same stricken on that ground. Even though this testimony was incompetent, still, being admitted without objection, and treated by the parties as competent in the trial court, the question of its competency cannot be raised in the appellate court. Curia v. Packard et al., 29 Cal. 194; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176

Cal. 461, 168 P. 1036; Parsons v. Easton, 184 Cal. 764, 195 P. 419. However, all of the witnesses agree that the road upon which the accident happened was a dirt road leading from the city of Sacramento to the Del Paso Country Club, several of them testifying that this dirt road connects Eighth street with the road upon which the club is situated. It is admitted that the accident happened on the dirt road at the culvert about a quarter of a mile from the club. Becker testified that in going to the club from Sacramento he went out Eighth street, and then went over a back road leading from Eighth street and turning to the left to the club; that this was a dirt road, and that about a quarter of a mile from the club there was a bridge or culvert across the road. We are of the opinion that, in any event, there was evidence from which the jury might fairly deduce the inference that the road about which the witness Becker testified was the road upon which the accident happened.

[3-5] "The first ground for reversal put forward by appellants is that the third amended complaint fails to state a cause of action. Said complaint, after stating that appellants were husband and wife, sets forth that appellant Porter McLaughlin was the owner of the automobile, and that at the time of the accident respondent was riding therein as a guest of appellants, and that appellant was driving and operating the said automobile as the agent of said Porter McLaughlin, and under his authorization and direction, and that the road over which the automobile was being driven was a dirt road and was rough, rugged, bumpy, and jagged, and that said appellant Pauline McLaughlin had operated said automobile over said road prior to said accident on other occasions, and knew the said road to be in said condition, and further stated 'that the said Pauline McLaughlin did on the said 15th day of May, 1927, and at that time on said day when plaintiff herein was accompanying said defendant in said Packard automobile, drive and operate said Packard automobile along and upon said dirt road in a reckless, negligent and careless manner, in that said defendant did drive and operate said automobile at so great a rate of speed, and with such disregard to the said condition of said road as to cause the automobile, by reason of said excessive speed, combined with the condition of said road, to suddenly swerve across said road and rebound onto said road with great force, thereby causing plaintiff, who was then and there riding in the back seat of said automobile, to be thrown and hurled with great force and violence to the floor of said automobile and that plaintiff was then and there injured,' etc. While it is sufficient to plead negligence in general terms (Dewhirst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 229 P. 30; Mathes v. Aggeler & Musser Seed Co., 179 Cal. 697, 178 P. 713), a complaint is sufficient if it alleges the specific acts which constitute the negligence complained of. Cal. Jur., vol. 19, p. 674.

"We are of the opinion that the complaint stated a cause of action and that the demurrer was properly overruled. Furthermore, appellants answered and went to trial upon the issues thus formed, and there is nothing to indicate that they were misled in any way as to the issues they were to meet, and in fact did meet as best they could, and the cause appears to have been fairly tried upon the merits. Irrgang v. Ott, 9 Cal. App. 440, 99 P. 528.

[6, 7] "The next contention of appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict because it fails to show any negligent act or omission of appellant Pauline McLaughlin which proximately caused injury to respondent. The evidence produced by respondent was to the effect that the road, at the point where the accident occurred, was a dirt road, very rough, and full of pot-holes and ruts, and that the bridge or culvert, at the point where respondent was thrown from her seat, was in bad shape, and the approach to the said bridge or culvert was also in bad condition, and that at the time of the accident the automobile was traveling at the rate of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour; that appellant Pauline McLaughlin had driven over the said road on two different occasions before the accident, and had been seated in the front seat with her husband when he had driven the automobile over this road in going to the said club the day of the accident. She testified that the road where the accident happened was rough; that the earth was worn away from the ends of the planks on the bridge; that she thought there were ruts in the road, although she did not get out to examine them. She further testified that the accident happened at the edge of the bridge or culvert just before she went over it, as she had passed over the bridge when she stopped the automobile, and that at the time of the accident she was traveling at the rate of twenty or twenty-five miles per hour. Respondent testified that at first the car zigzagged, then it turned to the right a little bit, then to the left, then it hit a bump and threw the small daughter of appellants between her and the front seat; that she grabbed the little girl and just then the car swung around to the right and she was thrown between the seat and the door and struck her back against something. Where the evidence is such that inferences may be drawn for or against a conclusion of negligence, it is for the jury to determine whether or not negligence existed. 19 Cal. Jur., p. 723. In the case of Hatzakorjian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 713, 41 A. L. R. 1027, the court said: 'The rule by which appellate courts must be guided in passing upon the question whether findings of fact or verdicts of juries are sufficiently supported by the evidence is this: "That where an honest difference of opinion between men of average intelligence can arise as to the effect of the evidence—that is, if the evidence is such as that different conclusions upon the matter can rationally be drawn [from the evidence]—then the case presented is one for the jury, or the court, if the questions of fact be submitted to its arbitrament." So in the instant case, if the jury believed that the testimony produced by respondent and her witnesses was true, that is to say, that at the place where the accident occurred the road was a dirt road, that it was rough and full of ruts and potholes, and that the approach to the bridge, near where respondent was injured, was in bad condition, that appellant had been over this road previously on several occasions, and knew that the road was rough and in bad condition, and with this knowledge she drove the automobile in which respondent was riding as a guest, over this road at the point where the accident happened, at an excessive rate of speed, taking into consideration, on the question of speed, the condition of the road at that point, and thereby produced such jolting and swerving of the automobile that respondent was thrown and cast from her seat and injured, there was certainly evidence sufficient upon which to base their verdict that appellant Pauline McLaughlin was guilty of negligence and that this negligence was the proximate cause of respondent's injuries. Upon that state of facts the said last-named appellant would have been acting in violation of section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), which, among other things, provides that no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle on a public highway at such rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person.

[8] "The next ground for reversal urged by appellants is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in giving instructions and in modifying and refusing proposed instructions. The instructions in this case are not numbered; we cannot, therefore, refer to them by numbers, which is to be regretted. One of the proposed instructions on behalf of appellants, which was refused by the court, is as follows:

"You cannot speculate or guess that caused the alleged accident. In case the evidence should show that the alleged injury to plaintiff may have occurred as a result of negligence of defendants, or may have occurred without any negligence on the part of defendants, you cannot indulge in speculation, guess or conjecture as to whether negligence on the part of defendants may have caused the injury but in such event you must return a verdict for defendants and against plaintiff."

"Presumably, it was the intention, by this instruction, to inform the jury that mere speculation, guess, or conjecture that defendants were guilty of negligence would not justify the jury in finding that defendants, or either of them, were guilty of negligence. If this was the intention of appellants, then, in substance, it was covered by the instruction given by the court, and found on pages 137 and 138 of the reporter's transcript, wherein the court instructed the jury that mere supposition or surmise that negligence on the part of defendant Pauline McLaughlin proximately caused the alleged accident would not justify a verdict against defendants, or either of them.

"The court refused the above quoted instruction on the ground that it was ambiguous, and in the ruling we think the court was right.

[9] "Appellants object to the instruction on page 161 of the reporter's transcript. In this instruction the court told the jury that, in determining whether or not defendant Pauline McLaughlin used due care and prudence and circumspection, and drove her car at a reasonable and prudent speed, it was the duty of the jury to take into consideration all the circumstances then and there existing which would have influenced the conduct of an ordinarily prudent driver in the same situation. Appellants claim that this instruction is objectionable, because it omits all reference to the element of knowledge or notice on the part of Pauline McLaughlin, and fails to confine the consideration of the jury to the condition of the road as it was known to her at the time of the accident. It is true that the instruction did not contain the words 'at the time and place of the accident,' but it is evident that the jury could not have been misled by this omission. As applied to the facts in this case, the instruction unquestionably is a correct statement of the law. Furthermore, in its instructions on pages 126-127 of the reporter's transcript, the court fully instructed the jury upon the matter of the knowledge or notice of Pauline McLaughlin regarding the condition of the road at the place of the accident. Taking the instructions as a whole they fully and fairly presented to the jury, for its determination, whether or not, under the facts of this case, the said Pauline McLaughlin was or was not guilty of negligence.

[10] "Appellants also take exception to the instruction of the court set forth on page 162 of the reporter's transcript, claiming that there was no evidence upon which it could be supported. This instruction, in substance, is to the effect that the existence of disease does not prevent recovery, but, on the contrary, recovery may be had for the increase or aggravation of same. The testimony of all the experts is that the eleventh vertebra had been weakened by disease, presumably tuberculosis; that the accident broke down this diseased vertebra and necessitated an operation by means of which the vertebral column was in a manner united and again supported, but at the expense of a permanently stiffened back, and the necessity for respondent having to wear a steel jacket. There is no evidence that, except for this accident, this defective vertebra would not have continued to support the vertebral column. Even though the ravages of the disease had been stayed or stopped prior to the accident, yet, according to the testimony of the experts, this vertebra was left, by virtue of said disease, in a defective condition, so much so, indeed, that the shock given to it at the time of the accident broke it down and rendered it wholly useless as a means of support to the remainder of the vertebral column. No error was committed in giving this instruction. Campbell v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 565, 70 P. 624; White v. Red Mountain Fruit Co., 186 Cal. 335, 199 P. 318.

[11] The objection of appellants to the instruction given on pages 165-166 of the reporter's transcript is without merit. The part objected to is to the effect that, if the jury finds the issues in favor of respondent, then in estimating her damage they must take into consideration the condition of her health and physical ability before the accident, the nature and extent of her injuries, etc. The testimony of respondent was that before the accident she worked for the Almond Growers' Association as an almond grader, and prior to that work she had done laundry work; that since her injury she had not been able to perform manual labor of any kind; has been compelled to keep a servant to do her house work. She further testified that she had worked for the Almond Growers' Association up to within a month prior to the accident, and that her wages were $16 to $18 per week. Appellants claim that the admission of this testimony was erroneous for the reason that no claim had been made by respondent for special damages of this character. There was no error committed by the court in the admission of this testimony. Under the plea of general damages, and to prove loss of earning capacity, it is permissible to show what wages, salary, or emolument respondent was earning and capable of earning prior to the injury. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513; Ehat v. Scheidt, 17 Cal. App. 430, 120 P. 49, 50. In this last case, Hart, J. said: 'The earning capacity of the plaintiff prior to receiving the injuries complained of in the business which he had customarily followed was a proper element to be considered in the assessment of damages.'

[12] "On cross-examination Pauline McLaughlin was permitted by the court, over objection, to testify that when she left the country club she intended to drive back to get her daughter, and, in reply to questions as to whether she was anxious to get back to the church on account of her daughter, and for the reason was hurrying her return, she said that she did not think she was specially hurrying, but that her daughter at the church was on her mind. The admission of this evidence is assigned as error. Inasmuch as this witness had testified that she was driving the automobile at only a moderate rate of speed on her return from the country club to the place of the accident, and by that evidence seeking to controvert the evidence of respondent that she was driving at a speed of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour, the fact, if proven, that she had a motive for hurrying back to the church, or was hurrying back at the time of the accident, would have some evidentiary force as tending to contradict her statement that she was not traveling at the rate of thirty or thirty-five miles per hour, as testified to by respondent. For that purpose this evidence was admissible.

[13, 14] "Error is also claimed by appellants in the ruling of the court permitting testimony to be given to the effect that from the Country Club road to the place of the accident, a distance of about a quarter of a mile, the road was rough, bumpy, and full of potholes. It is urged by appellants that testimony as to the character of the road upon which the accident occurred should be limited to the place of the accident. While as a general rule this is true, yet, as tending to show notice to, and knowledge upon the part of, Pauline McLaughlin, of the nature and condition of the surface of the road over which she was traveling just prior to the accident, it was permissible to show that for at least a reasonable distance in approaching the place where the accident happened, and continuing to that place, the road was rough and in bad condition. Under the circumstances surrounding this accident, and as tending to prove that Pauline McLaughlin did know, or, in the exercise of her judgment as a reasonable person, should have known that the road, at the place of the accident, was rough and in bad condition, we are of the opinion that the trial court did not err in admitting this evidence. Nor did the court err in permitting respondent to testify as to the speed at which the automobile was traveling. She being a person of at least ordinary intelligence, so far as the evidence shows, and having opportunity for observing the said speed, was competent to testify to same. Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 P. 109; Johnsen v. Oakland, S. L. & H. E. Ry., 127 Cal. 608, 60 P. 170; Snyder v. Reeg, 86 Cal. App. 231, 260 P. 600.

ine McLaughlin was acting as his agent in driving the said automobile. Porter McLaughlin himself testified that he was the owner of the automobile; that he personally invited respondent to ride out to the country club with himself and wife; he also testified that he heard his wife invite respondent to ride with them, and heard his wife say she would bring respondent back. Upon arriving at the country club he turned over to his wife the control and operation of the car, knowing that his wife intended to immediately return to the said church with respondent. Where proof is made that the car in question was owned by the husband, and was being operated by the wife at the time of the accident, with his express consent and permission, there is created a prima facie case authorizing an inference by a court or jury, in the absence of substantial proof to the contrary, that the wife was using the car as the agent of the husband. McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 238, 170 P. 417; Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358; Perry v. A. Paladini, Inc., 89 Cal. App. 275, 264 P. 580; Ransford v. Ainsworth, 196 Cal. 279, 237 P. 747. Appellants offered no evidence in any way controverting the inference or presumption thus created. In addition to the aforesaid presumption arising from ownership of the automobile, there was evidence from which the jury could draw the inference that at the time of the accident Pauline McLaughlin was acting as the agent of her said husband.

[17] "And, lastly, appellants contend that the verdict awarding respondent the sum of $12,500 as general damages, is excessive. At the date of the accident respondent was about forty years of age. Previous to that date she had been troubled with what her physicians termed 'smouldering tuberculosis,' but prior to the accident had been cured of this disease and had been employed as an almond assorter at wages ranging from $16 to $18 per week. Her expectation of life was stipulated to be 28.18 years. The injury inflicted upon her by the accident necessitated a very painful operation which kept her in the hospital for over three months, and thereafter she was confined to her bed in her home for another month, and was not able to get out of the house until in March, 1928, a period of some ten months after the injury. Dr. Harris, one of the physicians who treated respondent, testified that she will always have to wear a steel brace or jacket for her back, and, speaking of her future disability growing out of said injury and the operation, that she would never be able to do housework or hard work of any kind, and that for relief from continuing pain she will require future treatment. There is ample evidence that she has suffered great physical pain, and she will continue to suffer pain in the future.

"Upon this state of the evidence, we are unable to say, using the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76, 81, 'that the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court were grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than an honest and sober judgment.' And this being the case, this court cannot exercise the power of revision. Darling v. Pacific Electric Co., 197 Cal. 702, 242 P. 703; Driscoll v. California Street R. R. Co., 80 Cal. App. 208, 250 P. 1062; Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 713, 106 P. 83."

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Edna Leota Squires, as administratrix of the estate of George E. Squires, deceased, against Winnie Riffe and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals.

Reversed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Benjamin C. Jones, of Lakeport, and M. H. Iverson, of Ukiah, for respondent Squires.

W. H. Hazell, of Lakeport, for respondent Tallman.

FINCH, P. J.

The plaintiff recovered judgment for damages in the sum of $5,000 for the death of her husband, George E. Squires, alleged to have been caused by the negligent operation of an automobile owned by the defendant Winnie Riffe and driven by the defendant Tallman. Winnie Riffe has appealed from the judgment.

At the time of and prior to the accident the appellant owned and conducted a hotel at Upper Lake, Lake county. Tallman is the appellant's brother. He had been doing "odd jobs and errands" for her for many years, sometimes using her automobile in going on such errands. She also permitted Tallman and his wife to use her automobile "on their private errands." Tallman's wife was a waitress in the hotel. Yee Ock was employed by the appellant as a cook in the hotel.

Tallman, his wife, Squires, and Yee Ock left Upper Lake in appellant's automobile shortly before 10 o'clock in the evening on September 15, 1928. It does not appear at whose invitation Squires rode in the machine. They drove to several places during the night, and as they were returning to Upper Lake between the hours of 4:30 and 5 the next morning, at a place where the road turns sharply to the right over a bridge, Tallman lost control of the automobile and it went over the left side of the bridge. Squires was crushed beneath the automobile and killed. Part of the road near the bridge was covered with loose gravel, and, in passing through it, the rear end of the automobile skidded so far to the left that, while the front wheels went upon the bridge, the left rear wheel missed it, thereby causing the machine to topple over into the bed of the creek below. The automobile was a Jewett sedan, equipped with balloon tires. The evidence shows that the right rear tire was flat, it having been punctured by a large nail, apparently as the machine was approaching the bridge, the nail being of the kind used in the structure of the bridge. One of the witnesses testified that the flat tire "would have a tendency to throw you back and to the left." Tallman testified that he slowed down to "10 or 15 miles an hour" as he approached the bridge. There is sufficient evidence to support a finding either that the accident was caused by the flat tire, or that it was due to the negligence of Tallman in rounding the curve at too high a speed.

Mrs. Tallman testified:

"Q. Did this Yee Ock ask to accompany you on this trip? A. No sir.

"Q. How did he happen to go? A. Mrs. Riffe said if we were going to take him with us. * * *

"Q. What words did she use in that connection, if you remember? A. Not exactly. She asked if we were going. I said the lights were not good in our car. She said if we were going any place in the evening to take her car and take the little China boy (Yee Ock) along with us."

Relative to the same matter, the appellant testified:

"Q. On the occasion of permitting your car to be used on the evening before the accident happened, did you give any order to any person as to who should be taken in the car there or who should not? A. I told them to take Albert (Yee Ock), we called him Albert, if he cared to go. * * *

"Q. Did you order anybody to take him? A. No.

"Q. Did you make the use of your car dependent on them taking Albert? A. Not entirely, no."

[1] The evidence shows without conflict that the automobile in question was owned by the appellant, and was, at the time of the accident, being driven by Tallman with her consent. From these facts an inference arises that he was her agent in driving the automobile. Ransford v. Ainsworth, 196 Cal. 279, 281, 237 P. 747. In addition to this inference, the foregoing evidence tends to show, as was said in the case cited, not only that Tallman was operating the automobile with the appellant's consent, "but that in doing so he was engaged in doing things which were matters of her * * * concern." While such proof of agency is not conclusive, it is sufficient.

[2] The following occurred during the direct examination of the plaintiff as a witness:

"Q. After the death of your husband, Mrs. Squires, did you have any conversation with Mrs. Riffe? A. I did. * * *

"Q. State what that conversation was, * * * relating to the bringing of this suit and making a demand upon Mrs. Riffe?

"Mr. Honey (counsel for defendants): We submit that it is immaterial whether she made demand on Mrs. Riffe when she brought suit. * * * I have an idea it is an attempt to bring in extraneous matter here that has no relation to this matter.

"The Court: I think I will overrule the objection. * * *

"A. I told Mrs. Riffe I was going to bring suit, that I thought I ought to get damages. * * * She said she didn't want it to cost her a lot of money but she realized it and that is the reason she had insurance.

"Mr. Honey: If the court please, I assign the asking of that question as misconduct on the part of counsel, injecting extraneous matter into this case, and I now move that this jury panel be discharged and this case adjudged a mistrial. * * *

"The Court: The testimony about the conversation will be stricken out and the jury admonished when a matter is stricken out it is not to be considered by you in any way, it is to be considered the same as if no such testimony had been given or called for. The balance of the motion will be denied."

At the close of the plaintiff's case in chief, counsel for the defendants renewed his motion for the discharge of the jury because of the prejudicial effect of the foregoing evidence. In denying the motion the court said: "I confess I am considerably worried about the question."

It must be presumed that counsel for the plaintiff knew the answer which his client would give to the objectionable question. Her answer could serve no purpose, except to get before the jury the fact that the appellant carried indemnity insurance. The language of the Supreme Court in Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 138, 266 P. 954, 955, is applicable to the matter under discussion. Referring to proof of a settlement disclosing "the fact that the defendant was indemnified by a policy of insurance", it is there said: "The evidence of the settlement, alone, not connected up with any act or admission of the defendant, and concerning which he had nothing to do, was clearly inadmissible in evidence. The error in admitting it might not in and of itself require a reversal, but, coupled with the avowed purpose and successful attempt of plaintiff's counsel to get before the jury, not only the fact of the settlement, but also that the settlement was made by the insurance carrier of the defendant, puts the case in a position where section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution will not save the judgment. The natural tendency of a line of examination that suggests to the jury that the defendant is indemnified against any judgment for damages against him is highly prejudicial to his rights, especially in a closely balanced case where the evidence otherwise would be easily sufficient on appeal to support a verdict either for the plaintiff or for the defendant. Such attempts on the part of counsel have frequently been held to be improper and prejudicial. * * * From an examination of the record in this case it is impossible for us to state that the jury would not have found a different verdict had the objectionable examination not taken place and the evidence not been admitted."

[3] Appellant contends that the provisions of section 141½ of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1929, p. 1580), enacted after the appeal herein was taken, apply to the facts of this case, Squires being a guest in the automobile and the complaint not alleging intoxication, gross negligence, or willful misconduct on the part of the defendants. Under similar circumstances section 141¾ has been held inapplicable. Smellie v. Southern Pacific Company (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 343; Krause v. Rarity (Cal. App.) 285 P. 879.

One of the instructions contains the word "presumption" where the word "inference" should have been used. Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323, 183 P. 198. Another instruction states that it is negligence as a matter of law to "approach" a turn at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour under the conditions mentioned in section 113 (b), subd. 3, of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1917, p. 554). The limit fixed by that subdivision is "fifteen miles an hour in traversing or going around curves or corner."

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. ALDERSON.

Cr. 1105.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

April 12, 1930.

1. Indictment and Information ☞189(2) — Simple assault.

Crime of simple assault is necessarily included in crime of assault by means likely to produce great bodily injury (Pen. Code, § 1159).

2. Criminal law ☞1172(8) — Instruction — Greater offense — Lesser offense — Evidence — Prejudice.

Error, if any, in instruction authorizing conviction of lesser offense held not prejudicial, precluding reversal, where defendant was convicted of lesser, under evidence establishing higher offense (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Information under which defendant was convicted of simple assault charged an assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury. Court gave instruction that under information jury should find defendant guilty of either assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury, or simple assault. Defendant contended that under evidence he should have been found guilty either of the higher offense charged in the information or not guilty. Evidence was sufficient to warrant conviction of higher offense.

S. V. Cornell, of Turlock, and E. H. Zion, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J.

The defendant was convicted of the offense of simple assault, upon an information charging an assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, fining the defendant in the sum of $125 with an alternative in the county jail. From this judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The record shows that the defendant might very properly have been found guilty of the highest offense charged in the information, as the assault consisted of striking the complaining witness with a stretcher bar consisting of a piece of wood about 2x4x4 feet in length. From the force of the blow the complaining witness suffered two broken ribs.

The appeal is based upon alleged errors of the court in instructing the jury. The instructions assailed are as follows: "The court instructs you that under the information in this case you may, if the evidence justifies it, find the defendant guilty of either,—1: an assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily injury; or,—2: simple assault." And further: "The court further instructs the jury that an assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with the present ability to commit a violent injury upon the person of another." The contention being made that under the evidence the defendant should have been found guilty either of the highest offense charged in the information, or, not guilty. Section 1159 of the Penal Code reads: "The jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense."

[1] While unnecessary to cite any authorities to show that the crime of assault is necessarily included in the charge contained in the information in this case, we may refer to the numerous cases cited in the annotations to section 1159 found in Kerr's Cyc. Codes.

[2] As appears by the brief filed by the appellant in this case, many courts have held that while a jury may, without reversible error, find a defendant guilty of a lesser crime included in the charge, such, for instance, as manslaughter, where a defendant is charged with murder, and the evidence shows either that the defendant should be found guilty of murder, or not guilty, yet if the court instructs the jury, under such circumstances, that a verdict of manslaughter may be returned, it is erroneous and the judgment will be reversed. Nevertheless, this question has been definitely decided in this state, contrary to the contentions of the appellant that reversal should here follow in line with the cases reaching such a conclusion.

In the case of People v. Tugwell, 32 Cal. App. 520, 163 P. 508, every question presented upon this appeal was thoroughly considered, and the cases bearing thereon, set forth and fully analyzed. In that case it was held (quoting from the syllabus): "In a prosecution for murder, where the evidence shows murder in the first degree, error in instructing the jury on the law of manslaughter is favorable and not prejudicial to the defendant, as in view of the code definitions of murder and manslaughter it must be assumed that the jury would have convicted the defendant of murder if such instruction had not been given." In this case a petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court, after decision by the District Court of Appeal, was denied.

This court, in the case of People v. Washburn, 54 Cal. App. 124, 201 P. 335, had before it a like question with the one now presented. It was there held (quoting from the syllabus): "Where a defendant charged with the offense of assault with a deadly weapon was convicted of assault, and the evidence would have amply supported a verdict for the greater offense, it was not reversible error for the court to instruct the jury as to its right to return a verdict of guilty of simple assault, although there was no evidence of such lesser offense."

In the case at bar the evidence shows that the jury might have found the defendant guilty of a much higher offense, and it may be presumed that the jury found the defendant guilty of the lesser offense, upon ascertaining that it was at liberty to do so.

While we have followed with interest the arguments of counsel to the effect that if a jury finds a defendant guilty of a lesser offense, where the testimony establishes a higher, no prejudice is suffered by the defendant and no reversible error is made to appear, yet if the court erroneously instructs the jury that it may do so, prejudice has been caused and the defendant is entitled to a reversal; we cannot agree with counsel that such doctrine should be held to be the law of this state, especially in view of the two cases which we have cited and section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. If it were to be admitted that the instruction is erroneous, which we do not think to be the case, no reversal could be had herein for the reason that a consideration of all the testimony shows that no prejudice has been suffered by the defendant, and, under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, the judgment must stand.

We have not reviewed the cases drawing fine distinctions between verdicts rendered by juries where the evidence established a higher offense, and instructions given by courts in like instances relative to lesser offenses, for the reason that under what we consider to be the established law, a discussion of cases drawing such meticulous distinctions and hypercritical refinements have no place in our jurisdictions. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution was intended to eliminate just such obstructions to the administration of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by L. M. Buck against the James McClatchy Publishing Company, Inc. From an order granting defendant's motion for change of place of trial, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

J. S. Daly, of Sacramento, for appellant.

McLaughlin & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

This cause is before us upon an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the superior court granting the respondent's motion for a change of place of trial from the county of Placer to the county of Sacramento.

The complaint sets forth the residence of the plaintiff in the county of Placer, and that the plaintiff was, during all the times mentioned in the complaint, a resident of said county; that the defendant is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, and was, during all of the times mentioned in the complaint, such corporation, having its principal place of business in the city and county of Sacramento. The complaint further alleges that the defendant corporation is the publisher of a newspaper known as the Sacramento Bee, and that on or about the 24th day of September, 1928, the defendant corporation printed and published in said Sacramento Bee, certain libelous matter of and concerning the plaintiff; that the issue of the paper containing such libelous matter was circulated in the city of Lincoln, in Placer county, and in the county of Placer generally. Damages on account of said alleged libelous publication are prayed for in the complaint.

[1] The affidavit upon which the notice of motion for change of place of trial is based sets forth that the James McClatchy Publishing Company is a corporation having its principal place of business in the city and county of Sacramento, and that a majority of the directors of the corporation were, at the time of the commencement of the action, residents of the county of Sacramento, and that none of them were, at the time of the commencement of the action or at the time of the making of the affidavit, residents of the county of Placer, the notice of motion and motion follow the affidavit. The demand for change of place of trial is in the usual form. The fact that the affidavit upon which the notice of motion was based, and upon which the demand for change of place of trial is predicated, refers to the fact that a majority of the directors of the defendant corporation were residents of the city and county of Sacramento, and that none of them were residents of the county of Placer, need not be considered, for the simple reason that the directors are not made parties to this action. The cause is prosecuted simply against the defendant corporation, and there are no individual defendants named either in the title to the action or in any portion of the complaint. We are confronted upon this appeal simply with the question as to whether a corporation sued in the county in which an alleged libel is circulated is entitled to have the action transferred to the county of its principal place of business for trial.

In support of the order granting its application for change of place of trial, the respondent relies solely upon the case of Graham v. Mixon, 177 Cal. 88, 169 P. 1003, L. R. A. 1918F, 1023. In that action the principal question decided was as to what constitutes an injury to person, within the definition of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was there held that section 395, in so far as that case was concerned, related only to bodily injuries, and not to injuries to character; that the former was an action in the nature of trespass, and the latter an action on the case. Under these circumstances it was held that in a purely personal action, where no corporation was involved, section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1911, did not deprive the defendant of the right to have the cause of action transferred to his place of residence. It will be further observed that in the Mixon Case, although it was for a libel published in a newspaper, it was not published by a corporation, but was published by the defendant Mixon, who was doing business under a fictitious name. Even the law relative to doing business under a fictitious name had not been complied with by the defendant, but, if it had, the application and controlling power of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure would not have been affected. This case does not purport to, and does not in any wise, affect the ruling followed in cases where alleged libels have been published by corporations. It is purely and simply an action between parties in their individual capacities, and is no different from other actions as to the right of the defendant to have the trial take place at his place of residence, unless specifically controlled by other sections of the Code concerning actions relative to real estate, and instances specifically mentioned. Section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution is not referred to, and no attempt is made to modify, limit, or distinguish the rulings had in the cases based thereon.

This being an action solely against a corporation, we must have resort to the Constitution controlling such actions. Section 16 of article 12 reads: "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs, or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases."

In the case of Brady v. Times-Mirror Co. et al., 106 Cal. 56, 39 P. 209, the cause of action was prosecuted against a corporation and an individual. In that case it was held that, if the corporation had been sued alone, the right of the plaintiff not only to institute but to maintain and prosecute the action in the place of his residence where the alleged libel had been circulated would have been upheld. But, as the plaintiff saw fit to join an individual defendant, the right to resist the change of place of trial was waived.

In Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 144 Cal. 205, 77 P. 918, the following holding is had: "An action for libel may be maintained in the county where the plaintiff resides against a defendant corporation publishing a newspaper in another county which is its principal place of business, where the paper in which the libel was published was circulated in the former county."

In line with these cases is the case of Cook v. W. S. Ray Mfg. Co., 159 Cal. 694, 115 P. 318, 319. In this case the section of the Constitution relative to the institution and maintenance of an action for libel in a county other than that in which the corporation has its principal place of business is further amplified. After quoting the section of the Constitution, the court there says: "And this has been held to mean, not merely that an action against a corporation may, at the option of the plaintiff, be commenced in one of the designated counties other than the one in which the defendant has its principal place of business, but that it may be prosecuted to final judgment where commenced, unless the defendant can allege and show some sufficient ground for a change of the place of trial distinct from the fact that the residence of the corporation is in another county"—citing authorities.

It is further held in the Cook Case that the section of the Constitution referred to does not violate any of the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

In Raphael v. People's Bank of Benicia, 41 Cal. App. 115, 187 P. 53, the same question was before the District Court of Appeal of the First District that we are now considering, and it was there held that section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution was not violative of the Federal Constitution. It was also there held that, under the section of the Constitution which we are considering, such an action might not only be instituted, but prosecuted to final judgment, unless the defendant could show some ground for change of place of trial distinct from the fact of residence of the corporation. This case likewise refers to section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and points out that the rights of the parties are not dependent upon that section of the Code.

In W. J. Bush & Co. v. Van Camp S. F. Co., 51 Cal. App. 440, 196 P. 918, section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution was under consideration, and it was there held (quoting from the syllabus): "A corporation in an action for damages for breach of contract is not entitled to have the place of trial changed to the county in which its principal place of business is situated, where the action is brought in the county where the contract is to be performed and no reason other than its residence exists for the change." While the opinion in that case is brief, it cites a number of decisions supporting the rule just stated.

In Strassburger v. Santa Fé L. I. Co., 54 Cal. App. 7, 200 P. 1065, the constitutional provision here involved was again before the District Court of Appeal for the First District, and it was there held that, even though individuals were joined as defendants, as to the corporation defendant, no right to change the place of trial was given, and that, as to the corporation, the constitutional provision was not waived. The syllabus states succinctly the holding of the court in that case, and we quote it as follows: "The right, conferred by section 16 of article 12 of the constitution, to sue a corporation in a county other than that of its residence or in which its principal place of business is situated, is not waived by the joinder of individuals as defendant; and where, in accordance with that constitutional provision, a corporation is sued in a county other than that of its residence, and individuals are joined as defendants, the latter have the right to have the place of trial changed to the county of their residence, but the corporation has not that right."

In the case of Nakata v. Guarantee Mortgage Co., 60 Cal. App. 260, 212 P. 937, it is held that an action against a corporation for fraud committed in a county other than its principal place of business may prosecute in the county in which the fraud is committed, and a corporation has no right to a change of place of trial. This case also cites the cases to which we have just referred.

In the recent case of Ray Wong v. Anthong, Inc., 199 Cal. 15, 247 P. 894, section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution was under consideration by the Supreme Court, and in an opinion written by Presiding Justice Finch of this court, sitting as justice pro tem., it was held that a corporation, in an action for damages based upon malicious prosecution, instituted in a county other than the residence of the corporation, entitles the plaintiff to maintain the action in the county where the liability arose, and that the corporation, under the section of the Constitution, had no right to a change of the place of trial. The opinion in the Ray Wong Case cites many decisions to support the ruling there followed.

[2] It likewise appears from a consideration of the cases that section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution is self-executing, and, in so far as it conflicts with any legislative enactment, it takes precedence. 7 Cal. Jur. p. 118, § 614.

We think there is no escape from the conclusion, and what we have said, that the case of Graham v. Mixon, supra, relied upon by the respondent, and followed by the trial court, has no application to the question here presented, and that it was error to grant the respondent's motion for a change of place of trial.

The order appealed from is reversed.

NUNZIATO v. PROUT.

Civ. 3982.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

April 18, 1930.

Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 907(3) — Appeal on judgment roll — Presumption.

Trial court's findings will be assumed to be supported by evidence, where appeal was simply on judgment roll.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

On petition for rehearing.

Petition denied.

For former opinion, see 286 P. 455.

Sherman & Sherman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John L. Schaefer and Roy C. Kaiser, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Appellant, in his petition for a rehearing insisting that the trial court should have either entered judgment in favor of appellant for the sum of $4,500 alleged to be the unpaid portion on the contract involved in this action, or should have entered judgment for damages in favor of the plaintiff, overlooks the fact that under the contract involved in this action, after the sum of $3,000 was paid thereon, the remainder of the purchase price did not become due and payable until the machinery in question had been installed and placed in a satisfactory working condition.

Finding No. 2 of the trial court is to the effect that the machinery just referred to, to wit, two macaroni presses, did not function satisfactorily when installed, and that the appellant has never put said presses on a satisfactory working basis.

This being simply an appeal upon the judgment roll, it must be assumed that the finding of the trial court is amply supported by the testimony. Under such circumstances, the remainder of the purchase price mentioned in the contract has not become due and payable, and will not become due and payable until the presses have been put in the working condition called for by the terms of the contract.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

O'BRIEN v. RAUDIO.
Civ. 3936.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

April 17, 1930.

Appeal and error — 1011(1) — Conflicting evidence — Review.

It is not within province of reviewing court to re-examine disputed questions of fact and determine anew any conflict arising therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by P. J. O'Brien against Oscar Raudio. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

A. W. Hill, of Eureka, for appellant.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, and Leonard Stone, of Ft. Bragg, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff, as assignee and for purposes of collection, brought suit to recover upon a certain promissory note.

Defendant admitted the execution of the note, but alleged a lack of consideration, and also the further defense that the execution and delivery of the said note was procured through duress and fraud.

On these issues trial was had, and a judgment went for the defendant. From the judgment entered plaintiff appeals. The sole ground of the appeal is that the judgment is not supported by the evidence, and that the evidence does not sustain the findings upon which the said judgment is predicated.

It is conceded by appellant that it is not within the province of a reviewing court to again examine into disputed questions of fact and to determine anew any conflicts that might arise therefrom. With that concession, the appeal falls of its own weight. Not only is the evidence supporting plaintiff's claim wholly unreliable and in itself weak and unsatisfactory, but the conflict created by the evidence of defendant is a real conflict and more persuasive. Not one error of law is complained of. The entire brief of appellant is but an argument on the facts and an attempt to show that the conclusions of the learned trial judge were erroneous. When it is possible to array the facts presented by each side and then build up an argument requiring many pages of printed brief with topical headings and subheadings, then, at least, one thing is demonstrated; namely, that ample reasons are present to indicate a fair difference of opinion.

We do not feel that this appeal, so lacking in merit, is worthy of a recital of the facts. Such a recital would serve no purpose, useful or otherwise. The harmful effect, however, of a lengthy detail of facts might be to establish a precedent that would lead every unsatisfied litigant to hope that courts of appeal might engage in a trial de novo of his particular case. It might be noted that the trial court reopened the case, and even thereafter permitted another reopening for the purpose of receiving depositions.

While our reports contain hundreds of cases announcing the rule of appellate courts, it will suffice to quote the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Hotaling v. Hotaling, 187 Cal. at page 699, 203 P. 745, 747, wherein the court, in referring to the point raised on conflicting evidence, says: "In passing upon this point the function of this court is much less complicated than was that of the trial court. The trial judge was called upon to delicately adjust the balance so as to determine upon which side, in this great mass of conflicting evidence and inference, the preponderance might lie, while upon this appeal our only duty is to ascertain if there was any substantial showing in behalf of the court's finding to give rational support to the conclusion reached."

The judgment is affirmed.

NEW YORK INDEMNITY CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. ★
Civ. 6802.

District Court of Appeal. Second District,
Division 1, California.

April 14, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 13, 1930. Hearing
Granted by Supreme Court June 12, 1930.

1. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Relation of employer and employee — Determination — Industrial Accident Commission.

Ordinarily, duty of determining whether relationship of employer and employee exists rests primarily on Industrial Accident Commission (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, §§ 7, 8(a), as amended).

Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 835), §§ 7, 8 (a), as amended, define an employee as one who is in the service of another under a contract of hire.

2. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Relation of employer and employee — Conclusion of Industrial Accident Commission — Finality — Fact or law question.

Industrial Accident Commission's conclusion as to relationship of employer and employee is final, where question is one of pure fact, but reviewable, where it depends wholly or principally on question of law (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, §§ 7, 8 (a), as amended).

3. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Industrial Accident Commission — Jurisdiction — Relation of employer and employee.

Relationship of employer and employee must exist to give Industrial Accident Commission jurisdiction, and it cannot confer jurisdiction on itself by erroneous legal conclusion that such relationship exists (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, §§ 7, 8(a), as amended).

4. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Industrial Accident Commission — Fact findings — Conclusiveness.

Industrial Accident Commission's fact finding, dependent on correct legal conclusion from consideration of many facts with legal principles, is not binding on certiorari (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act).

5. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Relation of employer and employee — Law question.

Whether relationship of employer and employee existed between newspaper publishers and newsboy held law question for Court of Appeal to determine on certiorari from evidence before Industrial Accident Commission (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, §§ 7, 8(a), as amended).

6. Master and servant — "Servant" — "Employee."

Word "servant" is generally synonymous with "employee" (Civ. Code, § 2009).

Civ. Code, § 2009, defines "servant" as one employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in pursuit of independent calling, and remaining entirely under employer's control and direction in such service.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Employé" and "Servant," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Definition of employee — "Contract of hire" — Personal service.

"Contract of hire" in statutory definition of employee calls for personal service (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, §§ 7, 8(a), as amended).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Contract of Hiring," see Words and Phrases.]

8. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Relation of employer and employee — Right of control.

Relation of employer and employee does not exist, unless person for whom service is performed has right to control manner of doing work (Civ. Code, § 2009).

9. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Relation of employer and employee — Contract of "hire" — Reward or compensation.

Word "hire," in connection with contract of employment, implies reward or compensation for services (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, §§ 7, 8(a), as amended).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Hire; Hiring," see Words and Phrases.]

10. Master and servant — Workmen's Compensation Act — Employee — Newsboy.

Newsboy, purchasing papers from publishers for resale at higher price, fixed by publishers, at place stipulated, on penalty of refusal to sell him any, and assuming risk of loss, held not "employee" (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, §§ 7, 8(a), as amended).

Award annulled.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Flint & MacKay, of Los Angeles (Edward L. Compton, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent Los Angeles Evening Herald.

HOUSER, J.

By this proceeding petitioner seeks the annulment of an order made by the respondent commission by which an award of compensation was made to one Eustace for injuries admittedly received by him while engaged in the occupation of selling newspapers on a street corner within the city of Los Angeles. The question to be here determined is whether at the time Eustace sustained the injury, which resulted in the award of compensation to him, he was an employee of each of the respective proprietors of the newspaper business whose newspapers Eustace was selling. As at once it is apparent that consequences which might follow from a final determination that the relationship of employer and employee exists as between the publisher of a newspaper and each of the several newsboys engaged in selling his product might be far-reaching, the question presented is worthy of serious consideration. For example, if in law a newsboy, who is selling a newspaper, is to be regarded as an employee of the publisher of such newspaper, it is not impossible that such publisher would be liable in damages arising from tort, or, in fact, from any act of negligence, which might be committed by the newsboy while operating within the scope of his employment.

Although not without contradictions in many particulars, from the evidence adduced at the hearing of the application presented by Eustace to the respondent commission for an adjustment of compensation to be paid to him for his injuries and as a basis for its finding that Eustace was "employed as a news vendor," the respondent commission was authorized to accept as established the following pertinent facts: Eustace was a newsboy who was engaged in the occupation of selling each of two certain evening newspapers, known respectively as the Los Angeles Evening Herald and the Los Angeles Record. Instead of obtaining his supply of newspapers directly from the office of the publisher thereof, Eustace procured his supply from a wholesaler of such newspapers, known as a district manager, who purchased them in large numbers from their respective publishers and furnished them in suitable lots to Eustace and other newsboys. Eustace was obliged to buy from the district manager at least 130 Heralds each day; but neither daily, nor otherwise, was he required to purchase any specified number of Records. The price paid by Eustace for Heralds was two cents each; but the Records were sold to him at the rate of $1.25 per hundred. He was required to sell each of the respective newspapers at a price fixed and determined in advance by the publisher thereof, but all moneys received from their sale, whether in exact payment of such price, or given to and received by Eustace as a "tip" or gratuity, were considered as his property. If he was unable to sell all the Heralds purchased by him, or if any of them were lost or destroyed, the loss fell on Eustace; but he was permitted to return all unsold Records to the district manager and to receive credit for them at the rate at which they had been purchased. As to the place of sale of both the Heralds and the Records, Eustace was restricted and confined to a designated street corner, except that he was also privileged to sell newspapers in unoccupied territory, such as between street corners. The penalty for violation of either of such conditions was that he would not be permitted to purchase any more newspapers from the district manager; although the evidence further showed that he would not be precluded from purchasing an additional supply directly from the office of the publisher. Payment for all newspapers purchased by Eustace was made by him "at the end of every day," although, had he wished to do so, he might have paid for them at the time they were purchased. He "was not carried on the payroll of either newspaper. He received no checks, nor cash, nor bonus from the publisher of either newspaper or their agents."

[1, 2] As far as applies to this proceeding and as defined by sections 7 and 8(a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as variously amended), an employee is one who is in the service of another under a contract of hire. It is manifest that, ordinarily and generally speaking, one of the duties of determining whether such relationship existed as between Eustace and the proprietor of either or both of the newspapers which Eustace was selling primarily rested upon the respondent commission. It is also clear that, in a given state of foundational facts, a determination of the question might involve nothing more than a plain conclusion of an ultimate fact; while in different circumstances, perhaps complicated, and intermingled with various and sundry preliminary legal problems, a final determination as to the existing relationship between the interested parties might present for consideration, as an ultimate conclusion, an unmistakable question of law. When the former situation is presented; the authorities are unanimous that a finding of pure fact by the commission is final and conclusive; but manifestly where the determination of whether the relationship of employer and employee exists between contending parties depends either wholly or principally upon a question of law, the conclusion reached thereon is subject to review.

In the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 782, 151 P. 277, 278, L. R. A. 1916E, 916, it was ruled that whether one was engaged in interstate commerce work or was in intrastate employment presented a question of law, and consequently that a purported finding of fact on that issue by the Industrial Accident Commission was reviewable in a certiorari proceeding. In part, the court said:

"* * * The industrial accident commission concluded from these facts that the deceased at the time he sustained his injury, while in the employ of petitioner, was not engaged in interstate commerce work.

"No question is here presented as to the finality of this last finding of the commission. But, indeed, that finding is not, in strictness, a finding of pure fact, but rather is it a conclusion of law drawn from a consideration of the admitted facts, to which consideration have been applied principles of law of more or less intricacy. In this respect it may be compared to a finding of ownership of land. It may be, and often it is said that it is, a mere statement of fact to declare that one owns a piece of land. But, after all, it is the ultimate conclusion arrived at from the consideration of many facts, such as written instruments and their recordation, which facts necessarily have to be considered in connection with principles and propositions of law often abstruse and difficult of determination, such as the sufficiency of the recordation and the legal meaning of the instrument asserted to convey title. Savings & Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 538, 39 P. 922. In this case all of the facts touching the nature of the deceased's employment, the character and use of the instrumentality in the repair of which he was engaged at the time of his death, being beyond controversy and fairly found by the commission, the one important legal question is that of the jurisdiction of the commission to retain and consider the application for relief. * * *

In the case of Hines v. Industrial Accident Commission, 184 Cal. 1, 192 P. 859, 860, 14 A. L. R. 720, where a similar situation was involved, the ruling in the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 782, 151 P. 277, L. R. A. 1916E, 916, was approved. After quoting a part of the language of that opinion, the court said:

"* * * This language [referring to that taken from the opinion in the other case] is clearly applicable to the finding under consideration, which must therefore be regarded as a conclusion of law and as presenting the question of the jurisdiction of the commission to make the award—a question which may be considered on certiorari." See, also, 27 Cal. Jur. 576, and authorities there cited.

[3-5] However, in what of first impression might appear to be in seeming opposition in part to the principle announced in each of the cases just cited, it has been indicated, if not directly decided, that when the finding of fact involving the existence of the relationship of employer and employee depends upon the solution of a question of mixed law and fact, it is "to be proved like any other question," and that unless there is such an "entire absence of evidence in the record as to render the finding unreasonable, or in excess of the powers of the commission, the court is not empowered to set it aside." Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 577, 580, 250 P. 570, 571. But it is clear that the relationship of employer and employee must be present before the commission may acquire jurisdiction of a proceeding; and that, however apparently supported by quasi foundational facts, the commission cannot by its erroneous conclusion of law thereon, to the effect that such a relationship exists, confer jurisdiction upon itself; furthermore, that if, basing jurisdiction upon its erroneous conclusion of law, it assumes to act and to order an award in the premises, such award is "in excess of the powers of the commission." It thus becomes apparent that where the controlling so-called finding of fact in a given case is dependent upon a correct conclusion of law to be drawn from a "consideration of many facts, * * * which facts necessarily have to be considered in connection with principles and propositions of law often abstruse and difficult of determination" (Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 782, 784, 151 P. 277, 278, L. R. A. 1916E, 916), such "finding of fact," although consisting of "mixed law and fact," and which is "to be proved like any other question" (Hillen v. Industrial Acc. Com., 199 Cal. 580, 250 P. 570, 571), possesses no binding force when called in question by a writ of certiorari. The duty, then, of this court, in this proceeding, is to determine, not a question of fact, but one of law arising from the facts adduced in evidence before the commission, and which, notwithstanding the many contradictions and inconsistencies appearing in the testimony of the several witnesses, may be assumed to have been hereinbefore correctly summarized. Reduced to a legal proposition, the inquiry may be limited to a determination of whether the relationship of employer and employee exists between the publisher of a newspaper and a newsboy, where the latter purchases newspapers from the former for the express purpose of making resales of such newspapers to the public at a profit over the cost price, and which newsboy assumes all risk of loss from whatever cause and is under no control of the publisher, except as to the price at which and the place where such newspapers are to be sold, upon penalty for violation of such regulation that thereafter the publisher may refuse to sell any newspapers to the newsboy.

An identical situation arises from the management and operation of many different commercial enterprises, including the sale of books, magazines, periodicals, and various and sundry agricultural implements, as well as patented articles of food and clothing. Perhaps the best-known illustration of the practice is that connected with the manufacture and distribution throughout the United States of any one of the many different makes of automobiles. It is common knowledge that ordinarily, the custom is that the manufacturer of any given automobile enters into a contract with each of his or its several so-called "sales agents," by which in effect the "sales agent" is obligated to purchase outright from the manufacturer a stated number of automobiles each year, which automobiles the "sales agent" is bound to sell at a predetermined price fixed by the manufacturer, and only within a specified and definite territory—all loss, if any, arising from such arrangement to be borne and paid by the "sales agent."

[6, 7] It would now appear opportune to consider, if not the essentials of a contract of employment, at least some of the incidents by which such a contract possibly may be distinguished from other relations which may exist as between different respective individuals. The word "servant" is generally synonymous with the word "employee"; and by the provisions of section 2009 of the Civil Code a servant is defined as "one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter. * * * " Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 810, 159 P. 721, 723, and authorities there cited. As hereinbefore pointed out, an employee is one who is in the service of another under a "contract of hire" (sections 7 and 8(a), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act); and as far as the compensation law is concerned, that such a contract necessarily calls for personal service is emphasized by the fact that compensation is to be awarded to an employee who is injured while performing service within the scope of his employment is based upon the amount of wages earned by such employee. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 810, 159 P. 721, 723; Press Publishing Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 114, 119, 210 P. 820. In the former case, among other things, it is said:

"* * * Doubtless there could be a contract of service without stipulated wages, but there could be no employee unless his personal services were rendered to the employer, and since wages are generally paid for personal services, wages or salary are made the criteria of compensations given to injured employees.

* * * It will thus be noted that the element of personal service is judicially recognized and accentuated as an essential in the legal relation of employer and employee, from which it may be inferred that in accomplishing the ultimate object of the arrangement between the parties thereto, if, either expressly, impliedly, or by custom, the one who agrees to perform service for the other is at will privileged to substitute some other person in his place, the contract in that particular will not measure up to the statutory requirement. In the instant proceeding it appears that, although a newsboy might purchase from the district manager any number of newspapers, in no way was he obligated to render a personal service in effecting their sale to the general public. Indeed, it was a common practice for one newsboy to sell newspapers to another, who in turn disposed of them by sale to any one who would become a purchaser thereof. Another illustration of the absence of the requirement of personal service is shown by the custom which prevailed in hiring, by the original purchaser, of other newsboys who would be compensated for their work, either by a commission for the newspapers which such newsboys actually sold, or by the payment of an agreed sum of money for the performance of a certain amount of work.

[8] Another characteristic element noticeable in the statute to which attention has been directed (section 2009, Civ. Code) is that the one who performs the service for the other "remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter." Nor is the substance of such statute exceptional in regard to such requirement. The authorities generally are unanimous in demanding that before the relation of employer and employee may be said to exist, it must appear that the person for whom the service is to be performed has the right of exercising control over the manner in which the work is to be done. In volume 1 of Labatt's Master and Servant many pages of text and footnotes are devoted to a consideration of the single essential element of "control" in the master; and volume 39 of Corpus Juris is likewise replete in its discussion and illustration of the same feature. But it is apparent that the word "control" in itself is a generalization which may not be entirely dependable as a guide to a correct conclusion in a situation in which either clear or ambiguous acts or conduct are involved; and so in section 160, volume 1, of Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence (6th Ed.), may be found the declaration that "he is to be deemed the master, who has the supreme choice, control and direction of the servant, and whose will the servant represents, not merely in the ultimate result of his work, but in all its details. * * * And, in effect, such construction of the word is recognized by the Supreme Court of this state in Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 810, 159 P. 721, where, in determining its significance in the statute (section 2009, Civ. Code), it is said: " * * * It is true that many authorities specify 'control' of the person performing work as the means of differentiating service from independent employment. The test of 'control,' however, means 'complete control.' * * * "

Reverting to the situation presented by the facts in the instant proceeding, as well as to such other facts as are common knowledge, it becomes patent that, as to many of the details connected with the sale of newspapers by newsboys on the streets of the city of Los Angeles, it would approach an absurdity to contend that the publisher of any newspaper could possibly exercise complete control as to details. Whether the newsboy must sell his newspaper for not more than the exact price theretofore fixed by the publisher, or whether to the contrary, he may accept or even solicit a "tip" or gratuity in advance of such price; whether in making a sale, or offering for sale, an alluring or lurid "extra," the newsboy shall remain on the sidewalk in comparative safety, or, at will, may leave that position, dart suddenly and unexpectedly hither and yon in the crowded street, thereby endangering his life or limb, for the purpose of approaching some possible purchaser of his newspaper who may be traveling either in a street car or in an automobile; whether the newsboy shall be seated and remain silent and statuesque, or vociferously and raucously shout his wares and race in a simulated excitement or pretended frenzy from one prospective customer to another; or whether by suavity and polite speech he conduct himself in an insinuating and gracious manner, or by rudeness and roughness and the veritable tactics of a French gamin he proclaim the advisability, if not the absolute and undeniable necessity of the general public acquainting itself at first hand with the latest news of the day—while either or some of such methods of effecting sales may represent the acme of the art of the vocation of a newsboy, dependent upon the temperament or deliberate and studied choice of the individual salesman—the compliance by the newsboy with any of such details apparently would be quite beyond the "remote control" or even the suggestion of the publisher of the newspaper.

[9] Again advertent to sections 7 and 8(a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, it will be noted that the relationship of employer and employee involves "a contract of hire." That the word "hire," when used in connection with a contract of employment, implies that a reward or compensation shall be paid for the services performed is indicated in the case of McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. 593, 599, where it is said that " * * * to employ, is 'to engage in one's service; to use as an agent or substitute in transacting business; to commission and intrust with the management of one's affairs;' and when used in respect to a servant or hired laborer, is equivalent to hiring, which implies a request and a contract for a compensation, and has but this one meaning when used in the ordinary affairs and business of life. * * * " To the same effect are: Carter-Mullaly Transfer Co. v. Angell (Tex. Civ. App.) 181 S. W. 237, 238; Commonwealth v. Radocchia, 205 Mass. 455, 91 N. E. 856. As far as concerns any compensation to be paid to the newsboy, the contract here under consideration was to the effect that the newsboy would purchase from the publisher of the newspaper, and the latter would sell to the former, newspapers at a fixed price, and that if practicable the newsboy would resell each of such newspapers, also at a predetermined price. The "contract" contained no express stipulation that for the "services" to be performed by the newsboy any reward or compensation as such would be paid to him. To the contrary, the reward, if any, to which the newsboy might become entitled depended, not upon the time diligently expended by him in his efforts to resell the newspapers, but rather depended upon the profits which might be derived from sales actually made, and which profits, as far as the Herald was concerned, were entirely dependent upon his success in disposing of a sufficient number of newspapers to more than offset in money received therefor the amount which the newsboy was obligated to pay each day for the newspapers which he was required to purchase. For example, if in accordance with the requirements of the publisher of the Herald newspaper, the newsboy purchased 130 Heralds at two cents each, and after working many hours succeeded in selling any number of such newspapers less than 87 at three cents each, it is apparent that, as far as profit, or reward, or compensation was concerned, his labor would have been in vain. He might even operate at a loss. In effect, the only difference between his "contract" with the Herald and that with the Record was that for such Records as he did not sell he was reimbursed at the same price for which they were sold to him, which, of course, guaranteed him against actual money loss, but did not insure any reward or compensation for his work, except in proportion to the newspapers which he actually sold.

[10] In some of the authorities which relate to the method or rule by which the relation of master and servant may be determined, the power of dismissal or discharge of the employee by the employer is suggested, not at all as conclusive, but as an incident which should be taken into consideration. If the force of such suggestion be recognized as at all indicative, the presence in the instant case of the power of dismissal, if discernible, is so negligible and so uncertain that it cannot be adopted as a controlling or deciding feature in determining the relationship which existed between the interested parties. For any violation of any material condition under which the newsboy was to operate, his discharge as an employee apparently never was thought of or contemplated. Like any other "sales agent," notably that of an automobile, who disregarded his covenant in that he sold his merchandise at a price less than that authorized by its producer, or who operated in a territory other than that to which he had been assigned, he was punishable by not being thereafter permitted to purchase his wares from the producer or publisher. As it would seem clear that by no stretch of the suggested rule could a "sales agent" of an automobile be regarded as an employee of the manufacturer thereof, and, hence, under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, be entitled to compensation for injuries received by him in the course of his employment, so here, under similar contractual conditions, the newsboy or "sales agent" of the publisher of the newspaper may not be held to be an employee of such publisher and entitled to the benefits arising from the provisions of the statute.

Because Eustace "was not carried on the payroll" of either newspaper; because, by the terms of the contract, he was to render no personal service; was not under the "complete control" of the publisher; was to receive no assured compensation for his labors, and was not subject to "discharge" as an employee; this court is of the opinion that the relationship of employer and employee did not exist in favor of the applicant for adjustment of compensation before the respondent commission, and, consequently, that the award of compensation therein should be annulled. It is so ordered.

Cr. 1959.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

April 17, 1930.

1. Bail ☞53 — Amount — Alteration — Good cause.

Order altering amount of bail, not based on showing of good cause, is arbitrary and unauthorized exercise of judicial power (Pen. Code, § 1289).

2. Bail ☞53 — Amount — Alteration — Good cause — Judicial discretion.

Ordinary judicial discretion exists in superior court to determine what constitutes good cause for altering amount of bail previously fixed (Pen. Code, § 1289).

3. Bail ☞53 — Necessity — Judicial discretion — Abuse.

Remanding defendant to custody and re-fixing bail after release on his own recognizance and previous bail exonerated held not as matter of law abuse of discretion under trial judge's statement (Pen. Code, § 1289).

Trial judge's statement when re-fixing bail showed that he would not have exonerated defendant's bail and released him on his own recognizance if court had been advised of certain facts.

4. Bail ☞74(1) — Exoneration — Setting aside order.

Court setting aside order exonerating bail should have restored order previously existing fixing bail which was exonerated.

Defendant, at time indictment was returned charging him with forgery and embezzlement, was out of the state, and bail was fixed at $250,000. Subsequently defendant voluntarily returned, and was released on his own recognizance, and, after appearing from time to time, case was set for trial and bail fixed at $10,000. Bail so fixed was exonerated when indictment was ordered off calendar, and subsequently court restored cause to calendar for trial, remanded defendant, and again fixed bail at $250,000.

5. Bail ☞51 — Amount — Fixing — Grand jury — Court.

Grand jury has no authority to participate in fixing amounts of undertakings; responsibility therefor being with court.

6. Bail ☞53 — Good cause — Reduction.

Setting aside order requiring bail and fixing smaller amount when accused returned to jurisdiction and was released on his own recognizance held necessarily to involve determination that good cause existed (Pen. Code, § 1289).

7. Constitutional law ☞72 — Prosecution — Matters of policy.

Matters of policy affecting prosecution of criminal case are not within province of court, but are questions for district attorney.

Original application by Jacob Berman for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure petitioner's release from custody on ground of illegal commitment after having been released pending trial.

Writ granted, and petitioner remanded, with directions.

Otto Christensen, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The return to the writ of habeas corpus issued upon the petition of Berman recites that, at the time of the issuance and service of the writ upon the sheriff, that official held petitioner in custody by virtue of an order of the superior court made by Hon. Marshall McComb, one of its judges. It appears that this order was made in open court on the 11th day of April, 1930, without notice to either the defendant or the district attorney, and under the following circumstances alleged in the petition, and not controverted: On the 19th day of May, 1927, an indictment was returned by the grand jury of Los Angeles county, charging Berman with forgery and embezzlement. At that time he was out of the state of California. Bail was fixed at $250,000. On the 12th day of September, 1927, Berman voluntarily returned to California, and was released on his own recognizance. Thereafter from time to time he appeared as directed by the court, and on the 10th day of September, 1929, the case was placed off calendar to be restored on notice of ten days. It appears that on September 11, 1928, the case was set for trial, and bail was fixed at $10,000. This bail was exonerated when the indictment was ordered off calendar on September 10, 1929. The next action in the matter occurred on April 11, 1930, when the court entered the following order: "Cause ordered restored to calendar for trial April 23, 1930—defendant remanded—bail fixed at $250,000." During the period covered by these proceedings the petitioner has been made defendant in other criminal prosecutions in both the state and federal courts. He is now at liberty on bail under such charges, the total amount of which is $45,000.

[1] If no other facts appeared than the foregoing, it is clear that under the authority of In re Aydelotte (Cal. App.) 275 P. 510, the petitioner would be entitled to relief upon this application. It was there held in effect that, a defendant having been admitted to bail, the court may not, without good cause being shown, increase or decrease the bail. An order altering its amount not based on a showing of such good cause is an arbitrary exercise of judicial power, unauthorized by section 1289 of the Penal Code, and this is the provision conferring upon the superior court authority to alter the amount of bail. But in this case at the time of entering the order above quoted the court said:

"I find that some time ago the trial of this indictment was marked off the calendar in this department at the request and upon the stipulation of both the district attorney and the defendant; also that the bail was exonerated upon the representation that the defendant was under bond in other cases. At the time this court endeavored to fix a date for the trial of the defendant on this indictment the court was assured by the district attorney that the defendant would be prosecuted upon another indictment charging him with bribery, and that therefore this indictment could be placed off calendar. The court was not told by the district attorney that a promise of immunity had been made to the defendant on the bribery charge, as subsequently was disclosed."

[2, 3] The ordinary judicial discretion exists in the superior court to determine what amounts to good cause shown. It is contended by petitioner, and conceded by the district attorney, that the court's action in entering the order of April 11, 1930, amounted to an abuse of discretion. The facts stated by the trial court are not disputed. By the statement of the judge thereof he indicates that he would not have exonerated Berman's bail and released him on his own recognizance had the court been apprised of certain facts. While it is not clear why these facts, if disclosed, would have suggested the necessity for requiring bail, still, since the trial judge has indicated that such a result would have been brought about, we are not prepared to hold as a matter of law that an abuse of judicial discretion has been shown.

[4] However, it seems indisputable that logically and legally if the court was authorized to set aside its order exonerating bail, the order previously existing and which was exonerated should have been restored. The effect of the recent order of the court was to set aside that of September 10, 1929. Previously to that, and on September 11, 1928, bail had been fixed at $10,000. The petitioner is entitled to have this amount remain without increase except upon good cause shown. The cause which operated to justify the court's order of April 11, 1930, is not contended to have had any bearing upon the consideration which moved the court in September, 1928, to fix the bail at $10,000.

[5, 6] In the statement made by the trial court, a part of which we have quoted, it is said that the grand jury which returned the indictment here involved recommended that bail be fixed at $250,000. Of course, the grand jury has no authority to participate in fixing the amounts of undertakings. The responsibility therefor is with the court. When Berman returned to this jurisdiction of his own volition, and the court released him on his own recognizance and set aside the order requiring bail of $250,000, it necessarily determined that good cause appeared for the action which it then took. On September 11, 1928, it substituted its deliberate judgment on the subject of bail for all orders which had theretofore been made.

[7] Other things said by the trial court in its statement do not require specific mention.
No other facts than those which we have discussed are contained in it, and it is not the province of the court to concern itself with matters of policy affecting the prosecution.
These are questions for the district attorney, and are not of such a nature as to require or justify our attention.

We conclude that, upon the making of the order of April 11, 1930, which in effect set aside the order previously made allowing the defendant to go on his own recognizance, the order of September 11, 1928, fixing bail at $10,000 should have been restored.

It is ordered that the petitioner be remanded, and that he be admitted to bail, pending the final disposition of indictment No. 30741 (the accusation involved in this proceeding), upon giving an undertaking as required by law in such cases, in the sum of $10,000, said undertaking to be approved by a judge of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨208(2) — Assignment of lease — Rents — Inconsistent claim.

Defendant claiming leasehold under assignment and taking possession and receiving reduction of rent could not, in lessor's action for rent, contend others were lessees or that assignment was void.

The defendant's assignor had originally assigned lease to another with a contract of conditional sale of furniture and fixtures, with provision that the assignment should not become effective until the assignee complied with obligations under the sales contract. The first assignee gave two notes for the purchase price of the furniture and the assignor sold one of these to defendant, transferring at the same time his interest in the conditional sales contract "together with all leasehold rights in said premises." The original assignee became delinquent, and thereupon the defendant induced the lessor to recognize it as a tenant in possession and to reduce the rent. Defendant now claims that the original assignee was still the lessee and that the assignment to defendant was as collateral only and was void because both notes were not transferred, and because given for security.

The plaintiffs are the owners in fee of a certain apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, which, by an agreement in writing dated May 17, 1923, they leased to Abraham Spiegelman and Frank Soronow for a period of ten years at a monthly rental of $1,728.
This lease was transferred several times and finally assigned to the defendant and appellant. This last transfer came about in the following manner: On January 31, 1925, N.
M. Eastman, who was the assignee of Spiegelman, assigned to H. Tyler and Mary R. Tyler, his wife, and at the same time entered into a contract of conditional sale to the Tylers of the furniture and fixtures, the assignment providing that it did not "become effective until after all obligations had been complied with by vendees as expressed in said sale contract." Evidencing the purchase price of the furniture, the Tylers executed two prom-issory notes and delivered them to Eastman, one in the sum of $32,000 and the other for $8,000. On February 3, 1925, Eastman sold the larger note to one Baumgarten, transferring at the same time his interest in the conditional sale contract, "together with all leasehold rights to said premises." Baumgarten, in turn, transferred the note, contract, and leasehold rights to the appellant. In the month of July, 1925, the Tylers became delinquent and apparently abandoned the premises after action was started to recover the rental due, and the appellant took possession, evicting a woman who had been put in charge by a man named Jack Phillips. Thereafter, and after considerable negotiation with the lessors and their attorney, the former agreed on August 20, 1925, in writing, to recognize the appellant as the tenant in possession "unless the court should decide differently," and also agreed to reduce the rental in the sum of $216 per month, which sum was designated as an allowance for the superintendency of the building. The rental due was adjusted and paid to September 1, 1925, and the appellant continued in possession, paying at the rate of $1,512 per month until January 1, 1926. For the months of January, February, March, April, and May the appellant paid only $1,296 per month, there being at the time negotiations pending for a further reduction of the rental to that figure, which attempt, however, did not culminate in an agreement. On July 16, therefore, when the notice to pay rent or quit was served on appellant it was in default in the sum of $216 per month for five months and $1,512 for two months. Judgment was given by the trial court for this amount plus the rental falling due thereafter and prior to the trial of the action. The defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

[1] It is insisted that there should be a reversal because (1) the Tylers are still the lessees by direct agreement with the plaintiffs; (2) the assignment by Eastman was as collateral only; (3) this assignment by Eastman was void for the reason that both notes were not transferred; and (4) the assignment to the appellant was as security only and was, therefore, void. There are other points to be discussed, but we think these four may be disposed of as one argument. As between the various assignees and the appellant in an appropriate proceeding, the contentions presented to us might be entitled to serious consideration, and undoubtedly that is the reason the lessors in one of the letters of August 20, 1925, when agreeing to recognize appellant as lessee, said: "and will hereafter consider you as such unless the court should decide differently," and in another part of the same letter, "In other words, it is understood you are possessed of all the rights and benefits and have accepted the responsibilities of said lease, the same as if a new lease had been executed by us directly to you. We hereby waive any and all question as to any irregularities or insufficiencies of the assignment of said lease heretofore made." Claiming under the assignment, acting under the assignment, receiving the benefits of the claim asserted thereunder, and receiving a reduction of the rent, the appellant is not in a position to urge here those contentions which properly belong to a contest between other parties.

[2] The fifth reason assigned by counsel for appellant why the judgment should be reversed is very similar to those already mentioned. It is that the appellant did not take or hold possession of the premises under or by virtue of the lease. This argument also comes with poor grace from the appellant, who entered the building under claim of right—that of being the assignee of the lease. It was not necessary for it to take possession of the realty in order to recover possession of the furniture. It could very well have removed the personalty if that were all it sought. But it saw fit to assert its rights to the lease, the title to which had never passed to the Tylers because of their failure to comply with the terms of the conditional sales contract. On August 20, when the lessors finally agreed to recognize the claim advanced by the appellant, the latter paid the back rent, amounting to $6,184, took advantage of the reduction granted, and in general comported itself as the legitimate assignee. Under these circumstances Lopizich v. Salter, 45 Cal. App. 446, 187 P. 1075, 1076, and the cases therein cited, are conclusive of the assigned error. It is there said: "This covenant on the part of defendant constituted the consideration, not only for the assignment made, but for the consent thereto given by the lessors. It could not, in thus accepting the lease, appropriate to itself the benefits thereof and repudiate the burden attached to the transfer. In the case of a lease signed by the lessor under which, without signing, the lessee enters into possession of the demised premises and pays the rent in accordance with the terms thereof, it is of the same binding force and effect as though the lessee had signed the same."

[3] But one question remains. Was the notice to pay rent or quit sufficient? It is asserted that the amount set forth in the notice, to wit, $4,104, was excessive in the sum of $292.95. In this particular it is sufficient to say, as we have already indicated in our statement of the facts, that there was testimony sufficient to warrant the court in finding, as it did, that there was $1,080 due for the months of January, February, March, April, and May, and $3,024, from May 26 to July 25.

Judgment affirmed.

Insured's wife operating automobile without operator's license held covered by liability policy extending to persons "legally operating automobile"; language of policy being uncertain.

While, under liberal definition of term, one is not "legally operating" an automobile when he is driving it in violation of any provision of law, the term "legally operating automobile," as used in liability policy extending benefits thereof to persons legally operating automobile with insured's consent, is not used in broad sense, because to give it that meaning would be to destroy protection which policy purports to give such persons; it being a matter of common knowledge that nearly every automobile accident is due to breach of some statutory provision.

FINCH, P. J.

The plaintiff is the father of Anita Fagiani, a minor, who was struck and injured by an automobile owned by W. A. Bennett and driven at the time of the accident by his wife, Celeste Bennett. Based upon such injuries, the plaintiff recovered judgment for damages against Celeste Bennett. Thereafter this action was commenced to recover the amount of said judgment from the defendant herein, under the terms of a policy of liability insurance issued by the defendant to W. A. Bennett. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

The policy contains the following provisions:

"Additional Assureds. The insurance provided by this policy is so extended as to be available, in the same manner and under the same provisions as it is available to the named assured, to any person or persons while riding in or legally operating any of the automobiles described in the declarations or to any person, firm or corporation legally responsible for the operation thereof, provided such use or operation is with the permission of the named assured, or if the named assured is an individual, with the permission of an adult member of the named assured's household other than a chauffeur or a domestic servant.
* * *

"Exclusions. * * * This policy does not cover while any automobile insured hereunder is being (4) used for any purpose other than specified in declaration No. 9, (5) driven or manipulated by any person in violation of law as to age, and if there is no legal age limit, then under the age of 16 years, (6) driven or manipulated in any race or contest, (7) used for towing or propelling any trailer or any other vehicle used as a trailer, (8) rented or hired to others or being used to carry passengers for a consideration."

The answer alleges that "Celeste Bennett was not legally operating the automobile referred to at the time of the alleged accident." It was stipulated at the trial that she did not have an operator's license at the time of the accident or prior thereto. She was driving the automobile with the express permission of W. A. Bennett.

[1] The only question presented by the appellant is whether Celeste Bennett was "legally operating" the automobile within the meaning of the quoted words as used in the policy; she not having been licensed to drive any automobile. Under a liberal definition of the term, one is not "legally operating" an automobile when he is driving it in violation of any provision of law, but obviously the term was not used in that broad sense in the policy in question, because to give it that meaning would be to destroy the protection which the policy purports to give to persons driving the automobile with the permission of the owner. It is a matter of common knowledge that nearly every automobile accident is due to a breach of some statutory provision. In Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Haley, 129 Miss. 525, 92 So. 635, 636, 23 A. L. R. 1470, it is said that, where there is nothing in the policy exempting the insurance company from liability because of the violation of the highway laws, "if such a defense were permissible in this state, automobile insurance would be practically valueless." In Messersmith v. American Fidelity Co., 232 N. Y. 161, 133 N. E. 432, 19 A. L. R. 876, Cardozo, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "To restrict insurance to cases where liability is incurred without fault of the insured would reduce indemnity to a shadow. * * * Liability of the owner, who is also the operator, can never be incurred without fault that is personal. Indeed, the statute has so covered the field that it can seldom, if ever, be incurred without fault that is also crime."

The foregoing considerations are to be kept in mind in construing the uncertain terms of a policy under which the insurer claims exemption from liability. "Legally operating" an automobile, in common parlance, relates to the manner of its operation rather than to authorization to operate it, although, as stated, in a broader sense the term may include both. It is not to be presumed that by the provision of the policy in question it was intended to give a mere shadow of protection to persons driving the automobile with permission of the owner. That it was not so intended is indicated by other provisions of the policy. Under the terms thereof, the defendant could not escape liability to the owner on the mere ground that he was driving the automobile at the time of the accident without an operator's license, or that it was driven, with the owner's knowledge, by his unlicensed agent, or liability to any other person "legally responsible for the operation thereof" while it was driven by such person's unlicensed agent. If the automobile had been driven at the time of the accident by an unlicensed agent of Celeste Bennett, she knowing him to be unlicensed, the defendant would be liable to her in the same manner as if such agent had been duly licensed.

[2] If it was the intention to exempt the defendant from liability under circumstances such as are involved herein, one would naturally expect such exemption to be included in the express statement of "Exclusions." All of such exclusions are made applicable alike to the "named assured" and the "additional assureds," and no reason appears for requiring an operator's license as a condition of liability to one assured and not to the others. Undoubtedly an insurer might make such a distinction in its policy of insurance, but the fact that there is no apparent reason for the distinction may be considered in determining the meaning of an uncertain term of the policy. It is not necessary to determine what was intended by the use of the term "legally operating," but it is sufficient to show that it is uncertain whether it was the intention of the parties to the contract to give it the meaning for which appellant contends.

"A policy of insurance is but a contract, and, like all other contracts, it must be construed according to the language and terms used therein in order to arrive at its true sense and meaning. Courts will not undertake to relieve parties from the express and plain stipulations into which they have entered. But, while this is true, it is also a rule well established by the courts that provisos and exceptions contained in a policy of insurance must be strictly construed against the insurer and liberally in favor of the insured. This rule is based upon the fact that the contract of insurance is drawn by the insurer, and in it are usually placed many exceptions, conditions, and forfeitures deliberately and purposely by the insurer so as to avoid liability, and the ordinary person in paying a premium and accepting a policy does not read, or, if he does read, he cannot understand the many conditions, exemptions, and exceptions contained therein. In fact such provisions, exceptions, and conditions in many cases, on account of their ambiguity, have been construed differently by the most eminent lawyers and the highest courts of the land. Therefore the courts endeavor to carry out the contracts as made by the parties, and, at the same time, prevent, if possible, the exceptions and conditions from wholly devouring the policy. It is therefore a fundamental rule that the insurer is in duty bound to use such language as to make the conditions, exceptions, and provisions of the policy clear to the ordinary mind, and, in case it fails to do so, any ambiguity or reasonable doubt must be resolved in favor of the insured and against the insurer." Pacific, etc., Co. v. Williamsburgh City Fire Ins. Co. of Brooklyn, 158 Cal. 367, 369, 111 P. 4, 5.

Instructions on proof were to the effect that there was no legal presumption of negligence, but that it was a fact which must be proved, and that it was necessary for plaintiff to prove that accident and resulting injuries were proximately due to negligence of defendant and his servant.

John J. O'Toole and Henry Heidelberg, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries. It is admitted that defendant operates an electric street railway in San Francisco and that on the day in question plaintiff was a passenger for hire on one of the street cars of defendant. It is also admitted that the street car in question stopped to discharge passengers, including plaintiff, at the intersection of Van Ness avenue and Green street.

Plaintiff contends that, while the plaintiff was in the act of alighting from the street car and before she reached the street, the street car started up, causing plaintiff to fall to the street, receiving the injuries of which complaint is made. The defendant contends and introduced evidence to show that plaintiff had alighted from the car and had safely reached the street, when she was menaced by a passing automobile, and then, in order to protect herself, she grabbed hold of the rear stanchion or grab handle of the street car just after the street car started up. This grab handle, defendant's evidence tended to show, was five or six feet from the spot at which plaintiff had alighted. On the issues thus presented, the case went to trial before the court and jury, and, after a full trial, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Appellant makes no contention that the evidence does not support the verdict, but appeals solely on asserted error of the trial court in the giving and the refusing to give certain instructions.

The trial judge, in effect, instructed the jury that in such case, "there is no legal presumption of negligence but negligence is a fact which like other facts must be proved"; and also instructed the jury that it was necessary "for plaintiff to prove that the accident and resulting injuries were proximately due to negligence of defendant and his servant."

[1] Plaintiff contends that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies to the above facts, and that, even though the jury was properly instructed in regard to that doctrine, the above two instructions created such a conflict that the case must be reversed. We cannot agree with appellant in this regard. In Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Cap Co., 139 Cal. 340, 73 P. 164, it was contended that instructions to the effect that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff and that plaintiff must show by a preponderance of evidence that defendant was negligent, were inconsistent with a proper instruction on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The court held, at page 345 of 139 Cal., 73 P. 164, 166, that it was true that the proving of the accident by the plaintiff raised a prima facie case, but "it still remained the law that, upon the whole evidence, the plaintiffs must have the preponderance in order to succeed." The doctrine that an instruction to the effect that burden of proof is on the plaintiff is not inconsistent with an instruction embodying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was also enunciated in the case of Onell v. Chappell, 38 Cal. App. 375, 176 P. 370.

[2] The appellant contends, however, in addition to the contention made above, that the jury was not properly instructed in reference to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and that the court erred in refusing certain instructions offered by appellant embodying that doctrine. The jury was instructed that a carrier of passengers for hire must use the highest degree of care and diligence for their safety; that, if they shall find that plaintiff was injured in the act of alighting from the street car, or before she had an opportunity to reach a place of safety, "then the burden is cast upon the defendant to prove that the injury was occasioned by an inevitable casualty, or upon some other cause which human care or foresight could not prevent." Although this instruction may not contain as clear a statement of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur as might be desired, we are unable to perceive how the jury was misled thereby, or that the plaintiff was prejudicially affected by the giving of the same. That instruction, when read in connection with the entire charge of the court, and in particular when read in connection with the instructions concerning the burden of proof, clearly told the jury that the burden of disproving its negligence rested on defendant if the jury believed plaintiff's story of the accident. In other words, the jury was told, in effect, that the mere happening of the accident created an inference of negligence—an instruction that would have been more technically correct. Dowd v. Atlas T. & A. Service, 187 Cal. 523, 202 P. 870. We think the jury as reasonably intelligent men must have so understood the instruction. That being the case, the plaintiff has shown no injury.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LUCKEY v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

L. A. 11891.

Supreme Court of California.

April 22, 1930.

1. Executors and administrators §23.

Vacancy must occur by order of court, in administration of estate, before court can appoint another administrator.

2. Executors and administrators §21(2).

Petition and notice of hearing thereon for issuance of letters of administration with will annexed held to give court jurisdiction to appoint administrator on showing of intestacy.

The facts alleged in petition presented a case of intestacy calling for the appointment of an administrator, since the following instrument: "I hereby revoke all wills and codicils heretofore made by me" —designated by petitioner as will, was not testamentary in character.

3. Executors and administrators §20(9).

Order appointing administrator could be impeached only for want of jurisdiction on face of proceedings, in collateral attack made in proceedings for removal.

4. Executors and administrators §21(2).

Petition for letters of administration with will annexed must be deemed application for general letters or for letters with will annexed, according to whether deceased died intestate or testate.

5. Executors and administrators §21(1).

Administrator with will annexed derives right to appointment from provisions of law, rather than by act of decedent.

6. Executors and administrators §21(1).

Propriety of making order for issuance of letters with will annexed is dependent on establishment of will apparently valid.

7. Pleading §49.

Subject-matter of action and issues involved are determinable from facts pleaded, rather than from title or prayer for relief.

8. Judgment §252(1), 504(3).

Judgment relating to subject-matter of proceeding as stated in pleadings is not void and subject to collateral attack, because pleader asked for other relief than which could properly be awarded.

9. Certiorari §64(2).

On certiorari, only errors going to jurisdiction of court may be reviewed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1074).

10. Executors and administrators §35(17).

Order of removal of administrator, entered on evidence insufficient to establish existence of cause therefor, is in excess of court's jurisdiction.

11. Executors and administrators §35(15).

Evidence held to establish cause for removal of administrator who was proponent of will giving him large share of decedent's estate.

12. Executors and administrators §35(1).

Probate court has power to remove administrator, where necessary or expedient to protect decedent's estate.

13. Wills §222.

Charges that will offered for probate by administrator was product of forgery, fraud, and undue influence could not be determined in proceeding for removal of administrator.

14. Executors and administrators §35(13).

Order of removal of administrator held not in excess of court's jurisdiction because of lack of citation of administrator, where situation arising from administrator's application for letters testamentary on contested will called for removal of administrator.

15. Executors and administrators §35(13).

Administrator held to have waived citation to appear and show cause why he should not be removed by participating in proceedings.

16. Process §166.

Service of process in civil action may be waived.

17. Executors and administrators §22(2).

Probate court held to have properly appointed disinterested person as special administrator pending will contest, where administrator had been validly removed.

Petition by David Burr Luckey, administrator of the estate of George Lafayette Finn, also known as G. L. Finn, deceased, for certiorari, to annul an order of the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County, the Honorable Charles S. Crail, Judge, and others, revoking letters of administration.

Order affirmed. Writ discharged.

Ben F. Griffith, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Edmund Wheeler Pottle and Chas. A. Son, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J.

[1] Petitioner, David Burr Luckey, seeks to have annulled on certiorari an order of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles revoking his letters of administration upon the estate of George Layette Finn, deceased, and appointing one E. A. Lane special administrator of said estate. Petitioner contends that the portion of the court's order revoking the general letters granted to him is void and of no effect because the procedure prescribed by sections 1436-1438, Code of Civil Procedure, for the revocation of letters of administration had not been complied with, from which it follows that the portion of the order appointing a special administrator was also void. A vacancy must occur by order of court in the administration of an estate before the court has the power to appoint an administrator to take the place of one who has been appointed to administer the affairs of an estate. Schroeder v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 343, 11 P. 651; Haynes v. Meeks, 20 Cal. 288; Estate of Hamilton, 34 Cal. 464; 11 Cal. Jur. 406.

Petitioner's attack upon the court's order assumes the validity of the prior decree appointing him administrator. If, as respondents contend, it appears upon the face of the proceedings for appointment that the court exceeded its jurisdiction, said decree of appointment was void, and the court was not required before appointing a special administrator to follow the statutory procedure for removal of an administrator, but was warranted in treating said decree as a nullity. "A void judgment is, in legal effect, no judgment. By it no rights are divested. From it no rights can be obtained. * * * It neither binds nor bars any one." Bennett v. Wilson, 122 Cal. 509, 55 P. 390, 391, 68 Am. St. Rep. 61; 15 Cal. Jur. 49.

[2, 3] Respondents contend that a lack of jurisdiction to appoint petitioner general administrator existed for the reason that his appointment was based upon an application entitled "Petition for Letters of Administration with the Will Annexed," and the only notice posted and mailed to heirs gave notice of the time set for hearing of the application of petitioner for the issuance of letters of administration with the will annexed. This situation arose from petitioner's designating the following instrument a will: "I hereby revoke all wills and codicils heretofore made by me." The petition prayed for the probate of said instrument as a will and for the issuance to petitioner of letters of administration with the will annexed. In all other respects the petition and notice satisfied the requirements of a petition and notice for letters of administration. Said instrument not being testamentary in character, the court directed letters of administration to be issued to petitioner. An attack made upon the order of appointment in subsequent proceedings for removal or for the appointment of a new administrator is a collateral attack, and governed by the rule that in a collateral attack upon a judgment it can be impeached only for a want of jurisdiction appearing upon the face of the proceedings. Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 86 P. 183, 90 P. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105.

[4-6] We regard the petition filed and notice given as sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of the court to make the appointment. Estate of Heuler, 282 P. 500, recently decided by this court, is authority on this point. In that case the nominee of the decedent's widow was appointed administrator. Thereafter the court admitted to probate as a will an instrument executed by the decedent and designated a marriage contract, which was found by the court to be testamentary in character. At the same time the court revoked the letters granted to the widow's nominee, issuing letters of administration with the will annexed to a son of decedent.

Upon appeal this court affirmed the order admitting the instrument to probate, but reversed the order revoking the letters of administration issued to the widow's nominee, with directions to the lower court to so amend the order of appointment of said nominee as to provide for the issuance to him of letters of administration with the will annexed. The prior petition of the widow's nominee for letters of administration, upon which such letters were in fact issued, being held sufficient to support a grant of letters of administration with the will annexed, we can perceive no reason in logic or policy why a petition for letters with the will annexed should not support a grant of general letters upon a showing of intestacy, notwithstanding said petition may appear to have been irregular. The petition is to be deemed an application for general letters or for letters with the will annexed, according as the facts offered upon the hearing establish that the decedent died intestate or testate. An administrator with the will annexed, no less than an administrator in cases of intestacy, derives the right to appointment from the provisions of law, rather than by the act of the decedent, as in the case of an executor. The propriety of making an order for the issuance of letters with the will annexed is dependent upon the establishment of a will apparently valid. A notice of filing of a petition for letters with the will annexed must be deemed to import to those who may be interested that, should petitioner fail to establish testacy, letters of administration will be granted.

[7, 8] The facts alleged in the petition present a case of intestacy calling for the appointment of an administrator. Although the petition contained an allegation that the decedent left a will, the instrument offered for probate with the petition, and upon which this allegation was based, was not a will but a revocation of all former wills. The subject-matter of an action and the issues involved are determinable from the facts pleaded, rather than from the title or prayer for relief. 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 366; Hinkel v. Crowson, 83 Cal. App. 87, 256 P. 479. A judgment relating to the subject-matter of a proceeding, as stated in the averments of the pleading, is not void upon a collateral attack because the pleader has asked for other relief than that which can properly be awarded.

[9-11] Having determined that the order appointing petitioner administrator was valid, we pass now to consider the order removing him. Upon certiorari, only errors going to the jurisdiction of the court may be reviewed. Section 1074, Code Civ. Proc.; Fickert v. Zemansky, 176 Cal. 443, 168 P. 891; 4 Cal. Jur. 1022. Conceding that an order of removal, entered upon evidence which is wholly insufficient to establish the existence of a legal cause therefor, is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court and does not merely present error in the exercise of jurisdiction, we are of the view that the evidence before the court established cause for removal. In the order of removal the probate judge assigns as reasons therefor that there exists a doubt as to the regularity of petitioner's appointment and a conflict of interest between the petitioner as administrator and other persons interested in said estate, due to the circumstance that petitioner is one of the chief beneficiaries under an alleged subsequently produced will offered for probate, to which Gladys L. McAfee, grandniece of the decedent, had instituted a contest, which was then pending, on the grounds of forgery, fraud, and undue influence. As noted above, the appointment of petitioner was valid, but we cannot say that the probate judge was not justified in removing the administrator in the light of subsequent developments, which disclosed the existence of two wills, the latest of which gave petitioner a large share of decedent's estate and cut out respondent Gladys L. McAfee with one dollar, while the earlier will gave her a substantial legacy. There are a number of other facts and circumstances, in addition to petitioner's ample share in a will that is alleged to be the product of forgery, fraud, and undue influence, and to which the subscribing witnesses were decedent's physician and nurse, who, it is alleged in said will contest, hold notes executed by decedent for $100,000, although decedent was never indebted to them in that sum, that are peculiar to this proceeding, and hence the discretion of the probate judge will not be interfered with, as no abuse of discretion appears.

For the better understanding of the situation, we will briefly review the steps in the probate proceeding as they appear from the record. The decedent, who had been infirm in health for some time before his death, died at the age of 83 years, and left neither wife, children, grandchildren, nor parents surviving him. His heirs at law were three aged brothers, two of whom were nonresidents, a niece, a grandniece, Gladys L. McAfee, who is the contestant to the will offered for probate, and petitioner herein, David Burr Luckey, a nephew. The estate of decedent in the state of California was valued at $650,000 in petitioner's application for administration. Upon the hearing of petitioner's application for letters of administration on February 18, 1929, he presented an instrument signed by the decedent and dated January 16, 1929, four days before his death, whereby he revoked all former wills and codicils. Petitioner, who upon occasions had acted as decedent's attorney, denied knowledge of any wills prior or subsequent to the date of the revocation, as did Dr. Murphy, decedent's physician, and one Dickey, decedent's nurse, who signed the revocation as witnesses. On June 28, 1929, petitioner produced under court order issued upon the affidavit of Gladys L. McAfee, a will of decedent executed in 1925, with several codicils annexed thereto. By said will petitioner and his wife were bequeathed $50,000 jointly, and Gladys L. McAfee was also bequeathed $50,000, but her bequest was cut down by a subsequent codicil to $20,000 and by another codicil raised to $25,000. The Security Trust & Savings Bank and petitioner were named as executors by a codicil. At the time said will was produced in court, petitioner testified that it first came into his possession upon the opening of decedent's safe deposit box a few days after the issuance of letters of administration to him on February 18th. Upon the occasion of another hearing before the court, he testified that Gladys L. McAfee was present at the opening of the safe deposit box. The revocation of January 16, the validity of which has never been attacked, would revoke said will of 1925 and said codicils thereto.

At about the date petitioner was ordered to produce the 1925 will and codicils thereto, a court order was issued to Dr. Frank Murphy and John Dickey, directing them to produce a will of decedent in their possession. This order was based on the petition of the attorney for Luckey. A will filed June 27 bears date January 17, 1929, and the attestation clause appears to be signed by said Murphy and Dickey as witnesses to the will. Both Murphy and Dickey had testified, upon the hearing of petitioner's application for letters of administration, that they had signed the revocatory instrument of January 16, 1929, as witnesses, and both absolutely denied having any knowledge of a subsequent will. To this will, which named petitioner executor and in respect of which he has applied for letters testamentary, Gladys L. McAfee filed a contest on July 16, 1929. By said will, as before stated, she was cut off with a bequest of one dollar, while petitioner, together with decedent's brothers, David and W. N. Finn, and his niece, Jane Corwin Finn, are bequeathed equal shares in the residue remaining after payment of specific bequests totaling about $27,500. A third brother, aged 80 years, is also cut off with one dollar. Upon the hearing which preceded petitioner's removal on July 17, he denied having received knowledge of the existence of said later will until three or four weeks before said hearing.

On the day after she filed objections to the admission of said will to probate, to wit, July 17, 1929, Gladys L. McAfee also filed an application denominated "Petition for Appointment of a Special Administrator." Said application is also in legal effect a petition for the removal of petitioner as administrator. At the hearing upon said petition, petitioner herein was examined concerning certain charges made in a prior petition of said

Gladys L. McAfee for revocation of his letters, filed May 9, 1929, and which appears never to have been disposed of, which petition alleged him guilty of mismanagement, waste, and neglect in the management of the estate. Were it necessary to the decision herein we should be disposed to hold that said evidence falls short of establishing some of the specific grounds urged for removal. Nevertheless, the statement of the probate judge made at the conclusion of the hearing indicated that he felt, as do we from a consideration of the proceedings before us, a substantial doubt as to whether petitioner had exercised the highest degree of good faith in his management of the estate.

All pleadings, files, and papers in the estate proceeding were received in evidence before the probate judge without objection. The charges made against petitioner in the contest filed by Gladys L. McAfee to the admission to probate of the instrument of January 17, 1929, if substantiated, would not only render the instrument invalid as a will, but would call for the removal of petitioner as administrator. It is alleged therein that the name of decedent signed to said instrument was a forgery and that it was improperly executed, but that if the signature was in fact that of decedent, the instrument was the product of duress, menace, fraud, and undue influence practiced upon decedent by petitioner and by Jane Corwin Finn, his niece, and by Dr. Murphy and Dickey, the nurse, three days before his death, at a time when he was suffering from cancer and dependent upon opiates for relief from pain; that petitioner herein and said Jane Corwin Finn during the last weeks of decedent's life had undertaken to manage his affairs and they and Dr. Murphy and Dickey, conspiring together to secure the bulk of the estate for themselves, had kept other persons from him, and, by granting or withholding relief from pain through the administration of opiates, had controlled decedent and substituted their will for his, thereby causing him to execute the will in question and to execute notes for $100,000 each in favor of Murphy and Dickey, although he was not indebted to them except for the reasonable value of their medical services. A person guilty of such conduct would be far from a person in whom the probate court should repose trust and confidence as an administrator.

An administrator in the position of petitioner, who is the proponent of an after-discovered will, the effect of which is to give him a larger share of the estate of a decedent than he would receive in the event of intestacy at the expense of a contestant who would profit from an intestate succession, has an interest adverse to said contestant and to the estate, both in securing a larger portion of the estate and in establishing his own innocence of guilty conduct. His self-interest may prompt him to uphold the will attacked as a forgery and as the product of his own undue influence and fraud. It is true that the personal representative of an estate in a great number of cases is an heir or legatee possessing pecuniary interest in the estate. But there is a distinction between the interest of a representative under a will duly admitted to probate and that of an administrator who is the proponent of an unadmitted will under attack, on the ground that it is the product of the fraud and undue influence of said administrator.

[12] Furthermore, there are unexplained circumstances in this case calculated to justify the court's action. The will of January 17, 1929, in respect of which petitioner has applied for letters testamentary, purports to be signed by Murphy and Dickey as witnesses. They testified at the hearing of February 18, on which date petitioner was appointed administrator, that they had witnessed the revocation then presented to the court and that they knew of no will subsequent to the date of the revocation. A motive on the part of Murphy and Dickey for concealing the will of January 17 from petitioner and the court is not apparent, since they would not profit as heirs from an intestate succession, nor were they legatees in the will. "To the probate court is given, in the first instance, the supervision and protection of estates of deceased persons, with power, in the exercise of that supervision, to remove an executor when, in its discretion, such step is necessary for the protection of the estate; and that power is not to be interfered with by the appellate court unless there has been a clear abuse of that discretion." Estate of Bell, 135 Cal. 194, 67 P. 123. We are of the view that this power must be held to exist where necessary or expedient to protect the estate, although, as in the instant case, there is no code section providing for removal in the specific situation before the court. As the chancellor is the guardian of a ward's interests, so the probate judge is charged with a similar duty with respect to the heirs of decedents.

[13] The removal is in no wise a decision on the verity of the grounds of attack upon petitioner in the will contest. The validity of the charges made against him in said pending will contest is a matter to be determined at the hearing upon said contest, and not in the proceedings for removal and appointment of a special administrator. But we are of the view that meanwhile he was properly removed and a special administrator appointed in his stead.

[14, 15] Petitioner attacks the order of removal on the further ground that it was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court for the reason that no court order had been issued pursuant to section 1436, Code of Civil Procedure, citing him to appear at the hearing of July 17 and show cause why he should not be removed, nor had a citation been served upon him. We do not regard the order of removal as having been made under said section. The situation arising from petitioner's application for letters testamentary upon the will of January 17, and the filing of the contest to said will, which situation calls for the removal of petitioner, appeared from the court records, and there were no facts which petitioner could produce on a removal hearing which would justify his continuance in office. A notice signed by the attorney for Gladys L. McAfee, to the effect that her application for the appointment of a special administrator would be heard on July 17, was served on petitioner on the preceding day. He was in fact present at said hearing. We cannot see that additional notice would have been of any benefit to him. Furthermore, the court had made orders for the issuance of citations upon the filing in May of the petitions for removal of petitioner by Mrs. McAfee and Charles Finn, and citations showing May 24 as the date set for hearing upon said petitions had been served upon him. Said petitions were not disposed of on said date. Petitioner was not in ignorance, when he appeared at the July hearing, that his removal was desired.

[16] But even if a court order citing petitioner to appear on July 17 should be held to have been required, we should be disposed to hold that it had been waived by petitioner's conduct. Service of such a citation, like service of process in an ordinary civil action, may be waived. Although petitioner objected at the outset to the hearing of the application for the appointment of a special administrator on the ground that his letters had not been revoked, he did not object to the court's then considering the matter of a revocation on the ground that no citation had been served upon him pursuant to court order. He participated in the proceedings which were held in his presence, and was denied no substantial right.

[17] The petitioner having been validly removed, the court properly appointed a disinterested person to act as special administrator of the estate pending the outcome of the will contest. The office of administrator is created as a means of assisting the court in the business of administering estates expeditiously and fairly, and its powers should not be curtailed so long as they are not arbitrarily exercised.

Order affirmed, and writ discharged.

Application by A. R. Patrick for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, to compel the drawing of warrants for the value of two cows slaughtered pursuant to Bovine Tuberculosis Law.

Writ granted.

H. C. Nelson, of Eureka, Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, and Frank L. Guereña, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Alberta Belford, of Los Angeles, and Ralph O. Marron, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J.

This is an original application for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the respondent as state controller, commanding him to draw two warrants on the state treasurer in the respective sums of $8.46 and $38.28, to which amounts petitioner claims he is entitled by virtue of the provisions of an act of the Legislature referred to as the "Bovine Tuberculosis Law." St. 1929, c. 829, p. 1750.

Section 10 of the above-entitled act authorizes and empowers the director of agriculture to establish and maintain tuberculosis control areas within the state wherein all dairy animals shall be examined and tuberculin tested. Provision is made for the branding, segregating, and slaughtering of all animals reacting positively to the tuberculin test. The section then provides: " * * * In consideration of the fact that the eradication of bovine tuberculosis is beneficial to public health and welfare, that before said animal is branded as provided for in section 9 of this act and/or slaughtered its value shall be determined by appraisal, as provided for herein, * * *; whereupon the owner of said reacting cattle shall be given a written memorandum signed by or under the authority of said director of agriculture in substance and effect, and in behalf of the State of California, promising that the said state will pay said owner in consideration for the slaughter of said reacting animal, the amount of money herein prescribed therefor. * * *"

The petitioner alleges that the director of agriculture, acting under and pursuant to the terms and provisions of section 10, supra, established a tuberculosis control area in the city and county of San Francisco; that the petitioner was the owner of two grade dairy cows located within said area; that on October 16, 1929, the director of agriculture caused said two animals to be examined and tuberculin tested, and each reacted positively to the tuberculin test; that they were thereupon branded, appraised, and slaughtered; that the director of agriculture thereafter delivered to the petitioner two certain memoranda, as provided in the section, each of which read substantially as follows: "The State of California, by and through the Director of Agriculture of said state, in consideration of the slaughter, * * * pursuant to the terms of Section 10 of the Bovine Tuberculosis Law of California, * * * of one grade dairy animal * * * owned on said date by A. R. Patrick, hereby promises to pay to said owner the sum of [$8.46 and $38.28, respectively]"; that petitioner thereupon, and in form and manner prescribed by law for the presentation, audit, and payment of claims against the state, presented the said two claims evidenced by these memoranda to the respondent, as state controller; and that respondent disapproved each of said claims, and refused, and still refuses, to draw his warrants therefor.

[1-6] The refusal of the respondent to draw his warrants in favor of the petitioner is based entirely upon the claim that section 10 of the act, in so far as it authorizes the payment of compensation to the owners of animals slaughtered under its provisions is in violation of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, which, so far as material here, declares that the Legislature shall not "make any gift or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value to any individual. * * *" Respondent's position, more specifically stated, is that the Legislature might have directed the slaughter of tubercular animals without any compensation under the police power, and that the provision in section 10 of the act for the payment to the owners of certain sums on account of the destruction of their stock is, therefore, a pure gratuity or "gift," within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition. He asserts it to be the settled law of this state that "an appropriation of public moneys to meet other than a legal obligation is violative of section 31, article 4, of the Constitution." In support of his contention, respondent quotes the following portion of the decision in Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, 99 Cal. 17, 21, 33 P. 753, 754, 21 L. R. A. 474, 37 Am. St. Rep. 17: "The 'gift' which the legislature is prohibited from making is not limited to a mere voluntary transfer of personal property, without consideration, which the Civil Code, § 1146, gives as the definition of a 'gift,' but the term, as used in the constitution, includes all appropriations of public money, for which there is no authority or enforceable claim, or which rest upon some moral or equitable obligation, which, in the mind of a generous or even a just, individual, dealing with his own moneys, might prompt him to recognize as worthy of some reward. The legislature is to be regarded as holding the public moneys in trust for public purposes, and this limitation of the constitution is directed against its disposal of these funds except in accordance with such purposes. * * * An appropriation of money by the legislature for the relief of one who has no legal claim therefor must be regarded as a 'gift,' within the meaning of that term, as used in this section; and it is none the less a gift that a sufficient motive appears for its appropriation, if the motive does not rest upon a valid consideration."

It is a well-recognized principle that it is one of the first duties of a state to take all necessary steps for the promotion and protection of the health and comfort of its inhabitants. The preservation of the public health is universally conceded to be one of the duties devolving upon the state as a sovereignty, and whatever reasonably tends to preserve the public health is a subject upon which the Legislature, within its police power, may take action. That tuberculosis is a dangerous and infectious disease which attacks both human beings and domestic animals, that it is prevalent throughout the state among both human beings and domestic animals, and that it is communicated to human beings, especially to children, by milk and other food products from infected animals, stand undisputed. It cannot be doubted, therefore, that the primal object of the statute here involved is to promote and preserve the public health by providing a means for the control and suppression of this disease among cattle. In providing measures for the protection of public health, the destruction or summary abatement of public nuisances inimical to the public health may be ordered, for all property is held in subordination to the right of its reasonable regulation by the government clearly necessary to preserve the health, safety, or morals of the people. Kroplin v. Truax, 119 Ohio St. 610, 620-623, 165 N. E. 498, 501-502; Appeal of White, 287 Pa. 259, 134 A. 409, 53 A. L. R. 1215. In other words, health regulations enacted by a state under its police power and providing even drastic measures for the elimination of disease, whether in human beings, crops, or cattle, in a general way are not affected by constitutional provisions, either of the state or national government. Lausen v. Board of Supervisors, 204 Iowa, 30, 33, 214 N. W. 682, 684. In the exercise of the right of eminent domain, private property may not be taken without compensation therefor, whereas, in the exercise of the police power, the use of property may be restricted or it may even be destroyed, and no legal liability arise to compensate the owner therefor. Gray v. Reclamation Dist., 174 Cal. 622, 638, 163 P. 1024, 1031; Houston v. State, 98 Wis. 481, 486, 74 N. W. 111, 113, 42 L. R. A. 39; City of New Orleans v. Charouleau, 121 La. 890, 46 So. 911, 912, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 368, 126 Am. St. Rep. 332, 15 Ann. Cas. 46,

In keeping with this doctrine, the case of Knox County v. Kreis, 145 Tenn. 340, 343, 236 S. W. 1, 2, declares that any provision for the payment to the owner of certain sums on account of the destruction of diseased stock is a pure "gratuity," for "the Legislature might have directed the destruction of such animals without any compensation under the police power." See, also, State v. Heldt, 115 Neb. 435, 213 N. W. 578; Ryder v. Pyrke, 130 Misc. Rep. 505, 508, 224 N. Y. S. 289, 294; Cory v. Graybill, 96 Kan. 20, 26, 149 P. 417, 419.

While we agree with respondent's premise that the Legislature, in the proper exercise of the police power, might have authorized the destruction of tubercular cattle without making any provision for compensating the owner for the loss thereby incurred, we cannot accept his conclusion, based on these decisions, that a provision for such compensation must therefore necessarily fall within the constitutional inhibition against gifts of public moneys because of the absence of any "legal obligation" requiring that such reimbursement be made. The case of Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, supra, so strongly relied on by respondent, presents nothing that is opposed to our conclusion in this regard. That case had to do with an appropriation of public moneys for a purely private purpose, to wit, payment by the city of San Francisco for street work illegally done, and for which no "legal obligation" had theretofore existed. In City of Oakland v. Garrison, 194 Cal. 298, 301-302, 228 P. 433, 434, this court had occasion to consider the Conlin Case, and, after pointing out that the statement of the law therein appearing was sufficiently accurate and comprehensive for all the purposes of the case which was then before the court for consideration, concluded that: "That case involved the single question of the power of the Legislature to authorize and direct a municipality to make a payment of public moneys from the city treasury to a private individual who had no valid or enforceable claim against the city therefor. There was no claim or suggestion that the moneys so directed to be paid were to be devoted to any public purpose. On the contrary, it was contemplated and intended that they should be paid to the private individual for his sole use and benefit. There was not and could not be in that case any question whether the proposed appropriation of public funds was for a private or public purpose. The purpose thereof was necessarily and admittedly private and this court held that such a use of public funds would constitute a gift such as is prohibited by the Constitution. In other decisions, both prior and subsequent to the Conlin Case, supra, this court has pointed out that, where the question arises as to whether or not a proposed application of public funds is to be deemed a gift within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution, the primary and fundamental subject of inquiry is as to whether the money is to be used for a public or a private purpose. If it is for a public purpose within the jurisdiction of the appropriating board or body, it is not, generally speaking, to be regarded as a gift. * * *

[7, 8] That the act here in question was enacted for a public purpose is beyond question, and, being a law for the suppression of disease and the promotion of the public health, it should be given a broad and liberal construction that it may accomplish the purpose intended in enacting it. Schulte v. Fitch, 162 Minn. 184, 188-191, 202 N. W. 719, 721, 722; Lausen v. Board of Supervisors, supra. In construing such an act, the courts must presume that the Legislature has carefully investigated and has properly determined that the interests of the public require legislation that will insure the public safety and the public health against threatened danger from diseased animals. The determination of that fact is the province of the Legislature, and not of the courts. It is also the province of the Legislature, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to determine what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests. Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 696, 124 P. 427, 429; 5 Cal. Jur. 719, § 122; Durand v. Dyson, 271 Ill. 382, 391, 111 N. E. 143, 146, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 84; Lausen v. Board of Supervisors, supra; State v. Heldt, supra. We are not prepared to say that the Legislature in this act has abused its discretion, or that the measures it has adopted, including the provision for compensation, to prevent the spread of tuberculosis among cattle, are unnecessary and unreasonable or in violation of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution.

[9, 10] The question of policy which, no doubt, animated the Legislature, is discussed in 2 Tiedeman on State and Federal Control of Persons and Property, where, at page 828, it is said: "The power of the state to destroy property, in order to prevent the spread of disease, has been most actively resisted in the case of diseased animals. This determined resistance to such regulations may be occasioned, either by the greater value of the property so destroyed, or by the absence of a popular conviction that the destruction of the diseased animals is necessary to the preservation of the public health. * * * Many owners of such herds of cattle, perhaps the majority of them, blinded by their own pecuniary loss, when for this cause and reason their valuable cattle are destroyed, repudiate the medical theories upon which the act of destruction is based, and by which it is justified, and consider it a wanton and unjustifiable taking of private property. * * *" It is not unreasonable to conclude that a provision looking to the compensation of the owners of cattle slaughtered under the police power will accomplish much in the way of precluding or dissipating their opposition and resistance to the proper and immediate enforcement of such legislation, thereby directly tending to foster and promote the public purpose for which it was enacted. The question whether the public interests of the state would be at all advanced by compensating the owners of cattle destroyed under the provisions of the "Bovine Tuberculosis Law" was an appropriate one for discussion and determination by the Legislature before its enactment. As indicated in the case of City of Oakland v. Garrison, supra, at page 302 of 194 Cal., 228 P. 433, the fundamental test of the constitutionality of a statute requiring the use of public funds is whether the statute is designed to promote the public interests, as opposed to the furtherance of the advantage of individuals; and such a statute should not be declared unconstitutional because of the fact that, incidental to the main purpose, there results an advantage to individuals. Veterans' Welfare Board v. Jordan, 189 Cal. 124, 140, 141, 208 P. 284, 291, 293, 22 A. L. R. 1515.

It is our conclusion, therefore, that, while the Legislature, in the exercise of the police power, might have directed the slaughter of diseased cattle without making any provision for compensation to the owners, it did not violate section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution by refusing to exert the full measure of its might. "Necessity alone is not the test by which the limits of state authority in this direction are to be defined, but a wise statesmanship must look beyond the expenditures which are absolutely needful to the continued existence of organized government, and embrace others which may tend to make that government subserve the general well-being of society, and advance the present and prospective happiness and prosperity of the people." Stephens v. Chambers, 34 Cal. App. 660, 668, 669, 168 P. 595, 598, 599. In the case of Chambers v. Gilbert, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 106, 42 S. W. 630, the court had under consideration an act of the Legislature providing, among other things, compensation from county funds for the slaughter of diseased animals. Section 52 of article 3 of the Constitution of Texas provided: "The Legislature shall have no power to authorize any county, city, town or other political corporation or subdivision of the state, to lend its credit or to grant public money or thing of value in aid of, or to, any individual. * * *" After declaring that the Legislature, in the exercise of the police power, might well provide for the condemnation and destruction of diseased animals, the court concluded that there was nothing in section 52 of article 3 of the Constitution of that state which prohibited the Legislature from providing for the payment of compensation from county funds. The payment of such compensation was, in effect, held not to constitute a gift or "grant" of public moneys to an individual. See, also, the later case of Kilpatrick v. Compensation Claim Board (Tex. Civ. App.) 259 S. W. 164, 167.

This court has, upon other occasions, sustained the constitutionality of legislation involving the expenditure of public funds because of the public purpose thereby subserved, and this despite the fact that such expenditures tended to the incidental advantage of individuals to whom the state was under no "legal obligation" to do benefit. By way of illustration, we refer to the cases of Macmillan Co. v. Clarke, 184 Cal. 491, 194 P. 1030, 17 A. L. R. 288 (providing for the furnishing of free text-books to high school pupils); Pasadena High School Dist. v. Upjohn (Cal. Sup.) 276 P. 341, 344, 63 A. L. R. 408 (providing free transportation for high school pupils); Allied Architects' Ass'n v. Payne, 192 Cal. 431, 221 P. 209, 30 A. L. R. 1029 (providing for a memorial hall for the use of veteran soldiers and sailors); Veterans' Welfare Board v. Jordan, supra (providing for a bond issue to carry out the provisions of the Veterans' Farm and Home Purchase Act, etc.). Respondent attempts to distinguish the present case from those above enumerated upon the ground that the public purpose involved in each of the cited cases was furthered by the expenditure of public funds, whereas, in the present case, the public purpose will not in any manner be "effected, aided or furthered by an expenditure of public moneys." We have already indicated that the determination of this question was within the legislative province, and its solution thereof, which cannot be said to be unreasonable or illusory, tends to refute the respondent's argument. There would, perhaps, be merit in respondent's point if this were a case where the Legislature had undertaken to vote compensation retrospectively to the owners of diseased cattle destroyed prior to the enactment of the statute.

In passing, it should be said that many, if not the majority, of the statutes we have examined providing for the destruction of diseased cattle contain provisions for the compensation of the owners of animals destroyed thereunder. This is true of the acts considered in Cory v. Graybill, supra; Knox County v. Kreis, supra; Chambers v. Gilbert, supra; Durand v. Dyson, supra; State v. Jones, 196 Wis. 464, 220 N. W. 373; Albright v. Board of Commissioners, 108 Kan. 184, 194 P. 913; Peverill v. Board of Supervisors, 201 Iowa, 1050, 1057, 205 N. W. 543, 546; Kroplin v. Truax, supra, and State v. Splittgerber (Neb.) 229 N. W. 332.

We have experienced no embarrassment in arriving at the conclusion herein announced, because of the fact that the Legislature, apparently out of an abundance of caution, saw fit to propose to the people the addition of a new section to article 4 of the Constitution, to be numbered 31a, and to read: "No provision of this constitution shall be construed as a limitation upon the power of the Legislature to provide by general law, from public moneys or funds, for the indemnification of the owners of livestock taken, slaughtered or otherwise disposed of pursuant to law to prevent the spread of a contagious or infectious disease; provided, the amount paid in any case for such animal or animals shall not exceed the value of such animal or animals." St. 1929, p. 2176. The proposed constitutional amendment has not, as yet, been voted upon by the people. This court, in the absence of a constitutional amendment authorizing the furnishing of free text-books to high school pupils, sustained the constitutionality of a legislative enactment so providing (Macmillan Co. v. Clarke, supra), even though a constitutional amendment adopted in 1912 expressly provided for the furnishing of such books to the pupils of the elementary schools only.

For the foregoing reasons, the respondent's demurrer to the petition is overruled, and the writ is made peremptory.

PRESTON, J.

The sole question for consideration upon this appeal is the validity on its face of an instrument in writing in words and figures following, to wit:

"This agreement, made this 2nd day of August, 1923, by and between Charles Cohn, of Bakersfield, Kern County, California, party of the first part, and E. A. Klein, of the same place, party of the second part, witnesseth: Whereas, the party of the first part has become cognizant of the many charities and good works of Ethel Klein, wife of the party of the second part, and also work done by the party of the second part for many persons without charge therefor, and realizing that it is only a question of a few short years at most that he will have to depart from this life, and knowing that any property turned over to either the party of the second part or his wife would be used not exclusively for their benefit, but for the benefit of humanity also, and it being his desire to do something substantial for them and for charity so that they or either of them shall have extra means to do good works, I hereby grant, transfer and convey to said Ethel Klein absolutely and forever as her sole and separate property, free and clear of any and all claims and incumbrances of any kind whatsoever the properties now belonging to me and known as the Midland and Vernon Hotels, on 19th street, in the city of Bakersfield, Kern County, California, or in case same is disposed of by me before my death then the valuation of such properties in place of same, such valuation to be taken as of the time of my death and to be replaced by other property belonging to me at the time of my death of the same valuation, free and clear also, or cash in lieu thereof at the option of the said Ethel Klein (To take effect only at my death). I am not taking anything away from those who might be considered as objects of my bounty, for the reason that some of them do not care for me but only for my property.

"The party of the second part hereby agrees that he will see to it that the ideas of the party of the first part are carried out.

"Dated as aforesaid.

"C. Cohn.

"E. A. Klein."

(Certificate of notary public attached.)

(Indorsements): "Interlineation be. line 21 and 22 inserted before signature at suggestion of Cohn as his idea is to give it only when he is dead. E. A. K. Aug. 2/23." (Recorded June 25, 1926, Bk. 124, p. 53, Official Records of Kern county.)

To be more specific, the question presented is: Does this instrument show a vesting of a present estate to be enjoyed in the future, or does it show simply an abortive testamentary act?

Plaintiffs, as special administrators of the estate of Charles Cohn, deceased, clothed with the proper authority by order of court, instituted this proceeding on August 10, 1926, against the defendants, to have the above instrument signed by the decedent declared void and canceled and removed as a cloud upon the title to the real property therein referred to, to enjoin and restrain defendants from interfering with the possession of said premises by plaintiffs and for general relief.

The complaint contained the following further allegations: "That the said Ethel Klein and the said E. A. Klein have not, nor has either of them, any other, further or different claim upon or against the said properties, or any part thereof, than such as arises by and through the said instrument so recorded as aforesaid."

Defendants filed an answer and amended answer, which contain a general denial of ownership in plaintiffs' intestate of the property involved, but fail wholly to deny the above-quoted allegations of the complaint as to the sole source of their claim. On the contrary, defendants themselves set up said written instrument as a special defense to said action, claiming the said instrument on its face to be a conveyance of the property to the defendant Ethel Klein, in all respects valid.

Motions were made by both parties for judgment upon the pleadings. The motion of defendants was denied, and that of plaintiffs granted, followed by a judgment in their favor upon the pleadings, from which defendants have prosecuted this appeal.

[1-5] A word should here be said respecting the propriety of a motion by plaintiffs for judgment on the pleadings. This is called for by reason of the general rule that in an action to quiet title a plaintiff must prevail upon the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness of the title of his adversary. Patcett v. Webber, 198 Cal. 440, 451, 245 P. 422, and other cases. In view of the general allegations of ownership by plaintiffs and the general denial thereof by defendants, it may be said that a motion by plaintiffs for judgment on the pleadings is improper, as such a motion is in the nature of a demurrer to the answer, and, where the answer raises a material issue, no such motion can be allowed to prevail. Cass v. Rochester, 174 Cal. 358, 163 P. 212; Neale v. Morrow, 174 Cal. 49, 161 P. 1165. But if it be assumed that we have an action to quiet title before us, the above rules are without application, for both plaintiffs and defendants rely for title upon the same grantor. The necessity for proof by plaintiffs deraigning title is therefore unnecessary. Thiele v. Security T., etc., Co., 202 Cal. 758, 262 P. 308. Moreover, defendants, by failing to deny the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint, setting up said instrument as the sole source of their claims, thereby reduced the said general denial of ownership to nothing more than a conclusion of law that the instrument in question on its face vests title to the property involved in them. A kindred principle to this holding is announced in Morel v. Morel, 203 Cal. 417, 264 P. 760.

[6] We thus pass to a consideration of the validity on its face of said instrument. The situation of one set of parties claiming an instrument to be a deed and another claiming it to be a valid testamentary act presents nothing new, as the decisions of all our courts are replete with cases of this character. Indeed, the rule to be applied in such case is not in dispute, for it is everywhere agreed upon, but its application under varying states of fact causes the contrariety of legal pronouncements found. The rule, as set forth in

Nichols v. Emery, 109 Cal. 323, 329-330, 41 P. 1089, 1091, 50 Am. St. Rep. 43, is as follows:

"The essential characteristic of an instrument testamentary in its nature is that it operates only upon, and by reason of, the death of the maker. Up to that time it is ambulatory. By its execution the maker has parted with no rights, and divested himself of no modicum of his estate; and, per contra, no rights have accrued to, and no estate has vested in, any other person. The death of the maker establishes for the first time the character of the instrument. It at once ceases to be ambulatory. It acquires a fixed status, and operates as a conveyance of title. Its admission to probate is merely a judicial declaration of that status.

"Upon the other hand, to the creation of a valid express trust it is essential that some estate or interest should be conveyed to the trustee; and, when the instrument creating the trust is other than a will, that estate or interest must pass immediately. Perry, Trusts, § 92. By such a trust, therefore, something of the settler's estate has passed from him, and into the trustee, for the benefit of the cestui; and this transfer of interest is a present one, and in no wise dependent upon the settler's death. But it is important to note the distinction between the interest transferred and the enjoyment of that interest. The enjoyment of the cestui may be made to commence in the future, and to depend for its commencement upon the termination of an existing life or lives, or an intermediate estate."

The above doctrine made applicable to a conveyance in trust is, of course, equally applicable to a conveyance of any other estate in property, which was the case in Tennant v. John Tennant Memorial Home, 167 Cal. 570, 577, 140 P. 242, where we find the above-mentioned rule specially approved.

[7] A survey of the instrument in question shows that it partakes of the nature of a covenant, also of a conveyance, and also of a testament. The question in its last analysis is, What was the intent of the decedent in executing it? Did he intend thereby to convey an interest in presenti in said real property? It is true that he used appropriate words of grant followed by language commonly found in what is known as a warranty deed. It is also true that no consideration is required to support such a document, if otherwise valid and delivered. But following the granting clause, we find that decedent reserved the right to dispose of said property prior to his death, and that in such case the property so conveyed was to be valued as of the date of his death, and other property clear of all incumbrances owned by him at such time was likewise to be valued and used to replace said property conveyed, or, at the option of said defendant Ethel Klein, cash might be received.

in lieu of the full value at the time of death of such property. So much of the instrument as is last referred to contains language not inappropriate as part of a conveyance under the doctrine of the Tennant Case, supra, but such language is equally, if not more, appropriate as a testamentary act. But we find that decedent, prior to the execution of said instrument, caused to be inserted therein, the following words: "To take effect only at my death." The document was then indorsed by the party of the second part in these words: "Interlineation * * * inserted before signature at suggestion of Cohn as his idea is to give it only when he is dead."

This language shows unmistakably in our opinion that it was the intent of the decedent that no present estate should be transferred, and that said instrument should take effect only at the time of his death and should convey no estate prior thereto. We think to the point is the case of Niccolls v. Niccolls, 168 Cal. 444, 143 P. 712, 713, where a conveyance in trust was under review which contained the following language: "That the said trustors by these presents, to take effect only upon the death of said Robert Niccolls, one of said trustors, sell, assign, transfer and confirm unto the said trustees, in joint tenancy, and to the survivor of them and their successors and assigns, all our property of every kind and nature, both real and personal, that we may have and own at the time of the death of the said Robert Niccolls, one of said trustors, to have and to hold the same. * * *" In said case it was held that no present interest in the property of the trustors was thereby conveyed.

We realize, as above intimated, that almost innumerable cases may be found in other jurisdictions, some to one effect and some to the opposite, upon the question here involved, and it is therefore useless to undertake to discuss authorities upon it, but we have found the recent case of Nobell v. Town of Beaver, 133 Okl. 247, 271 P. 420, where an instrument in the form of a deed was executed which just prior to the habendum clause contained the following recital: "The conditions of this instrument are such that it is to be void and without effect until on and after the death of the said John R. Thomas, when it shall then come into full force and effect." The above language, to our mind, carries little, if any, different meaning from that inserted in the instrument before us, "to take effect only at my death." The Oklahoma court summed up the situation as follows: "There is no dispute between the parties as to the law. The dispute arises only in its application to the facts. The adjudicated cases furnish little, if any, assistance in construing the instrument in question. Numerous cases may be found from practically every state in the Union in which the courts have been called upon to construe language used in instruments of this character, and in many of the cases practically the same language has been differently construed by different courts. We have examined many cases in which the question here involved is discussed, but, in our opinion, it would serve no useful purpose to enter into an extended discussion thereof. The only conclusion to be reached from the mass of decided cases is that each case must be governed and decided according to the particular facts of the individual case."

In concluding that the instrument did not convey any present estate, the court said: "Applying, then, the above rules, does the instrument in question convey a present interest in the land? We think not. The instrument is executed on the express condition that the same should be void and of no effect until after the death of the grantor. If the deed be void until after the grantor's death, certainly no interest in the land can pass until such death. This being true, the instrument cannot be said to be a deed, but is an instrument attempting to make a testamentary disposition of the land, and void because not executed and attested in accordance with the law relating to wills."

It is only fair to counsel to say also that we have found a second case by the Supreme Court of Georgia, Montgomery v. Reeves, 167 Ga. 623, 146 S. E. 311, where similar language appears to have been given an opposite construction from that quoted above. But in viewing the instrument before us as a whole, we are satisfied that the decedent never intended thereby to convey unto the defendant Ethel Klein any present estate whatsoever in said property, and that it was his intention that the instrument take effect only as a testamentary act. Having in that regard failed to comply with the requirements of the statute as to execution, it follows that the document as a testament is inoperative.

The action of the court below in declaring the instrument invalid and ordering the same canceled was, therefore, proper, and the judgment is hereby affirmed.

RINALDI v. BARASCH et al.
S. F. 13865.

Supreme Court of California.

April 22, 1930.

Brokers ☞4.

Transactions between purchaser and broker held to show broker's receipt of money in course of "real estate transaction," rendering surety liable (Real Estate Broker's Act).

Third person, in answer to advertisement of broker acting for owner, offered to purchase business advertised for sale, but, before receiving transfer and after paying price, demanded return of money. Broker, over purchaser's protest, and in fraud of his right to return of money, transferred to him interest in real estate partnership in lieu of money, but purchaser insisted on money and issued warrant for broker's arrest, whereupon part of money was returned and a note given for part of balance, and broker took back a retransfer of interest in his business. Question presented was whether broker obtained purchaser's money during course of real estate transaction so as to render broker's surety liable under Real Estate Broker's Act (St. 1919, p. 1252, as amended).

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant American Surety Company of New York. Briefly stated, the facts are: The defendants Barasch and Baldocchi were real estate brokers, and the American Surety Company of New York was the surety upon the bond of Barasch. The brokers inserted an advertisement in an Italian newspaper, offering to sell an interest in a manufacturing business, the purchaser to work in the business and to receive $40 a week and profits, and to invest $1,500. Plaintiff, who could not read nor write, and had never been to school, according to his own testimony, which appears uncontradicted in the record, called in response to this advertisement. Barasch took him to a "shack" used for a furniture factory, and told him that a profitable business was being operated there. Barasch sold plaintiff an interest in this "shack," lot, and business, and assured him that, if the business did not pay, he might have his money returned to him. The testimony of the plaintiff was: "He (Barasch) said, 'This place don't look good, and that is the price, but you see yourself, the house is not worth much, it is an old house, but it make good business, and then you see yourself,' and we went to see, and I didn't believe the business was good—the house was nothing—the money buys a lot and a shack and everything." A man named Stone was the owner of the business, and Barasch was selling as his agent.

Plaintiff paid the $1,500 and received a receipt therefor. Before receiving a transfer of the property, and a day or so after paying his money, plaintiff testified that Barasch told him that the business and property was not a good purchase; that he (Barasch) could not recommend it. Plaintiff, therefore, said he would not buy it, and demanded the return of his money. Barasch would not return it. Upon repeated demands for his money by plaintiff, Barasch insisted upon transferring to plaintiff in lieu of his money a one-sixth interest in the real estate business which was operated and owned by him. Plaintiff protested, and said he wanted his money, and Barasch told him, if he wanted his money, he could sell the one-sixth interest in the real estate business. Plaintiff insisted upon his money, saying that he knew nothing of the real estate business, and could not read nor write. Barasch, however, transferred to plaintiff this interest in the real estate business instead of returning his money as demanded by the plaintiff, and this transfer and the retransfer by plaintiff to Barasch, herein-after mentioned, is the evidence relied upon in the case to show that the transaction was one between plaintiff and Barasch individually, and not between plaintiff and said defendant, as agent for another.

Later, plaintiff had a warrant issued for Barasch's arrest, and Barasch gave plaintiff $600 in cash and a note for $600, taking back a retransfer of the interest in the real estate business and a release of all liability, conditioned, however, upon payment of the note. The note was never paid, and Barasch did not appear to defend this action brought against him as a joint defendant. Plaintiff sued upon the broker's bond, and the trial court found that the transaction involved the sale of the broker's own property, and was not a transaction as a real estate broker. Such a finding, in view of the express provisions of the Real Estate Broker's Act (St. 1919, p. 1252, as amended), necessitated a judgment exonerating the surety.

However, we feel that a broad view of all the facts is opposed to this finding of the trial court. The uncontradicted testimony is that the transaction through which the broker obtained the plaintiff's money was one in which Barasch acted as a broker for Stone; it was the sale of the furniture business, lot, building, and good will for $1,500. The plaintiff explained why he took the instrument transferring him a one-sixth interest in the real estate business, and that testimony is uncontradicted in the record. He shows that Barasch wrongfully retained plaintiff's money and refused to return it after repeated demands, and insisted upon transferring to him instead this interest in the real estate business. This transfer was made over the plaintiff's protests that he did not want this business; that he could not read nor write; that he wanted his money. Barasch insisted that the way to get the money back was for plaintiff to sell this one-sixth interest in the real estate business. The trial court appropriately characterized the transaction as "bunk, fraud, almost highway robbery." It is plain the parties were dealing on an unequal footing, and that the contract for the purchase of the real estate business was forced upon the plaintiff through duress, fraud, and against his will. This made it a voidable transaction, and the plaintiff has returned the consideration received, having restored to Barasch the one-sixth interest in the real estate business, and elects to avoid the transaction.

That leaves the original transaction standing, whereby the broker received the plaintiff's money in the course of a real estate transaction and has given no consideration therefor, has retained $900 of the amount received, and refuses to account therefor. This clearly brings the matter within the Real Estate Broker's Act, and fixes the liability of the defendant surety.

The surety has been compensated for its services, and its bond enabled the broker to act as such in a transaction in which the plaintiff was defrauded. Under the circumstances, the foregoing view of the facts seems the only equitable one.

The judgment in favor of the defendant American Surety Company of New York is reversed.

BARBIERI v. LAW.★
S. F. 13289.

Supreme Court of California.
April 29, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 29, 1930.

1. Negligence ⇨45.

Building owner owed scavenger using sidewalk elevator in collecting refuse only duty to exercise ordinary care for his safety.

2. Negligence ⇨136(23).

Where scavenger using sidewalk elevator in collecting refuse was crushed between elevator floor and sidewalk doors while attempting to unlatch doors, negligence of building owner held for jury.

The evidence disclosed that the scavenger stepped on elevator, which was raised slightly above basement floor, and attempted to unlatch sidewalk doors, and that while so doing the elevator started up, crushing scavenger, and that safety device which would have prevented elevator from operating while sidewalk doors were closed was not on elevator and in working order.

3. Negligence ⇨111(1).

Complaint alleging negligence in general terms, in action for injuries to one crushed by sidewalk elevator, held sufficient.

4. Negligence ⇨121(3).

Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held inapplicable where scavenger using sidewalk elevator collecting refuse was crushed between elevator floor and sidewalk doors while trying to unlatch doors.

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was inapplicable, since the instrumentality which caused the injury was at time within scavenger's power to operate.

5. Appeal and error ⇨999(3).

Implied finding that absence of device which would have prevented sidewalk elevator from ascending before scavenger had sidewalk doors unlatched was proximate cause of injury to scavenger held binding.

6. Negligence ⇨136(26).

Contributory negligence of scavenger injured when sidewalk elevator ascended while he was attempting to unlatch sidewalk doors crushing him held for jury.

Action by Frank B. Barbieri against Herbert E. Law. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

PRESTON, J.

The judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in this action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received by him while using a sidewalk elevator or hoist is hereby affirmed.

For about two years prior to the accident it had been the custom of plaintiff, a twenty-eight year old Italian, knowing little English, in the employ of a scavenger company, to make regular calls at the Monadnock building, which extends from Market to Stevenson street in San Francisco, for the purpose of collecting refuse from the basement thereof. The building, which was owned by appellant, had no rear entrance except through a sidewalk elevator, or hoist, which dropped some eight feet from sidewalk level to floor of basement. It was customary for the building night watchman to leave unlocked for plaintiff the sidewalk doors giving access to said elevator. Plaintiff would then open them, pull a chain from the sidewalk to raise the elevator, descend on it with sack or blanket in which to carry the rubbish, load it, ascend with it to the sidewalk, and then place it on the scavenger truck. At times, however, the watchman had neglected to unlock said sidewalk doors, which unlatched only from underneath.

The morning of the accident, which occurred on February 3, 1926, at about 5 o'clock a. m., was one of these occasions. Plaintiff called as usual, but found the two iron sidewalk doors locked. He therefore went around the corner to the front entrance of the building and rang for the night watchman, who answered and took him down into the basement by one of the building's front passenger elevators. Said watchman, remaining in the front elevator, then directed plaintiff to go to the rear of the basement and take the sidewalk elevator himself.

Plaintiff testified that said elevator had been stopped so that its floor was about a foot and a half above the level of the basement floor. The basement was dimly lighted. He stepped up on the elevator and, raising on his toes, reached up to unlatch the sidewalk doors, steadying himself by placing his right hand on the side of elevator shaft. While he was in that position (evidently because he was inadvertently pressing upon the operating lever), the elevator started up and he was crushed between the floor thereof and said sidewalk doors. A policeman and several pressmen on duty in the vicinity heard him scream, rushed up the street, forced open the iron doors, extricated him, and aided in rushing him to the hospital.

He sustained a profound nervous shock, numerous bruises, a severe fracture of the left femur or thigh bone of the left leg, with severe laceration of the muscles and tendons thereof, together with internal injuries to his head, shoulders, chest, and body, a twisting of the knee and ankle joints of both legs and left pelvis, and wrenching of ligaments of the lower spine. He was first confined to the hospital for about eleven weeks and later for a period of about twenty-three weeks. The injury to his leg, it was testified, would cause him some degree of permanent disability.

Said hoist was the usual hydraulic type of sidewalk elevator, operated by a starting lever or control chain with two rings. Pursuant to safety orders of the Industrial Accident Commission, it had been equipped with an iron rod safety device, which, when in place, prevented its operation while the sidewalk doors were closed. The engineer of the Monadnock building, a witness for plaintiff, testified that at the time he made his customary daily inspection, late in the afternoon preceding the accident, the safety device was intact and working properly. An elevator inspector for the Industrial Accident Commission, however, testified that said engineer told him after the accident that shortly prior thereto he had taken the device off to make repairs and had not replaced it. This statement, in turn, was discredited by other witnesses, who testified that the engineer had referred to the removal of a bumper or stop and not to the safety device. Other testimony showed that the device was found, after the accident, lying near the elevator. Whatever the facts of the matter may be, certain it is that the device was not on the elevator and in working order at the time plaintiff stepped on it, for, if it had been, the elevator would not have ascended until after the sidewalk doors had been opened.

In this state of the case the court refused to direct a verdict for defendant; the jury, upon the conflicting evidence, brought in a verdict for $11,000 for plaintiff and judgment in his favor followed. No claim is or under the evidence could be made that the amount awarded was excessive, but upon other grounds hereinafter set forth, defendant has prosecuted this appeal. In our opinion the matters urged by him all involve questions properly submitted to the jury, upon which their action is conclusive.

[1, 2] First, appellant urges, the verdict is not justified by the evidence, in that he claims that the testimony of his own witnesses and the witnesses for plaintiff alike established his freedom from any degree of negligence whatsoever. In this respect, he states he owed respondent only the duty to exercise ordinary care for his safety, which care was fully accorded him. This is unquestionable, and in fact it is conceded by respondent that the degree of care which appellant was required to exercise with relation to the maintenance of said elevator and respondent's use thereof in the manner stated, was no more than reasonable and ordinary care to assure his safety. Blanco v. Marian Realty Co., 204 Cal. 145, 266 P. 798. But here can it be said that substantial evidence was lacking to warrant the jury in concluding that appellant failed to exercise such reasonable or ordinary care? We think not. Respondent, instead of finding the doors unlocked and ready for him to open from the sidewalk above, was forced at 5 o'clock on the winter morning in question to descend to a dimly lighted basement and take over the elevator from which, without warning or knowledge on his part, the very device which would have assured his safety was missing. If such evidence was not sufficient to justify the action of the jury, we know of none that would.

[3, 4] The criticism directed against the wording of the complaint is not well founded, as negligence is therein sufficiently alleged in general terms. McKeon v. Lissner, 193 Cal. 297, 309, 223 P. 965, and cases therein cited; Champagne v. A. Hamburger & Sons, 169 Cal. 683, 147 P. 954; 19 Cal. Jur. § 96, p. 671. But we do agree with appellant that this is not a case where the facts warrant application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, for the instrumentality which caused the injury was at the time within respondent's power to operate. See 19 Cal. Jur. p. 708, § 125 et seq., and many cases cited in note. In fact, respondent admits that as a matter of law he is in no position to rely upon the claim that the elevator ascended automatically, in an unexplained manner, when he stepped upon it, in the face of the proof that the starting mechanism and all the other mechanical parts thereof, aside from said safety device and bumpers, were in good repair and working perfectly at said time. He further admits that, far from being unexplained, the obvious and reasonable explanation of said accident is that in endeavoring to steady himself in reaching up toward the doors, he must have unconsciously and involuntarily pressed upon the starting lever and, because said safety device was not in place, the platform ascended, thus causing his injuries in the manner aforesaid. In other words, there was a substantial conflict in the evidence bearing upon the question of appellant's negligence, and this conflict the jury were entitled to and did resolve in respondent's favor. From the above it follows that there was no error on the part of the court below in refusing to direct a verdict for appellant.

[5] Appellant, however, further contends that the absence of the safety device was a mere mechanical condition, without causal power, and therefore it could not have been the proximate or efficient cause of respondent's injuries. In other words, although the evidence shows that the very purpose of said safety device was to prevent an accident of this character and in removing it or in allowing respondent to take the elevator when it was not in working order, appellant should have foreseen the possible consequences of such conduct, yet he urges that there was an intervening affirmative act on the part of respondent, to wit, pressing upon the starting lever, and such intervening act was the proximate cause of the injury. Intervening impulsive acts, however, do not necessarily break a chain of causation (Champagne v. A. Hamburger & Sons, supra), and, under the evidence, we cannot say that said alleged intervening act on the part of respondent was so disconnected in time and nature as to make it plain that the injury was in no way a natural or probable consequence of appellant's original wrongful act of omission, thus constituting the proximate cause by displacing the original cause of the accident. Upon this issue we also consider the implied finding of the jury binding. See Merrill v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134.

[6] Lastly, appellant contends, respondent was as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence, for he claims that, as no proof of actionable negligence on his part was produced and respondent could not invoke the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, it therefore follows that respondent's injuries, if negligently incurred, were the result of his own negligence proximately causing or contributing thereto; that is, respondent's act in consciously or unconsciously depressing said control lever before he unlatched the doors, appellant claims, constituted contributory negligence as a matter of law. The answer to this contention is: First, that proof was offered of actionable negligence on the part of appellant, as above set forth; and, second, the circumstances of the accident presented a question for the jury as to respondent's contributory negligence, if any. Full and ample instructions were furnished them bearing upon this issue, and it is evident that they believed that respondent did not knowingly or intentionally apply the power to start said elevator. In other words, if respondent's said act did contribute to his injury, it was not by his own fault that it so contributed, which latter element is essential to render the plea available. 19 Cal. Jur. p. 647, § 76.

The resolution by the jury of the numerous issues presented in respondent's favor is, in our opinion, abundantly supported by the record. This fact, and the views above set forth, compel an affirmance of the judgment rendered by the court below, as first hereinabove ordered.

LANGDON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment quieting the title of each of four plaintiffs to an undivided one-fifth interest in forty acres of land in Santa Clara county, Cal., described as the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 10, township 8 south, range 2 west, M. D. M., hereinafter referred to as parcel "A." It is contended by the defendants upon this appeal that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, and that the trial court erred in not ruling that another action was pending at the commencement of this action, and that this action should therefore have abated.

The facts necessary for an understanding of the relationship of the various parties are disclosed by documentary evidence, from which it appears:

By December 30, 1878, Joseph Rispaud and Marius Garcin had acquired, jointly, the following described parcels of real property: South half of the southwest quarter, and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 10, township 8 south, range 2 west, M. D. M., and also the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 10.

These parties were therefore the joint owners, on the date mentioned, of the entire southwest quarter of section 10, and also the joint owners of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of the same section. This entire tract will be referred to as parcel "B."

On this date, that is, December 30, 1878, neither Garcin nor Rispaud, jointly or severally, owned any interest in the land involved in this case, that is parcel "A"; that parcel still being vested in the government.

On June 11, 1885, Garcin and Rispaud were still the joint owners of parcel B, and had not acquired any other land, jointly or severally, in that section. On the last-mentioned date they partitioned their joint holdings. This was done, as disclosed by the record, by two deeds: One from Joseph Rispaud to Marius Garcin conveying all of the west half of section 10, township 8 south, range 2 west, lying north of the Saratoga Turnpike road, and one from Marius Garcin to Joseph Rispaud conveying all of the west half of section 10, township 8 south, range 2 west, M. D. M., lying south of the Saratoga Turnpike road. From an examination of the map found in the record, it is to be seen that the Saratoga Turnpike road roughly bisects parcel B; the larger portion being south of the road. It is to be noted that at that time the two parties did not own the entire west half of section 10, although both deeds executed in connection with the partition use that general description. It was the obvious intent and purpose of the parties to divide up their joint interest in parcel B. Neither party, at that time, owned or claimed any interest in parcel A, although it is part of the west half of section 10 and lies north of the Saratoga Turnpike road.

[1, 2] On February 25, 1902, the state of California patented to Joseph Rispaud the land described above as parcel A. As heretofore stated, parcel A is part of the west half of section 10, and lies north of the Saratoga Turnpike road. The defendants, claiming through Garcin, among other things, claim that the deed of 1885 served to pass this after-acquired property to them. It is clear, in our opinion, that the doctrine that after-acquired title inures to the benefit of the grantee has no application to such a case. The basis of that doctrine is estoppel, and, when the facts clearly show that there was no misrepresentation, directly or indirectly, then there is nothing for the estoppel to act upon. The partition deeds used a very general description—the first time in the whole chain of title that that description was used. It seems perfectly obvious, that it was not the intention of the parties to the partition deeds to include parcel A in the deeds, even though it is covered in a general way by the description used. In other words, the trial court read the description in this partition deed as being qualified by the holdings of the parties at its date.

It is true the record contains other evidence relied upon by appellants to show a contrary intention of the parties to the partition deeds, such as mortgages, etc., executed later by the successors of Garcin, in which the same general description is given, which was copied, evidently, from the deed in partition given by Rispaud to Garcin, but the most that can be said of this evidence is that the trial court might have resolved the doubt in favor of defendants as there were facts and circumstances in evidence which would have warranted a different conclusion from the one reached. However, we cannot say that the conclusion reached was an improper or unreasonable one from the record.

The court also found in favor of plaintiffs upon the issue of adverse possession, but it is not necessary to discuss this additional reason for the judgment entered.

[3] As to the defense that another action was pending between the same parties, involving the same rights, the judgment roll in the other action relied upon shows that said action was between other parties than those of record in the instant case; nor do the parties in the prior case occupy the same relative positions as those in the instant case, that is to say, the parties in the prior case are not in privity with all the parties herein; also, the issues in the two cases are not identical. In the former action, the predecessor in interest of defendants (Henry Rispaud) was a party plaintiff, whereas the successors in interest of Henry Rispaud are now made defendants by those who joined with him in bringing the former action. Furthermore, the former action was brought by a number of plaintiffs who claimed to own all the land involved in the present action, against four defendants, three of whom disclaimed any right in the land, and the fourth answered, setting up that he held the record title to the land, and wished to have it adjudged that he was the owner of a right of way across it, which seems to have been the extent of the claim of the predecessor in title of the defendants in the instant case, while in the instant case the defendants claim to own the legal and equitable title in fee to the land. The ruling of the court, therefore, upon this question was correct. 1 Cal. Jur. 31, § 11 et seq.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rule that rider prevails in case of ambiguity between rider and policy provision applies only where ambiguity in fact exists.

2. Insurance ☞146(1).

Insurance contract, in absence of ambiguity, is construed according to intention of parties.

3. Insurance ☞437.

Workmen's compensation insurance policy was not ambiguous in respect to exclusion of those illegally employed (Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 8a).

Although there was attached to the policy an indorsement headed "California Compensation Endorsement," providing that provisions of California Workmen's Compensation Law was the Workmen's Compensation Law within meaning of policy provision, it was nevertheless expressly limited to injuries sustained by employee or employees legally employed by the employer, so that obviously the only purpose of the rider was to insert name of California act to supplement printed portion of policy, particularly in view of provision that rider was subject to terms, limits, and conditions of policy.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, of San Francisco, for amicus curiæ California Inspection Rating Bureau.

PER CURIAM.

Respondent Tony Mazzina, a youth twelve years of age, was employed in a butcher shop by his co-respondent Alfred Michelotti at his place of business located at Los Banos, Cal. In the course of his employment he sustained the loss of portions of three fingers of the left hand while operating a meat cutter. No question is or could be made as to the liability of the employer. At the time of the injury petitioner was the insurance carrier of respondent Michelotti. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award in favor of the employee.

By a decision of this court the award of the Industrial Accident Commission was annulled. The petition for a rehearing having been granted, the cause is again before us for decision. Respondents, in their petition for a rehearing, complained that the question which said respondent Industrial Accident Commission sought to reopen for further consideration was whether the policy of insurance, considered as a whole, actually did, in effect, exclude employees illegally employed by the insured, Alfred Michelotti.

The policy of insurance by which the rights of the respective parties thereto are to be measured, in part, provides:

"VII. Employees Covered [in bold-face type]. This policy shall cover such injuries including death resulting therefrom, sustained by any employee or employees legally employed by this employer. * * * (Italics ours.)

It is admitted that the injured employee was illegally employed by reason of his youth. Obviously the above paragraph excludes any liability on the part of the carrier unless other clauses of the policy include such employment.

The clauses upon which respondents rely are as follows:

"Compensation I. [The Company agrees.] To pay to the person and in the manner provided therein, any sum due or to become due from this Employer because of any such injuries, including death resulting therefrom, under certain statutes cited and described in endorsements attached to this Policy, each of which Statutes is herein referred to as the Workmen's Compensation Law. It is agreed that all of the provisions of each Workmen's Compensation Law cited and described in endorsements attached to this Policy shall be and remain a part of this contract, as fully and completely as though written herein, so far as they apply to compensation while this Policy shall remain in force.
* * *

Attached to the policy is an indorsement headed "California Compensation Endorsement," dated March 4, 1927, providing in part:

"It is hereby understood and agreed, that the California Workmen's Compensation Law and all additions thereto and amendments thereof, is a Workmen's Compensation Law within the meaning of Insurance Clause One of the Policy to which this Endorsement is attached."

Section 8(a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 835) provides:

"The term 'employee' as used in sections six to thirty-one, inclusive, of this act shall be construed to mean: Every person in the service of an employer as defined by section seven hereof under any * * * contract of hire * * * including minors, whether lawfully or unlawfully employed. * * *

[1, 2] Respondents contend that in reading these various clauses together an ambiguity is created which under rules of construction must be determined in favor of the insured and against the carrier. In a former decision of this court some of the issues here presented were determined adversely to respondent. In Maryland Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 179 Cal. 716, 178 P. 858, the same type of policy was involved, containing a clause identical with the one here involved, excluding those illegally employed. This court held that such a clause released the carrier from liability. Subsequent to that case section 8(a) of the act was enacted defining employee as one "lawfully or unlawfully employed." Respondents contend that since 1917 those unlawfully employed are now covered on the theory that, where there is ambiguity between a rider and a proviso in the policy, the rider prevails. Royal Insurance Co. v. Caledonian Ins. Co., 182 Cal. 219, 223, 187 P. 748. But that rule only applies where an ambiguity in fact exists. Where there is no ambiguity, a contract of insurance, like any other contract, is construed according to the intention of the parties. Rankin v. Amazon Ins. Co., 89 Cal. 203, 26 P. 872, 23 Am. St. Rep. 460; Finkbohner v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 6 Cal. App. 379, 92 P. 318. As stated in 14 Cal. Jur. 446:

"The rule that a policy should be construed in favor of the insured applies only to resolve an uncertainty or ambiguity in his favor; it may not be invoked to change the nature of the contract, or to nullify an express and unequivocal agreement. Where the terms are plain and explicit and the meaning clear, courts indulge in no forced construction in order to cast a liability upon the insurer which it has not assumed."

Obviously, the only purpose of the clause in the rider above set forth was to insert the name of the California act to supplement the printed portion of the policy. This is made clear by the provisions of paragraph I of the policy, supra. This interpretation becomes increasingly clear because at the end of the so-called "rider" is this clause: "Subject to the terms, limits and conditions of the Policy."

[3] Thus the policy is intended to cover all employees of the insured except those specifically excluded in the policy, to wit, those illegally employed. We can find no ambiguity in the policy.

The conclusion above reached is in conformity with, and necessarily follows from, two other decisions of this court recently rendered—Zurich General Accident, etc., Co. v. Stadelman, 280 P. 687, and Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation Ltd. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 280 P. 690, in both of which, by implication, the above result was reached. In those cases both employees were legally employed, but within an excluded group, and this court held that the carrier was released. To hold otherwise in this case, as petitioner suggests, would be to put those unlawfully employed in a better position than those lawfully employed. If those lawfully employed may be excluded, certainly there is no reason why those unlawfully employed may not also be excluded.

The above interpretation is further strengthened by the familiar rule of construction that, when general and particular provisions of a contract deal with the same subject-matter, the specific provisions are of controlling force. Civ. Code, § 3534; 6 Cal. Jur. 282, and cases there cited.

We are further of the opinion that the view which we take of the matter is in accord with the spirit which prompted the amendment of section 31a by the Legislature of 1929.

The award is annulled.

RICHARDS, J.

This appeal is prosecuted by the defendants and each of them from a judgment in the plaintiffs' favor in an action brought by them to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from further proceeding with the enforcement of a judgment which the defendant Millie C. Lewis had previously obtained against the plaintiffs in an action instituted by her as a minority stockholder of a certain corporation known as the Borch Radio Corporation, and in which action she purported to act for and on behalf of said corporation in seeking a recovery against the defendants in that action and the plaintiffs herein, whom she alleged to have been directors of said corporation, and to have in that capacity caused the withdrawal and payment to another stockholder of certain of its assets, contrary to the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code. The prayer of the plaintiff in that action was that the defendants therein be directed to repay to said corporation the sum of $9,500, being the amount of the alleged illegal withdrawal of its assets. The plaintiff in that action, after a trial therein, obtained a judgment in said amount and to that effect, which judgment having become final a writ of execution was issued to the sheriff of the county of Alameda, who has been made a codefendant in the present action, directing him to take into his possession by virtue of said writ certain property and assets of the defendants in said former action. Upon the attempted levy of such writ of execution the judgment debtors in said former action instituted the present suit in equity, alleging that the judgment thus sought to be enforced was void for the reason that at the time of the institution of said action the Borch Radio Corporation was in a state of suspension by reason of its failure to pay its corporate license tax for the year 1923, as provided in the Corporation License Tax Act then in force. St. 1917, pp. 371, 377. The defendants and appellants in this latter action pleaded in their answer therein that the plaintiffs were not entitled to assert in this action the matters upon which they depended in support of their claim that the former judgment obtained against them was void, for the reason that they had failed to plead such facts in said former action and by so doing had waived the objection that the Borch Radio Corporation was in the aforesaid state of suspension at the time of the institution of said action. The trial court in this latter action decided that the former judgment was void for the reasons asserted by the plaintiffs herein and issued said injunction, and from the judgment to that effect the defendants have prosecuted this appeal.

Upon the threshold of our consideration of the main question presented upon this appeal, it may be stated as an admitted fact that Millie C. Lewis, who brought the former action in her capacity as a minority stockholder of the Borch Radio Corporation, had no greater right to institute and maintain said action than the corporation itself possessed or could have exercised at the time of the institution of the same, and that had the defendants in said action pleaded and proved that the Borch Radio Corporation was in a state of suspension at the time of the institution of the same, such plea and proof would have operated to deprive the trial court of jurisdiction to make or enter a judgment therein. The appellants, however, contend that the failure of the plaintiffs and respondents herein to plead and prove in said former action that said corporation was in a state of suspension at the time of the institution thereof operated as a waiver of their right to make such objection to the judgment rendered therein as they are now seeking to enforce against said judgment in the instant case. The basis of the appellants' contention in that regard has its foundation in sections 430 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the objection that a party plaintiff has not the legal capacity to sue. Section 430 of said Code provides as a ground of demurrer to a complaint in any action: "2. That the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue."

Section 433 thereof provides that: "When any of the matters enumerated in section four hundred and thirty do not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer." Section 434 thereof provides that: "If no objection be taken, either by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same, excepting only the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

The appellants in support of their assertion that the foregoing sections of the Code of Civil Procedure have direct application to the instant case cite a number of authorities having relation chiefly to the right of partnerships and like associations to maintain or defend actions when it is made to appear that while doing business under a fictitious name they have not filed the certificate required by the provisions of sections 2466 et seq. of the Civil Code. It is the contention of the respondents, however, that the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure above referred to have no application to a case wherein the powers and activities of a corporation have been either forfeited or suspended because of its failure to pay its license tax. The statute of 1917 relating to the payment or failure to make payment by domestic corporations of the license tax imposed by the terms of said act reads in part as follows: "After six o'clock p. m. of the Saturday preceding the first Monday in March in any year, the corporate rights, privileges and powers of every domestic corporation which has failed to pay the tax and money penalty for nonpayment thereof imposed by this act shall, from and after said hour of said day, be suspended, and incapable of being exercised for any purpose or in any manner, except to execute and deliver deeds to real property in pursuance of contracts therefor made prior to such time, and to defend in court any action brought against such corporation, until said tax with all accrued penalties, taxes and charges due to the state under this act and subdivision (d) of section fourteen, article thirteen of the constitution are paid as hereinafter provided * * * after said hour of said day and until such taxes, penalties and charges are paid, every person who attempts or purports to exercise any of the rights, privileges or powers of any delinquent domestic corporation except as permitted by this act * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." St. 1917, p. 377, § 11.

[1] The foregoing provisions of the statute of 1917 modify somewhat the provisions of earlier statutes upon the same subject, by the terms of which the charters of domestic corporations failing to pay their license tax were declared to be forfeited, while in the provisions of the statute of 1917, above quoted, the rights, privileges, and powers of such defaulting corporations are merely suspended by their delinquency in the payment of their license tax. The provisions of these several statutes are, however, identical in so far as they relate to the exercise of any of the rights, privileges or powers of such delinquent corporations from and after the date of forfeiture under the earlier, or of suspension under the later, acts. In the latter respect it has been decided by this court that there is no material difference between these several statutes as to the effect of delinquency in the payment of license taxes, but that during the time such taxes remained unpaid the delinquent corporation was shorn of all rights save those expressly reserved by the statute, and that "the right to institute or maintain actions is not involved in this reservation but is denied to corporations as a part of the penalty"; and it was accordingly held that an attempted notice of intention to move for a new trial in an action pending against such a corporation was void as the attempted exercise of a suspended power. It was further held that the subsequent revival of the corporate rights, powers, and privileges did not have the effect of validating acts attempted to be done during the period of suspension. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court, 188 Cal. 393, 205 P. 446. In the case of Van Landingham v. United Tuna Packers, 189 Cal. 353, 369, 208 P. 973, the provisions of the several statutes relating to the penalty to be imposed upon domestic corporations failing to pay their license tax were exhaustively reviewed, and it was held that the provisions of the act of 1917 above quoted relating to the suspension of the powers of delinquent corporations were for all practical purposes similar in effect to those provisions of the earlier statutes which provided for the forfeiture of the charter of such corporations, and the language which is above quoted from

Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court was expressly approved. In the case of Panzer-Hamilton Co. v. Bray, 96 Cal. App. 460, 274 P. 769, 771, it was held that: "With reference to the status of the judgment recovered by the corporation after its existence had been legally terminated the case of Crossman v. Vivienda Water Co., 150 Cal. 575, 89 P. 335, is authority to the effect that the trial court was without jurisdiction to render the judgment and that such judgment was subject to collateral attack." In the case of Newhall v. Western Zinc Mining Co., 164 Cal. 380, 128 P. 1040, it was held that a judgment obtained against a corporation, the charter of which had been forfeited for noncompliance with the act of March 20, 1905, requiring the payment of an annual license tax, was void and could be impeached at the instance of a stockholder of such corporation who intervened in the action in which the judgment was rendered for the purpose of expunging it from the record. In the case of Sharp v. Eagle Lake Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 386, 212 P. 933, 934, which arose upon an appeal by a stockholder from an order denying his motion to vacate a judgment against a corporate defendant of which he was such stockholder and which had forfeited its charter for failure to pay its license tax under the statutes of 1915, the appellate court was of the opinion that the motion should have been granted, holding "that when a corporation has been dissolved according to the provisions or mandates of the law, or its charter has been legally revoked * * * such corporation no longer exists as a legal entity, it is then legally dead, and it is no more capable of suing or being sued or of transacting any other business in its corporate name than is a natural person after passing from this life; that a judgment entered in an action instituted against a corporation after it has become defunct, and which is still nonexistent at the time of the trial of the action * * * may be impeached as void and its invalidity shown by any one interested." It was further stated in that case that the party entitled to attack such judgment, whether void upon its face or not, might either proceed by an independent suit in equity to set it aside or prevent the party in whose favor the judgment had been procured from enforcing the same, or might move in the action in which such judgment had been entered to procure its vacation on the ground that it was void for the reason stated, and that either form of relief was a direct attack upon the judgment. The effect of these several decisions bearing upon the rights, privileges, and powers of domestic corporations which, under the several statutes above referred to, have become delinquent in the payment of their license taxes, is clearly that of determining that any judgment which may be obtained either by or on behalf of or against such defuncting corporation during the period of its delinquency is utterly void and may be attacked in any appropriate proceeding upon the ground of a want of jurisdiction in the court to render or enter such judgment. The distinction between the foregoing cases and the cases upon which the appellants herein chiefly rely is obvious, since the latter in the main relate to the application of sections 430 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure with relation to the dilatory plea of want of capacity in a plaintiff to sue for the reason that such plaintiff has not complied with the provisions of section 2466 et seq. of the Civil Code relating to the transaction of business under a fictitious name. In such a case the person, partnership, or association failing to file the certificate required by the foregoing sections of the Civil Code retains, notwithstanding such failure, full power to engage in any or all kinds of business, subject only to the limitation as to the maintenance of actions under such fictitious name, until the required certificate has been filed and published as provided in the foregoing sections of the Civil Code. In the case of delinquent corporations having defaulted in the payment of their license tax, the entire powers, rights, and privileges of such corporations are, under the provisions of the statute of 1917 above quoted, in a state of suspension and "incapable of being exercised for any purpose or in any manner," except for the very limited purposes therein defined. To permit such corporation during the period of such delinquency to institute as plaintiff or to have instituted on its behalf civil actions, would be clearly contrary to public policy as in violation of the express provision of said statute to the effect that "every person who attempts or purports to exercise any of the rights, privileges or powers of any delinquent domestic corporation except as permitted by this act * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The appellants herein have directed our attention to two cases decided by the District Court of Appeal, which it is claimed sustain their aforesaid contention. These are the cases of Kehrlein-Swinerton Con. Co. v. Rapken, 30 Cal. App. 11, 156 P. 972, and H. D. Haley & Co. v. McVay, 70 Cal. App. 438, 233 P. 409. In the first of these cases the question chiefly involved was that of the right of the appellant in an action brought by a defunct corporation after the forfeiture of its charter under the provisions of the statute of 1908 to move the court for an order substituting the names of the directors of such corporation as parties plaintiff in the action. The court held that it was not an abuse of discretion to permit such substitution in view of the fact that the statute there under review permitted the directors of a corporation at the time of its default to wind up the affairs of the corporation and, for that limited purpose, to commence and maintain actions in their capacity as trustees of the defunct corporation. This case is not authority for the proposition that in the absence of such substitution a judgment obtained in the name or on behalf of the defunct corporation would not be void. The other case above cited and relied upon by the appellants relates to the power of a foreign corporation to maintain and prosecute an action to judgment in the absence of affirmative pleadings and proof that such corporation had not obtained from the secretary of state the required certificate authorizing it to do business in this state. It was held in that case that, in the entire absence of an affirmative showing that such certificate had not been obtained, a presumption arose that the corporation had complied with the law giving it authority to enter into the contract upon which the action was brought. This case, also, cannot be held to be authority for the proposition that a judgment obtained by a corporation, the powers of which had been wholly suspended during the period of its delinquency in the payment of its license tax, may not be made the subject of a direct attack based upon the affirmative showing of such suspension at the time of the institution of the action. The appellants further contend that the decision of this court in the case of Perkins Mfg. Co. v. Jordan, 200 Cal. 668, 254 P. 551, wherein it was held that the provisions of the several statutes, including the act of 1917, in so far as these related to the imposition of a license tax upon foreign corporations, were unconstitutional, has application in principle to the imposition of license taxes upon domestic corporations, and hence that the attempted suspension of the powers of the Borch Radio Corporation under the provisions of the act of 1917 was abortive. An examination of this case, however, discloses that the basis upon which the court rendered its decision that the provisions of said act having relation to foreign corporations were void consisted in the fact that such provisions were violative of the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Law and the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution, which prevented a state from denying to persons or foreign corporations coming within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, by requiring such person or corporation, as a condition of the right to engage in local business within the state, to submit to a tax on its interstate business or on its property outside the state. The decision above referred to holds that the provisions of said act, in so far as they relate to foreign corporations, are severable from the provisions thereof relating to the imposition of license taxes upon domestic corporations, and it would seem to be clear that the principles invoked in that case as applicable to foreign corporations could have no application to corporations organized and existing under the laws of the State of California.

[2-4] In the light of the foregoing reasoning and authorities, we are of the opinion that the former action instituted by the appellant Millie C. Lewis, acting on behalf of the Borch Radio Corporation, then delinquent for the nonpayment of its license taxes, was an action which the court in which the same was commenced and sought to be prosecuted had no jurisdiction to entertain; that the defendants in said action cannot, by virtue of their failure to plead such want of jurisdiction, be held to have waived their right thereafter and in a direct proceeding to attack such judgment as void; that the instant case was such a proceeding; and that the trial court was justified upon the facts as therein shown in rendering and entering its judgment enjoining the defendants and appellants herein from further proceeding with the enforcement of such void judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; SHENK, J.; SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.

PRESTON, J.

I dissent. I think my associates by the pronouncement in the majority opinion have made unwarranted strictures upon the strength, virility, and elasticity of the powers of a court of equity.

Those who read the majority opinion will observe that the appeal turns upon the right of plaintiffs in the present action to assert alleged illegality and infirmity in a former judgment in another action to which they were party defendants. Without a further statement of the facts, I shall pass directly to a consideration of the law points involved.

The first erroneous assumption in the majority opinion is that the right of plaintiff here is no greater than the right of the corporation itself, and that inasmuch as the corporation was without life, plaintiff was without right. The facts are that plaintiff sues in her individual capacity, as a stockholder, and also for and on behalf of all other stockholders, to have the defendants, as individuals, restore to the corporation the funds that they had illegally expended. The complaint uses these words: "And to that end institutes this action for and on behalf of said corporation and all stockholders thereof." In this connection it should be further noted that the corporation itself was made a defendant with the additional allegation that the individual defendants were in charge of it and it would be useless and futile to make a demand upon the corporation to sue for the return of the assets. The prayer of the complaint is simply that the defendants be directed to pay to defendant corporation the amount claimed. The judgment substantially followed this prayer and, while it is true that language in the judgment is found to the effect that the "corporation have judgment against the defendants," still this provision may be treated as surplusage and there remains a perfectly good suit by the beneficiary of a trust against the trustees, holding them personally responsible for a dissipation of the trust assets. If the corporation is in default, the individual directors are trustees of its assets, and no rule of equity is better settled or more favored than one allowing a beneficiary either to follow the trust property or hold the trustees liable for its dissipation. This principle is so familiar that authorities need not be collated to support it.

A second fundamental error lies in assuming that the said judgment was void upon its face. The validity of a judgment on its face is determined by an inspection of the judgment roll. So far as the facts are shown by this record, there is nothing whatever to indicate in either the complaint, answer, findings, or judgment, any lack of capacity on the part of said corporation. The judgment is therefore not void upon its face and is not subject to collateral attack.

The further observation should be made that it was the duty of defendant directors to see that the corporate license tax was paid and the corporate powers preserved. Now to allow these directors affirmative relief in a court of equity under such circumstances is to do violence to another of the oldest and most respected rules we have, to wit, that a litigant coming into a court of equity must have clean hands. Authorities need not be cited to support this equitable principle.

We have not dwelt upon another phase of the matter which we think also controlling, and that is that inasmuch as the infirmity does not appear upon the face of the proceedings in question, the failure of defendants in said action to plead the want of corporate power in their answer is a waiver of the right to rely upon such defense. Sections 430, 433, 434, Code Civ. Proc. See also Kehrlein-Swinerton Con. Co. v. Rapken, 30 Cal. App. 11, 156 P. 972; Haley & Co. v. McVay, 70 Cal. App. 438, 233 P. 409.

For the failure to observe these equitable principles and others, I think the present judgment should be reversed.

BUCHANAN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

S. F. 13494.

Supreme Court of California.

April 28, 1930.

1. Insane persons §33(1).

Failure of court orders to name incompetent, served with citation, as person who should be and was notified of hearing, did not invalidate guardianship proceedings (Code Civ. Proc. § 1763).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1763, requires that clerk of court cause notice of time and place of hearing to be given supposed insane or incompetent person.

2. Insane persons §33(2).

Supreme Court presumes on certiorari that evidence not before it clearly showed incompetent's inability to attend hearing in guardianship proceeding.

3. Insane persons §33(1).

Certificate of hospital medical superintendent that alleged incompetent, not patient therein, could not attend hearing, was not pertinent to guardianship proceeding.

In Bank.

Application by Findley Buchanan, by his guardian ad litem, Thomas D. Aitken, for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Frank H. Dunne, Judge, declaring petitioner incompetent and appointing a guardian.

Order affirmed, and writ discharged.

Superseding opinion, 279 P. 1004.

Aitken & Aitken and Frank W. Aitken, Jr., all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Robert McMahon and Dion Holm, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J.

Petitioner Findley Buchanan, by his guardian ad litem, attempts by certiorari to annul the proceedings had in the superior court appointing the brother of the alleged incompetent, to wit, William Buchanan, his guardian. The petition for letters of guardianship alleged that said alleged incompetent was about 73 years of age and was in ill health, and his mind was so impaired that he had become mentally incompetent to manage his affairs and property, which consisted of stocks and bonds, cash deposited with several banks, and real property. The value of his estate approximates $50,000. From all that appears from the record the petitioner for letters, being the only brother, is the proper person to be appointed guardian of said Findley Buchanan, as he is the only relative of said Findley Buchanan residing in the city and county of San Francisco. The merits of the case, considered wholly apart from the controversy as to procedure, seem to preponderate in favor of the petitioner for letters of guardianship, who is the respondent herein.

[1] The argument which petitioner brings to bear most earnestly upon the proceeding is the failure of the court to specifically name the incompetent as one of the persons to whom notice of the hearing should be given.

The order appointing the day for hearing the petition for guardianship and directing notice to be given recites the fact that William Buchanan had filed a petition to be appointed guardian of the person and estate of said Findley Buchanan, an incompetent person, and upon those recitals notice of the hearing is directed to be served upon Patrick Flannery, a person having the care of said Findley Buchanan, and upon said William Buchanan. Notwithstanding the fact that Findley Buchanan's name was not among others in the order fixing a day for hearing the petition, a citation in the usual form and under the seal of the court was issued to, and served upon, said Findley Buchanan. The obvious purpose of the statute in requiring such order is to make certain that the alleged incompetent, who, in the instant case, was within the jurisdiction of the court, was served with citation. The object of the law was accomplished.

By the amendment of 1929 to section 1763, Code of Civil Procedure, the clerk of the court must cause the notice to be given to the supposed insane or incompetent person of the time and place of hearing the case, thus, making definite that the clerk, being a part of the machinery of the court in such matters, may act for the court in obedience to statutory requirements which are merely procedural in nature and do not, in a strict sense, involve the exercise of judicial functions.

Petitioner attacks the order appointing the guardian as being insufficient in that it does not specifically or by reference name the incompetent as one of the persons to whom notice was given pursuant to order of court, but refers to relatives and the person, without mentioning his name, under whose care the said Findley Buchanan was at the time of, and prior to, said hearing. Said order appointing the guardian does find, however, that said matter came "regularly" before the court for hearing, and the fact that it referred in general terms to relatives and the person in charge of the incompetent would not of itself be conclusive of the fact that the incompetent was not included in an order directing notice, etc. But we can see no good reason for invalidating these proceedings, even though the alleged incompetent was not named as a person to be cited if, as a matter of fact, a citation was issued, as in this matter, by the clerk under the seal of the court and the alleged incompetent was served. The court throughout the proceedings treated the clerk's action as originating with the court, and no injury in the circumstances of the proceeding could have come to the alleged incompetent from the order appointing his brother guardian.

[2] A medical certificate in the form of an affidavit, prepared by Alex Raymond, M. D., in which he averred that Findley Buchanan was then under his care and his physical and mental condition was such as to render it impossible for him to attend the hearing of said matter, is included in the return to the writ. Whether this certificate should be regarded as sufficient to excuse the presence of said alleged incompetent at the hearing is not important, as the evidence adduced at the hearing is not before us and it will, therefore, be presumed that the evidence, independent of the medical certificate, clearly showed that the alleged incompetent was unable to attend the hearing. As a matter of record, however, it does not appear that said incompetent was not present at said hearing.

[3] The alleged incompetent not being a patient at a state hospital, no certificate from the medical superintendent of such a hospital that he was unable to attend the hearing was pertinent to the proceeding.

At the time this cause was set for hearing the counsel for respondent called to the attention of this court that the incompetent was in court accompanied by his brother, respondent, and challenged any assertion that the person under guardianship was dissatisfied with the order of the trial court. No protest was heard.

Numerous citations have been made to Grinbaum v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 523, 221 P. 635. That case was decided on a state of facts widely differing in important respects from the case here presented. We feel that no injustice has been done by the proceedings taken.

The order is affirmed and the writ is discharged.

"Mission settlements" were purely ecclesiastical foundations made or to be made in Alta California, by monks or padres of the Franciscan Order, and existing or being conducted by these for sole purpose of bringing blessings and fruits of Christian civilization to Indian population theretofore in state of barbarism.

8. Waters and water courses ⇨140—Pueblo of San Diego on its establishment became invested with land and water rights, regardless of rights of mission.

Pueblo of San Diego upon its establishment became invested with whatever land and water rights it was entitled to under the laws, institutions, and regulations of Spain and Mexico, regardless of purported right to use of waters of San Diego river by the Mission of San Diego, which at that time either had ceased or would presently cease to be.

9. Public lands ⇨224½—Any claim of title to mission lands ceased to exist on failure to present claim to land commissioners, as required by statute (Act Cong. March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631]).

Any claim of title to mission lands, whether derived from foundation of mission itself and its occupancy of lands or from concession, ceased to exist by reason of failure to present claim to board of land commissioners, as required by Act Cong. March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 631).

10. Public lands ⇨224½—Waters and water courses ⇨140—Right in lands and water under private grant subsequent to establishment of pueblo was subject to right of pueblo thereto.

Any right in lands and water under private grant made subsequent to establishment of pueblo of San Diego was necessarily subject to right and title of pueblo to lands and water embraced within its allotted area.

11. Waters and water courses ⇨142—Rights of pueblo and successor to waters required for needs were essentially governmental in character.

Rights of pueblo and its successor, the city of San Diego, to whatever waters of San Diego river were from time to time required for needs of pueblo and of city and of inhabitants of each were rights which were essentially governmental in character.

12. Waters and water courses ⇨140—Permissive grants to private persons over public lands along upper reaches of San Diego river were subordinate to vested rights of city of San Diego (Act Cong. July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. 253, c. 262, § 9; Act Cong. Jan. 12, 1891, 26 Stat. 714, c. 65, § 8).

Whatever permissive grants of rights of way to private persons over public lands lying along the upper reaches of San Diego river were made by virtue of Congressional Act July 26, 1866, 14 Stat. 253, c. 262, § 9, and supplement-tary Act Jan. 12, 1891, 26 Stat. 714, c. 65, § 8, were subordinate and not superior to the already vested rights of city of San Diego derived from its succession to pueblo.

13. Waters and water courses ⇨138—Right to waters of stream by prescription requires adverse use under claim of right acquiesced in by those otherwise entitled thereto.

Nature of right claimed to have been acquired in waters of flowing stream by prescription rests as prime essential on adverse use thereof by claimant under claim of right which has, to extent thereof and for required term of years, been acquiesced in by person or persons otherwise entitled to ownership and enjoyment of such waters.

14. Waters and water courses ⇨138—City's failure to object to use of waters which at time of diversion did not interfere with present use did not create right by prescription.

Failure of city to object to use of waters of stream at time diversion thereof constituted no interference with right of city to use thereof did not operate so as to create a right by prescription or in favor of those using waters, the right of city being always uncertain and conjectural, depending upon particular needs of city or its inhabitants at each particular stage of its development as a municipality.

15. Waters and water courses ⇨138—Exercise of riparian right is not hostile to land below.

Exercise of mere riparian right can never be hostile to land below.

16. Waters and water courses ⇨138—Exercise of riparian right under claim of right against lower riparian owners may ripen into prescriptive title.

Exercise of riparian right under circumstances as are adverse and under a claim of right asserted against lower riparian owners may ripen into prescriptive title.

17. Adverse possession ⇨7(1)—Generally, no invasion of rights of property held in perpetual trust for public uses can furnish basis of defense based solely on prescription.

Generally, no invasion of rights of property which are held by public or municipal corporation in perpetual trust for public uses can be held sufficient to furnish basis of defense based solely on prescription.

18. Waters and water courses ⇨152(2)—City's failure to object to use of river waters not interfering with own use did not defeat its right thereto on ground of laches.

Right of city of San Diego to use of waters of San Diego river was not defeated on ground of laches by reason of failure to object to use of waters by others at time diversion constituted no interference with present use.

19. Waters and water courses ⇨127, 152(2)—

City's right to use waters of river was public right as respected prescription and laches.

Right of city of San Diego to use waters of the San Diego river constituted a public right as respected prescription and laches urged by others making use of waters of stream.

20. Estoppel ⇨52—Defense of estoppel rests on doctrine that party cannot assert defense because of certain facts and conditions rendering its assertion inequitable.

Defense of estoppel rests upon doctrine that a right conceded for purposes of such defense to exist in party, he shall not be permitted to assert against another to the latter's injury because of the existence and proof of certain facts and conditions which would render its assertion inequitable.

21. Estoppel ⇨62(8)—City was not estopped to assert prior right to waters of river because of failure to object to prior diversion.

Where diversion and use of waters of San Diego river did not at time of diversion interfere with any of the uses which the city of San Diego was making of the waters thereof, the city was not estopped to assert its prior right to use of waters by reason of its failure to object to use at time of diversion.

22. Waters and water courses ⇨140—Those diverting waters of river must be held to have known as matter of law of existence of city's preferential right thereto.

Those appropriating and diverting waters along upper reaches of San Diego river and its tributaries must be held to have known as a matter of law of the existence in the city of San Diego of a prior and preferential right to use of waters and to the assertion thereof whenever expanding needs of city or its inhabitants required it.

23. Territories ⇨6—United States in taking over Alta California did not adopt statutes of limitation as applicable to public lands or waters.

United States in taking over territory known as Alta California under the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo did not also take over and agree to adopt the statutes of limitation of either Spain or Mexico as applicable to lands or waters diverted to public use.

24. Estoppel ⇨121—Findings held to establish that city was not estopped to assert prior right to use of river waters (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3).

Findings of trial court held to establish that city of San Diego was not estopped, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, from asserting prior and preferential right to use of waters in San Diego river in so far as necessary for inhabitants and ordinary municipal purposes.

25. Waters and water courses ☞140—Disturbing and disastrous consequences to others furnish no right to deprive city of prior and paramount right to river waters.

That prior and paramount right of city of San Diego to use of waters of San Diego river may be fraught with disturbing and even disastrous consequences affecting other users furnishes no reason for a deprivation of the city of its prior and paramount right to use thereof.

26. Action ☞6—Trial court's attempt in declaratory action to give determination further effect than that of declaratory judgment was erroneous.

Where city bringing declaratory action for purpose of having its prior and paramount right to use of waters of river established neither pleaded nor attempted to prove any facts entitling it to other or affirmative relief, an attempt of trial court to give determination any other or further effect than that of declaratory judgment was erroneous.

RICHARDS, J.

A rehearing was granted herein after the decision of this cause by the court in bank, in order that an even more full and careful consideration might be given to the important questions involved in this appeal. Upon such consideration we have concluded to reaffirm the conclusions arrived at in our former decision, and to adopt the language of such decision, with such emendations as may be required in view of the further light which has been shed upon the subject by former and further counsel for the respective parties, as well as by the briefs of amici curiae filed herein.

This action was instituted by the city of San Diego, a municipal corporation, having for its purpose the determination of the question of its title to certain rights in and to the waters of the San Diego river to which the original defendants in said action were asserting and exercising certain adverse claims. The precise nature of this action was aptly described in certain earlier appeals to this court. In the case of Cuyamaca Water Co. v. Superior Court, 193 Cal. 584, 588, 226 P. 604, 605, 33 A. L. R. 1316, it was thus stated: "In the pending quiet title action it will not, of course, be determined that the city is or is not entitled to any particular quantity of water. If the litigation terminates favorably to the plaintiff, the only right which will be established and determined to be vested in the city will be a right to the water and the use thereof prior and paramount to the defendant's rights therein, and then only to the extent necessary for the needs of the city and its inhabitants. The amount needed is necessarily uncertain and conjectural and dependent upon conditions such as rainfall and other established sources of supply. The subject-matter of the action is the establishment of the priority of right, and not the quantity of water to be taken." In the case of City of San Diego v. Andrews et al., 195 Cal. 111, 231 P. 726, which was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the respondent judge of the superior court of the county of San Diego to proceed to hear and determine the present cause, this court restated in substance the purpose of the instant case. The importance of the foregoing clear concept of the nature and purpose of the present action will appear as we proceed with the consideration of the several issues involved therein. The original defendants in this action were Cuyamaca Water Company, a corporation, Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, and certain individuals and the survivors and personal representatives of the members of said copartnership. The action was commenced in the early part of the year 1923, the amended complaint therein being served and filed on June 9, 1923. The defendants united in filing their demurrer to said amended complaint on June 18, 1923, said demurrer being both general and special and being based upon thirteen alleged grounds of demurrer. The demurrer was upon hearing overruled; whereupon and in December, 1923, said defendants served and filed their answer, embracing seventeen separate defenses presented by the defendants jointly, and also a number of special defenses urged on the part of certain of said defendants individually. The defendants also presented and filed at the same time their cross-complaint, wherein they asserted affirmatively the particular foundation of their adverse claims to certain portions of the waters of the San Diego river over which the plaintiff was undertaking to have established its alleged prior and preferential right. To the defendants' answers and cross-complaint the plaintiff on December 21, 1923, served and filed its demurrer upon forty-two specified grounds. Thereafter and while said demurrer was pending and undisposed of, certain other parties appeared separately in the action with applications for leave to intervene. These were one Carroll H. Smith, who in his proffered complaint in intervention alleged himself to be a resident, citizen, and taxpayer of the city of La Mesa in the county of San Diego, and also an owner of property within the La Mesa Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irrigation District in said county, which said city and said irrigation district had for the sole source of water supply of each the waters of the San Diego river, which said waters they and each of them were receiving under and by virtue of an agreement with the defendant Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, with which copartnership and the surviving members thereof the said petitioner wished to join in resisting the claim of prior and preferential right thereto asserted by said plaintiff. The said Carroll H. Smith also alleged himself to be the owner of certain lands within the so-called Ex-Mission Rancho and to be thereby entitled to certain paramount and exclusive rights to the use of the waters of said river derived from grants of said rancho to his predecessors made by and under the Spanish crown. The La Mesa Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irrigation District also and at the same time presented its application for leave to intervene in the action, basing its alleged right so to do upon its proffered complaint in intervention, wherein were set forth substantially the same averments as were embodied in the complaint in intervention of said Smith. In addition to these, the city of El Cajon, a municipal corporation, situate in the county of San Diego, also petitioned for leave to intervene, making substantially the same allegations as to the source and right of water supply from the waters of the San Diego river as were set forth by said other applicants for leave to intervene. The court upon a hearing permitted the several parties to file their respective complaints in intervention, and in due course the plaintiff, city of San Diego, presented and filed its several demurrers thereto. Thereafter the demurrers of the plaintiff to the answer and cross-complaint of the original defendants and also to the complaints in intervention of said several interveners were submitted to the trial court for decision; and the court in ruling thereon sustained the said plaintiff's demurrer to certain specified portions of the original defendants' answer and cross-complaint without leave to amend, and also sustained the demurrer of the plaintiff to certain other specified portions of said defendants' answer and cross-complaint with leave to amend. The trial court also at the same time overruled the plaintiff's demurrers to the several complaints in intervention. The effect of these several rulings by the trial court was that of determining as a matter of law that the city of San Diego had by virtue of its incorporation and right of succession become the successor and owner of those certain prior and preferential rights to the waters of the San Diego river with which, from its inception, the pueblo of San Diego, as established in the year 1834, had become invested by virtue of its formation under the laws of Spain and Mexico. The question as to whether as a matter of law the plaintiff, city of San Diego, had originally become invested with these prior and preferential rights in and to the waters of the San Diego river by virtue of its succession to whatever rights of that nature existed in the pueblo of San Diego, is thus presented upon this appeal, involving as it does the correctness of the aforesaid rulings of the trial court touching that point upon demurrer. As to the issues presented by those other specified portions of the original defendants' answer and cross-complaint, and which involve the question as to whether the plaintiff had lost its original superior right to the waters of the San Diego river, derived from said source by prescription, or by laches or by estoppel operating in favor of some or all of said defendants and their successors in interest, the trial court permitted said defendants to present amended pleadings, and upon their doing so overruled the plaintiff's later demurrers thereto; and having already overruled the plaintiff's demurrers to the several complaints in intervention, and the interveners having also amended their pleadings so as to embrace and conform to the defendants' amended answer and cross-complaint, and the plaintiff having answered the interveners' complaints and the amended cross-complaint of the defendants, the cause was thus brought to issue and proceeded to trial upon the disputed questions of fact thus presented. The cause was tried without a jury; a large mass of evidence was presented involving the testimony of many witnesses and the introduction of numerous exhibits, thus creating a record of unusual proportions, upon which were superimposed briefs and arguments of counsel evincing extraordinary effort, diligence and research. The cause was finally submitted to the trial court for its decision, and in due course the findings and conclusions of law of the trial court were filed, the correctness and sufficiency of which furnish the weighty burden laid upon this court in its determination of the merits of the several appeals, which have been taken and are being prosecuted by all of the parties to this action.

[1] At the outset of our re-examination of the questions thus submitted to our determination, it has been strenuously insisted by counsel for certain of the interveners herein that the city of San Diego did not, by the terms of its incorporation under the new dominion, become the successor to the rights of the former pueblo of San Diego, for the reason, as urged by counsel, that by the first act of its incorporation, adopted by the Legislature of California in the year 1850, it was only "the Presidio of San Diego" which was purported to be thereby incorporated and known as "the City of San Diego." It is true that in the body of said act of incorporation the area to be covered thereby is described as being "known as the Presidio of San Diego." But it is also true that the area to be included within such incorporation embraced those lands which were "included in the survey made by Lieutenant Cave J. Coutts, First Dragoons, U. S. A., for the ayuntamiento," and which embraced an area of ten square miles. It is a series of significant facts that said area included the then existing pueblo of San Diego, of which the ayuntamiento referred to therein was the ayuntamiento, or in other words the town council composed of the alcaldes, the regidores, and certain other municipal officers which were strictly the officers of the pueblo, and none of whom were officers of a presidio, which was purely a military, as distinguished from a civil, foundation. The act further provided that in limiting the area to be known as the city of San Diego to ten square miles it was not to be construed so as "to divest or in any manner prejudice any rights or privileges which the presidio may hold to any land beyond the limits of the charter," and it was further provided that the corporation created by this act "shall succeed to all the legal rights and claims of the Presidio of San Diego and shall be subject to all the liabilities incurred and the obligations created by the ayuntamiento of said Presidio." These references should make it sufficiently plain that the use of the term presidio instead of pueblo in said act of incorporation was a misnomer, and that it was the intention of the act of incorporation to impose certain civil and political rights under the new dominion upon the area which was already, by virtue of its pueblo origin, in the enjoyment of certain civil and political rights under the old dominion. It may be fairly surmised that this blunder in the way of designation was presently discovered and was promptly sought to be remedied, since we find that the act of incorporation above referred to was repealed by the Legislature in 1852 (Stats. 1852, p. 223), and that by said act another form of incorporation was provided, to be known as "the Trustees of the City of San Diego"; and that by an act of the same Legislature (Stats. 1852, p. 225) the said "Trustees of the City of San Diego" were declared to be a body corporate under the style of "The President and Trustees of the City of San Diego," and were authorized and directed by such corporate name and style to "present before the board of land commissioners created by act of congress for the settlement of land titles in this state, or any court before which it may be necessary to appear for the purpose of prosecuting or defending the right or claim which the City or Pueblo of San Diego may have to land known as the common lands of San Diego." It further appears that, pursuant to such direction, the aforesaid officials of the city of San Diego, purporting to represent it in its capacity as the successor of the pueblo of San Diego, did duly present before the aforesaid congressional commission the claim of said city for the confirmation of its title "to the pueblo lands of San Diego" and that, according to the recitals of the certified copy of the patent to the city of San Diego presented in evidence herein (Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 7), it was adjudged, in the course of the proceedings before said commission, "that the claim of said petitioner is valid and it is, therefore, decreed that the same be confirmed. The land of which confirmation is made is situated in the county of San Diego and is known as the pueblo or town lands of San Diego." It further appears from the record herein that the state Legislature from time to time adopted certain special acts authorizing the board of trustees of the city of San Diego to deal in different ways with the pueblo lands of said city (Stats. 1855, p. 206; Stats. 1861, p. 270; Stats. 1867-68, p. 8), and it still further appears that the Legislature in 1870 re-established the boundaries and areas of the city of San Diego as comprising "all that tract of land known as the Pueblo of San Diego," etc., and that in the same year the Legislature adopted "An act to legalize, ratify and confirm deeds of conveyance and grants of land within the pueblo lands of San Diego." And it yet further appears that upon several occasions, from the year 1872 on, the state Legislature has adopted successive acts reincorporating the city of San Diego, in each of which it is expressly stated that "all that tract of land known as the Pueblo of San Diego * * * shall henceforth be known as the City of San Diego." Stats. 1871-72, p. 285; Stats. 1875-76, p. 806; Stats. 1889, p. 302. It would seem to sufficiently appear from the foregoing statements of both law and fact that the findings and conclusions of law of the trial court were supported by an amplitude of evidence, wherein it expressly found and determined:

"That about the year 1834 there was founded, and until about the year 1850 there continued to exist upon what is now the site of

The City of San Diego, a certain Mexican pueblo then designated as the Pueblo of San Diego; that the location and site of said Mexican Pueblo of San Diego at the time the same was founded, was, ever since has been, and now is, situated and located upon the banks of a certain unnavigable river or stream, then, ever since and now known as the San Diego River; that said stream at the time of the organization of said Pueblo of San Diego and at all times thereafter during its existence flowed into and through said pueblo, and the banks and bed of said stream from the mouth to the easterly territorial limits of said pueblo a distance of approximately five miles, were located and lay entirely within the territorial limits and formed a part of the lands and waters of said Pueblo of San Diego.

"That said Pueblo of San Diego and the inhabitants thereof from its organization during the entire term of its existence, enjoyed, asserted and exercised a preference or prior right to the use of the waters of said San Diego River for the benefit of said pueblo and the inhabitants thereof.

"That said preference or prior right of said pueblo and of the inhabitants thereof to the use of all the waters of said river necessary to supply the domestic wants of the inhabitants of said pueblo, to irrigate the lands thereof, and for other municipal purposes within the general limits of said pueblo, was a right, and the distribution of said waters for such purposes by the pueblo authorities was a trust created, imposed and recognized by the laws, orders and decrees of the government of the Kingdom of Spain and the Republic of Mexico.

"That the plaintiff herein, The City of San Diego, was incorporated on or about March 27, 1850, and thereupon became the successor and even since has been the successor of said Mexican Pueblo of San Diego, and as such successor to said Mexican Pueblo succeeded to and acquired all the rights and privileges theretofore held or exercised by said Pueblo of San Diego and in particular as the successor of said Mexican Pueblo of San Diego The City of San Diego succeeded to and acquired all the rights and privileges theretofore enjoyed, asserted and exercised by said Pueblo of San Diego in and to the waters of said San Diego River; that since said incorporation said The City of San Diego, as the successor to said Mexican Pueblo, has at all times enjoyed, asserted and exercised a right of priority in and to the use of all the waters of said San Diego River necessary or convenient for the use of said The City of San Diego and the inhabitants thereof, and has not in any manner, nor to any extent, surrendered, forfeited or abandoned said rights, save and except in the manner and to the extent herein-after found and declared.

"That the San Diego River is an unnavigable natural stream of water located wholly within the county of San Diego, state of California, and takes its rise in the Cuyamaca Mountains in said county on the southerly and westerly slopes thereof, and flows in a south-westerly direction approximately fifty miles from its source until it reaches the easterly boundary of The City of San Diego, formerly the easterly boundary of said Pueblo of San Diego, from which point said river flows westerly through said The City of San Diego a distance of approximately five miles, discharging its waters into the Pacific Ocean through Mission Bay in said city and county."

It will thus indisputably appear that by the foregoing findings of the trial court, supported by sufficient evidence, the city of San Diego was as to all of its property rights and powers placed within the same category as the other several cities of California which were founded upon the sites of the former pueblos thereof, and which, by virtue of their said foundation, became and have since remained the successors of those property rights and powers with relation thereto which were possessed by said pueblos. The appellants, however, undertake to argue that the trial court was in error in holding as a matter of law that the pueblo of San Diego, by virtue of its organization as such, became entitled, under the Spanish and Mexican laws, to any prior or preferential right to the waters of the San Diego river passing above and underground through the allotted leagues which were to constitute the area of the pueblo lands.

In support of this argument counsel for said appellants would have us go back even prior to the Christian era and consider in our review the history of civilization in so far as the same relates to the slow, involved, and obscure development of the civil and religious institutions of ancient and medieval Spain. If for the first time in the history of our California jurisprudence such a review was being asked, or such an elaborate argument as these appellants now urge was being presented, we might be disposed to consider as persuasively as we have now read interestingly the pages upon pages of Spanish history collated in that behalf. But the difficulty with the situation which appellants' diligent counsel now seek to have us reconsider is that the same question has already on several occasions, early and late, been presented to and passed upon by this court in decisions which are uniformly adverse to the appellants' present contention. While there were other and earlier cases in the courts of this state and even in the Supreme Court of the United States which touched upon the subject of the formation of pueblos under the laws, institutions, and regulations of Spain applicable to the settlement and development of lands in what had become known as "New Spain and the Indies," the great leading case upon the subject applying these laws, institutions, and regulations particularly to those pueblos which had come into existence in California under both the Spanish and Mexican dominion, is the case of Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530 to 624, wherein Mr. Justice Baldwin, Mr. Chief Justice Stephen J. Field concurring, discussed at great length and with much learning the nature and extent of the rights which inhered in such pueblos by virtue of their foundation in those lands which lay within their immediate vicinage and beyond this to the extent of the additional four leagues of surrounding lands allotted to such pueblos as a result of their formal establishment as civil governments or quasi-municipalities. It is not necessary to further refer to this leading case in other terms than those in which it has been referred to and commented upon by later decisions of the courts of this state and of the United States. In the case of Townsend v. Greeley, 5 Wall. 326, 336, 18 L. Ed. 547, the effect of that earlier decision was briefly but clearly stated by Mr. Justice Field, who wrote the latter decision; and his language as used therein was quoted approvingly by this court in the case of Hale v. Akers, 69 Cal. 160, 166, 10 P. 385, which was presently to hand down its decision in the case of Lux v. Haggin in the following month of the same year and which is reported in 69 Cal. 255, 454, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674, 715. In this latter decision, which is the longest and most exhaustively treated cause in the history of California jurisprudence, Mr. Justice McKinstry, who wrote the opinion, went over the entire ground of the land and water rights of the owners of each in California whose title thereto looked for their derivation to the laws, institutions, and regulations of Spain and Mexico. In the course of his most learned and comprehensive dissertation he referred approvingly to the decision in Hart v. Burnett, supra, as to the right and title which the pueblo had to land within its general limits. The court then proceeded to say: "By analogy, and in conformity with the principles of that decision, we hold the pueblos had a species of property in the flowing waters within their limits, or 'a certain right or title' in their use, in trust, to be distributed to the common lands, and the lands originally set apart to the settlers, or subsequently granted by the municipal authorities. It may be conceded that such authorities were not authorized to make concessions to individuals of the perpetual and exclusive use of portions of the waters, without reference to the needs of the other inhabitants, or that such concessions would be an abuse of the trust. But they had a species of right or title in the waters and their use, subject to the public trust of continuously distributing the use in just proportion. * * * Each pueblo was quasi a public corporation. By the scheme of the Mexican law it was treated as an entity or person, having a right as such, and, by reason of its title to the four leagues of land, to the use of the waters of the river on which it was situated, while, as a political body, it was vested with power, by ordinance, to provide for a distribution of the waters to those for whose benefit the right and power were conferred." After quoting certain passages from Escrive, an eminent Spanish authority upon the subject, the court further proceeded to say: "From the foregoing it appears that the riparian proprietor could not appropriate water in such manner as should interfere with the common use or destiny which a pueblo on the stream should have given to the waters; and, semble, that the pueblos had a preference or prior right to consume the waters, even as against an upper riparian proprietor." The court, however, suggested that it "is not necessary here to decide that the pueblos had the preference above suggested; nor is it necessary here to speak of the relative rights of two or more municipalites on the same stream." In the next and later case of Vernon Irrigation Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 251, 39 P. 762, the question directly arose. In that case the Vernon Irrigation Company, a corporation, owned a tract of land riparian to the upper reaches of the Los Angeles river, and commenced its action to enjoin the city of Los Angeles, which was and is the successor of the pueblo of Los Angeles, and certain other defendants, from so diverting the waters of the Los Angeles river as to interfere with the plaintiff's riparian right therein. The city of Los Angeles by its answer put forth the claim that by virtue of its succession to the rights of the pueblo of Los Angeles, founded in 1786, it possessed the prior and preferential right to take all of the waters of the Los Angeles river. The trial was prolonged and the findings of the trial court voluminous, in the course of which it was found and decreed that the city of Los Angeles, by virtue of its succession to the rights of said pueblo, was the absolute owner of all of the water flowing in the Los Angeles river for the use of its inhabitants and for all other municipal purposes. From the judgment in its favor based upon this finding, the plaintiff took an appeal and thus presented to this tribunal for determination the correctness of the aforesaid finding of the trial court. This court, Mr. Justice Temple writing the opinion, gave its most careful and exhaustive consideration to the determination of this question, in the course of which he quoted exhaustively from the Spanish and Mexican laws, approving the principles enunciated in the case of Hart v. Burnett, supra, and which were adopted by this court in Lux v. Haggin, supra, and quoted also with approval the language of the latter case above referred to and wherein it had been suggested, though not in that case found necessary to be decided, that the pueblos had a preferred right to the waters of rivers flowing through their lands, which could be asserted to the extent needed to supply the wants of their inhabitants. There were other questions presented in that case not necessary to be here considered, but it must be conceded that the question as to the prior and preferential right of a pueblo to the waters of a river passing through it to the extent above indicated was therein squarely presented and fully upheld by the terms and scope of that decision, and that the later formed municipality organized as the successor of the pueblo fully succeeded to these rights to which the pueblo had become entitled by virtue of its creation under the Spanish and Mexican laws.

The next case wherein this question arose was that of City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 650, 57 P. 585, which was an action in which the city of Los Angeles undertook to condemn certain lands lying in the San Fernando valley along the Los Angeles river and to which stream said lands were riparian, for the purpose of utilizing the same in collecting and conserving the waters of said stream for delivery to the main supply pipe and distributing system of said city. The plaintiff based its claim of right to condemn the land in question for the utilization of its asserted right to the waters of said river, in part at least, upon the averments of its amended complaint to the effect that the city, as the successor of the pueblo, was the exclusive owner of all of the waters of said river for the purpose of supplying water for the irrigation of the irrigable lands embraced in the four square leagues of the pueblo, and for other municipal uses. These averments were traversed by the defendants. The cause was tried before a jury, to which the court gave the following instruction: "The city of Los Angeles is situated on the river below these lands, and is the owner of the right to take from the Los Angeles river all the water that is reasonably necessary to give an ample supply for the use of its inhabitants and for all municipal uses and purposes for which the city may require water. This right is measured by the necessity, and if the needs increase in the future the right will expand to include all that the needs require. This right of the city is paramount and superior to the rights of the defendants in the waters of the river." This court, upon appeal, Mr. Chief Justice Beatty writing the opinion, fully sustained said instruction in so far as it correctly stated the paramount and superior rights of the city to whatever expanding uses of the waters of said river the pueblo by virtue of its formation possessed, and in so doing expressly approved in principle the case of Vernon Irrigation Co. v. Los Angeles, supra; the court, however, held that the instruction was erroneous in according to the city of Los Angeles greater rights to the waters of said river than those which, as the successor of the pueblo, it had received from it, the area of the modern city having expanded so as to embrace territory not within that of the pueblo lands. The next case in which the same question controversially arose was that of City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Farming & Milling Co., 152 Cal. 645, 93 P. 869, 871, 1135, wherein the city of Los Angeles asserted its prior and paramount ownership of the use of the waters of the Los Angeles river from its source to the city and from the surface to bedrock in so far as it was necessary to supply water for the use of its inhabitants, by virtue of its successorship to the pueblo and against the asserted riparian rights of the defendant, based upon its ownership of riparian lands lying along said river some ten miles above said city. The trial court accorded the plaintiff such right, and upon appeal this court, Mr. Justice McFarland writing the opinion, after stating that the only question in the case was as to whether "under the general law of the locality the old pueblo of Los Angeles, and the respondent herein, as its successor, had and have, as against appellant, the prior and paramount ownership of the use of so much of the water of the Los Angeles river as is necessary for its inhabitants and for general municipal purposes," proceeded to state that "this question need not be discussed as an original one, for it has been answered in the affirmative by former decisions of this court." The cases which are above referred to are there reviewed at length and expressly approved, and after such review and approval it is said: "The foregoing decisions are determinative of the prior and paramount right of the pueblo, and of plaintiff as a successor, to the use of the water of the river necessary for its inhabitants and for ordinary municipal purposes. The questions as to what extent this right goes, a question somewhat considered in the Pomeroy Case—that is, for the use of the inhabitants of what territory, and for what municipal purposes can the water be taken as against a riparian owner—does not arise, and need not be considered in the case at bar." Neither, it may be said, does this latter question arise in the present case. The law and the attitude of this court toward the law upon this subject stood as above stated during the twenty years which preceded the presentation of the same question to this court in the case of Cuyamaca Water Co. v. Superior Court, supra, which was a prior proceeding in the instant case, and in which the issues primarily involved were those quoted from that decision in the earlier stages of the present opinion.

[2, 3] The appellants herein contended in the trial court, and here contend, that they were and are entitled to have reconsidered and relitigated the question as to whether or not a Spanish or Mexican pueblo organized in California under the laws, institutions, and regulations of Spain or Mexico during their successive governments thereof, became possessed by virtue of such laws, institutions and regulations of a prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of rivers or streams passing through and over or under the surface of their allotted lands so far as may be or become necessary for the pueblo and its inhabitants, and as to whether or not a municipality organized under American rule as the successor of such pueblo succeeded to such pueblo rights. We are of the opinion that by virtue of the foregoing long line of cases, and particularly of the decision of this court in the case of the City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Farming & Milling Co., supra, wherein the cases preceding it were specifically reviewed and held to be determinative of this question, the subject is no longer an open one for further consideration and review before this court, and that by said decisions, so long and uniformly followed and adhered to, the proposition that the prior and paramount right of such pueblos and their successors to the use of the waters of such rivers and streams necessary for their inhabitants and for ordinary municipal purposes, has long since become a rule of property in this state, which at this late date in the history and development of those municipalities which became the successors of such pueblos we are not permitted, under the rule of stare decisis, to disturb. We are not unmindful of the contention elaborately presented and argued by counsel for appellants that the pueblo of San Diego, even if conceded to have been regularly established as such in the year 1834, never became entitled to any prior, preferential, or other rights in or to the waters of the San Diego river, for the reason that long prior to the alleged establishment of said pueblo the entire and exclusive right to the use and benefit of the waters of said river had been granted by the viceroy of Spain to the Mission of San Diego. In support of this contention the appellants introduced in evidence before the trial court and have here presented for our inspection and interpretation a photostatic copy of such purported grant. It bears the date, according to the translation thereof with which we have been kindly furnished, of the 17th of December, 1773, and the signature, by secretary, of Bucarely, the then viceroy of the King of Spain over Mexico. It purports to approve the removal of the Mission of San Diego from its former location near the Presidio on the shore of the bay of San Diego to a new site several miles up the arroyo, and in order to facilitate such removal and the development of the then small and in a sense still speculative and quite problematical success of the first mission established in Alta California, it proceeded to suggest the cultivation of its surrounding lands through the use of water from the stream, and for that purpose directs the "Reverend Fathers of the Mission to acquire and administer this concession and Royal grant (privilegio) to the waters of this arroyo referred to for the common benefit of all the nation, whether Gentile or converted, who dwell today or in the future in the province of the Mission of San Diego de Acala. This concession and the fruits also shall be held (ser tener) as to these children and their children and successors forever." The document proceeds to state in immediate connection with the foregoing that "Although a Presidio is thus placed near to the entrance of this stream near to the Port of San Diego there can be no prejudice in this respect because there is always sufficient water for the service of the soldiers, and in the topography and report of Sr. Don Miguel Castro there is evident to the south of this place a worthy river and a torrent smaller in flow and some smaller arroyos from which to drain (disaguas) the Rancho del Rey where their cattle may wander under the vigilant eye of the herdsmen." We are loathe to believe that the viceroy of Mexico, framing this document in the then far-distant capital of New Spain, ever intended by its terms to confer upon this primitive and as yet largely experimental mission settlement any such enlarged, prior, paramount, or exclusive rights in and to the waters of the San Diego river as the appellants herein claim for it. Its language does not so import and it may be said to be doubtful, to say the least of it, whether even the viceroy of the Kingdom of Spain in making such a concession would not have done violence to those laws, institutions, and regulations of Spain which provided for the establishment of civil governments of the sort known as pueblos in new lands so as to take away from these the whole of those water rights in rivers traversing their allotment of land which would be essential to the cultivation of such lands when occupied by civil settlement.

[4-8] We learn from public history, of which we take judicial notice, that the civil settlement of Alta California was coequally contemplated by those who were officially in charge of the primary expedition which only four years before this purported grant had been put forth and provisioned for the discovery and occupancy of Alta California through the joint effort of Padre Junipero Serra and of Jose de Galvez, visitor-general of New Spain. In the broad and detailed plans and express decrees of the latter, precise provision was made for the foundation and development of presidios, pueblos, and missions in the as yet unknown region, and these three forms of occupation were expected, as nearly as possible, to proceed simultaneously as a result of the joint military, civil, and religious expedition then about to set forth. It may be fairly assumed that these joint settlements designed to be established simultaneously were also intended to function harmoniously and not to become involved in disputes over the respective jurisdiction and property rights of each.

This will appear to be plain when the nature, functions, and purposes of each of these foundations is considered both historically and in the light of the Spanish and Mexican laws, and regulations relative to each. Presidios were purely military foundations to be occupied by soldiers, and to exist for the establishment of order and for the protection of the pueblo and mission foundations. The pueblos, on the other hand, were purely civil and political foundations, as the term itself implies, being equivalent to the English word "town" and signifying a civic body corporate and politic, and intended, through the cultivation of the lands with which under the Spanish and Mexican laws it was by virtue of its foundation to be invested, to furnish sustenance for its own inhabitants and for the presidios. Mission settlements, on the contrary, were purely ecclesiastical foundations made or to be made in Alta California by monks or padres of the Franciscan Order, and existing and being conducted by these for the sole purpose of bringing the blessings and fruits of Christian civilization to the Indian population of Alta California, theretofore in a state of barbarism. A mission foundation in its inception possessed and exercised none of the ordinary forms or properties of civil government, but was, and was for a time at least, to be purely paternal in character, with such material possessions as were required for the maintenance and exercise of its ecclesiastical development. The lands which were to be occupied by the missions were to be held in possession by the priests for the purpose of carrying forward the main object of the mission foundation, but these lands were to be possessed, occupied, and cultivated only by permission, and were to be and remain the property of the nation and to be subject at all times to grants under the laws of Spain and Mexico relating to colonization. So said the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Ritchie, 17 How. 525, 540, 15 L. Ed. 236. It was thus upon this theory and assumption that the so-called secularization of the missions of Alta California by officials of the Mexican government, to which we shall presently refer, was ordered and carried forward to its disastrous conclusion. We are referred upon this subject, by counsel representing both sides of the instant controversy as an authority, to the very interesting pamphlet entitled "The Colonial History of San Francisco," and embracing the argument of John W. Dwinelle, Esq., in the case of the City of San Francisco v. United States in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California. We do not, however, in this case find it necessary to finally determine the scope and intent of Bucarely's concession to the Mission San Diego in respect to its new location. The reason we are not called upon to do so is that according to evidence educed herein the Mission of San Diego was in or about the year 1834 secularized by Governor Figueroa of Alta California and his official coadjutors purporting or pretending to act in so doing under decrees of the Mexican government enacted in the preceding year. It is not necessary for us to herein determine whether or not the secularization of the Mission San Diego, put into effective operation in that and the following year or two, was in all or in any of its aspects lawful. It is sufficient to note that by the consensus of both the civil and ecclesiastical historians of the time and event it was successful and that within a very few years at most the spoliation of the mission was so far completed that its productive activities had ceased, its Indians and its priesthood had departed, the former to relapse into their aboriginal condition and the latter to seek and find other fields of labor. The mission life in fact was destroyed and the mission lands which by virtue of its secularization were to become part of the public domain were within a decade thereafter conveyed by private land grant executed by Governor Pico to one Santiago Arguello, whose grant of the same was subsequently confirmed by the board of commissioners for the settlement of private land claims created by the United States government in 1851, and a patent therefor issued to said grantee a few years later. It has not been seriously, as it could not be successfully, contended herein that any of the original rights of the mission or of its founders or their successors derived from Bucarely's concession either survived the secularization of the mission or passed to Arguello or his successors by virtue of his private land grant and the confirmation thereof by the government of the United States. It follows necessarily that upon the establishment of the pueblo of San Diego in the year 1834 as found by the trial court it became invested with whatever land and water rights it was entitled to under the laws, institutions, and regulations of Spain and Mexico and that in the possession and continued exercise of those rights it was nowise impeded or impaired by the existence of any similar or even superior rights in the Mission of San Diego which either had ceased or would presently cease to be. There is therefore no merit in the contention of the defendants herein that they or any of them by virtue of their occupancy of the former mission lands are to be held the successors of whatever rights the mission had, since the entire right and title of the present occupants of such lands relate as to their origin solely to the Arguello grant.

[9] As to the claim of title to the so-called mission lands, whether derived from the foundation of the mission itself and its occupancy of said lands, or from the Bucarely concession, it is clear that such rights, if any existed, either prior or subsequent to the secularization of the mission, ceased to exist for the additional reason that such claim was never presented to the board of land commissioners, as required by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 631), and therefore lapsed and ceased to exist, under the authority of Hihn v. Santa Cruz, 170 Cal. 436, 444, 150 P. 62, and Botiller v. Dominguez, 130 U. S. 238, 9 S. Ct. 525, 32 L. Ed. 926.

[10] As to the Arguello grant, which was, as we have seen, confirmed, it stood upon no other footing as to the rights in the lands and water within its area than that of the several thousand other private land grants in California and, having been made subsequent to the establishment of the Pueblo of San Diego and to its right and title to the lands and waters embraced within its allotted area, and which were also confirmed, was necessarily subject thereto, and hence in no way available in aid of the contention of the appellants and interveners herein.

We have thus, we think, disposed of every vital question presented by the defendants as appellants affecting that portion of the judgment of the trial court as to which the plaintiff herein is the respondent, and it only remains for us to consider and dispose of those portions of said judgment as to which all of the parties herein have presented their separate appeals. In that portion of the findings of the trial court which are quoted in the earlier passages of this opinion, it will be seen that the prior and preferential rights of the city of San Diego as the successor of the pueblo were made subject to certain exceptions to be in said findings subsequently set forth. In these, its later findings, the trial court deals with those special defenses of said defendants and also of said interveners wherein it is pleaded and sought to be proven that, whatever prior or preferential rights in and to the waters of the San Diego river the city of San Diego had or acquired by virtue of its succession to the pueblo of San Diego, it has subsequently and either wholly or partly lost by prescription or by laches or has become estopped to assert as against these defendants and interveners through certain alleged affirmative action on the part of itself or its authorized officials.

On the threshold of the discussion as to the nature of these several defenses and, if available at all to the defendants, the extent to which they or any of them should be given application to the instant case, it will be well to recur to the statement made by this court upon the former hearing in Cuyamaca Water Co. v. Superior Court, 193 Cal. 584, 588, 226 P. 604, 33 A. L. R. 1316, and which is quoted in the early pages of the present opinion, and from which it will appear that the plaintiff herein is not seeking by this action to have it determined that it is entitled to any particular quantity of water, based upon its prior or present use of the waters of the San Diego river, to the extent of its asserted prior and paramount rights therein. The plaintiff in its pleadings asserts no such use of said waters in the past by either its predecessor the pueblo or itself, further than such use thereof under such claim of right as was from time to time necessary for the needs of the pueblo and its successor the city. On the other hand, the defendants and interveners herein have both by their pleadings, their proofs, and their argument, asserted and shown that neither the pueblo nor the city of San Diego ever did, prior to the institution of the present action, make actual use of any considerable amount of the waters of the San Diego river for any public or municipal or other purpose whatever, and that during the entire history of both pueblo and city the larger part of the waters of the San Diego river, except for the uses thereof undertaken by the defendants and interveners herein, would have flowed through and past said plaintiff and gone unused to the sea. In the findings of the trial court no finding is made and no estimate given as to the quantity of the waters of said river which the plaintiff or its predecessor had made use of, or could have made use of to the full extent necessary for the needs of the city or its inhabitants from time to time in the course of the development and growth of the pueblo and the city's civic life, nor is there to be found in the findings of the court or in the evidence in the case anything tending to establish that whatever actual uses or diversions of the waters of said river the defendants and interveners herein, or any of them, are shown to have made, ever resulted in a diminution in any appreciable degree of the amount of flow of the waters of said river which the plaintiff herein or its inhabitants were from time to time putting to actual use under or in pursuance of the exercise of the city's aforesaid prior and preferential right to the waters of said river.

On the contrary, the undisputed evidence in this case discloses the following facts with relation to the uses heretofore made of the waters of the San Diego river by the respective parties hereto: The maximum amount of water which the city of San Diego has annually required in order to fully supply its public needs and the needs of its inhabitants between the year 1890 and the year 1921 is disclosed by an exhibit (No. 22) introduced by the defendants herein, showing the total amount of water delivered to the city of San Diego from all sources during the aforesaid series of years, from which it appears that during the year 1918 there was so delivered to said city a total of 3,634,205,- 289 gallons of water. This amount appears to denote the peak of the city's requirement for all of its aforesaid needs during the years immediately preceding the institution of the present action, and it may fairly be taken, therefore, to exemplify the full amount which the city of San Diego would have required to fully satisfy its prior and preferential right to the waters of the San Diego river to annually supply its aforesaid needs and uses, and hence the full amount of the waters of the San Diego river to which, under its prior and preferential right, it would have been entitled at and during the several years prior to the institution of this action. The evidence herein further discloses, according to a report which the Cuyamaca Water Company made and filed with the railroad commission, purporting to show the amount of water which it had sold and delivered to its consumers between the years 1913 and 1921, that the total amount of the waters of the San Diego river extracted therefrom and actually applied by it to such uses amounted during the year 1921 to 1,762,435,542 gallons. There is not to be found in the record herein any definite statement or evidence showing, with any degree of accuracy, the total annual outflow of water from the San Diego river; but that it is from year to year far in excess of the amount which would be represented in the aggregate of the foregoing figures would seem to have been made sufficiently plain during the long controversy between the parties hereto over the use of said waters. Counsel for the defendants and appellants herein have presented to this court, in support of their plea of estoppel, an interesting document in the form of a resolution adopted by the common council of the city of San Diego on August 30, 1918, in response to an anxious inquiry from the city of La Mesa, and which will be more particularly adverted to hereafter, and from which resolution it is made to appear that "during the past twenty years eighty-four per cent of the water of said San Diego river has gone to waste into the Pacific ocean," and, further, "that the undeveloped waters of the San Diego river would, if impounded, prove entirely adequate to meet all present and reasonably probable future demands of the city of San Diego and of the neighboring communities adjacent to the San Diego river watershed." It is important that the foregoing facts relative to the volume and use of the waters of the San Diego river should be borne in mind in dealing with the questions which we are about to consider, touching the respective rights of the parties hereto to the waters of said river, as affected by the defenses of prescription, laches, and estoppel, urged by the defendants and appellants herein. In dealing with these defenses it is also important to bear in mind the nature of each and the differences, if any, between them.

[11] It should at the outset be understood and stated that the pueblo rights, and hence the rights of its successor, the city of San Diego, to whatever of the waters of the San Diego river were from time to time required for the needs of the pueblo and of the city and of the inhabitants of each, were rights which were essentially "governmental" in character, as much so in fact as were the rights of the ancient pueblo and modern city to the public squares or streets, and that the term "proprietary," as employed with reference to certain commercialized uses made by municipalities and other public bodies, of water, light, and power, for example, has no application to the fundamental rights of the plaintiff herein to its ownership of its foregoing classes of property dedicated and devoted to public uses. Ames v. City of San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 394, 35 P. 1005. It should also be noted upon the threshold of the impending discussion that the questions which might arise upon any attempted use of the waters of the San Diego river by the plaintiff herein for the supply thereof to the inhabitants of areas outside of the corporate limits of the original pueblo, whether such areas were or were not within the four league square allotment of lands to said pueblo, are not presented or presentable in the instant case, and hence that whatever authorities may have been cited bearing upon such questions are inapplicable, since, as was aptly stated in our earlier decision (193 Cal. 584, 226 P. 604, 605, 33 A. L. R. 1316) "the subject-matter of the action is the establishment of the priority of right, and not the quantity of water to be taken."

[12] It should also be noted at this stage of the discussion that whatever rights the original defendants herein are entitled to claim and assert in the waters of the San Diego river, or any portion thereof, are rights and claims which rest for their support upon the several appropriations made of such waters by the Cuyamaca Water Company, a co-partnership, or by the members thereof, and by the San Diego Flume Company, their predecessor and original appropriator of such waters, to the extent of the use thereof. We hold to be without merit the contention of these defendants that they derive their rights to such waters from a higher source, viz.: From certain rights acquired by them, or certain of them, under the Congressional Act of July 26, 1866 (14 Stat. 253, c. 262, § 9), and the supplementary act of January 12, 1891 (26 Stat. 714, c. 65, § 8), and that such rights derived from such source are superior to any right whatever in the waters of said river held by the city of San Diego, as the successor of such pueblo. We find from an examination of these Congressional Acts, without going into further detail, that they consisted in certain action taken by the United States government at a time subsequent to the vesting in the city of San Diego of whatever rights it possessed and still possesses in the waters of San Diego river by virtue of its successorship to the rights and interests of such pueblo, and which were confirmed by the action of the aforesaid commission, and that whatever permissive grants of rights of way to private persons over public lands lying along the upper reaches of the San Diego river were made were subordinate and not superior to the already vested rights of the plaintiff herein, derived from its succession to the pueblo. Los Angeles Farming & Milling Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 217 U. S. 217, 30 S. Ct. 452, 54 L. Ed. 736, and cases cited. With these preliminary observations we pass to a discussion of the remaining questions presented for our determination by the original defendants and by their successors in interest, the interveners herein.

The first of these questions relates to the defense of prescription.

[13, 14] The nature of the right claimed to have been acquired in the waters of a flowing stream by prescription rests as a prime essential upon an adverse use thereof by the claimant under a claim of right which has, to the extent thereof and for the required term of years, been acquiesced in by the person or persons otherwise entitled to the ownership and enjoyment of the waters thus adversely abstracted from said stream and to enforce those rights by appropriate action. It is needless to cite authorities to a proposition thus deeply grounded in the law of waters; but there are certain instructive cases which bear directly upon the situation of the parties to this action as disclosed by the record herein. The first of these is that of Anaheim Water Co. et al. v. Semi-Tropic Water Co., 64 Cal. 185, 30 P. 623. This was a case which involved certain alleged conflicting riparian rights to the diversion of the waters of the Santa Ana river, which formed the dividing line between two ranchos, from the owners of one of which the plaintiffs had derived by grant the right to use a certain definite amount of the waters of said river, to which the lands of the grantors were riparian, and of the other of which the defendant was the owner and was entitled to all of the riparian rights incident to such owner unless the same or some portion thereof had been lost by prescription. The trial court found that the plaintiffs for many years had openly, notoriously, and continuously appropriated and used the waters of said river to the full capacity of their ditch, claiming the right so to do adversely to all the world; but the court also found that prior to a year or so before the commencement of the action such diversion and use on the part of the plaintiffs, even though thus claimed to have been done adversely, had never interfered with the use which the defendant during the same time was making of said waters, and that with the exception of the aforesaid brief time before the commencement of the action there had at all other times been sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all of the parties to the action. In dealing with that situation this court (page 192 of 64 Cal., 30 P. 623, 625) said: "In the face of such facts as these, how can we be expected to hold that, as against the owners of the Santiago rancho, the plaintiffs have established any prescriptive right? In order to establish a right by prescription, the acts by which it is sought to establish it must operate as an invasion of the right of the party against whom it is set up. The enjoyment relied upon must be of such a character as to afford ground for an action by the other party. This is thoroughly settled. Now, it is very clear that, while there was sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all the parties, its use by one would not be an invasion of any right of any other; and as the court below found, as a fact, that, until within a year or two prior to the commencement of the action, there was sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all the parties, it is plain that the plaintiffs, as against the owners of the Santiago rancho have acquired no right by prescription." The next case to which we would refer is that of Faulkner v. Rondoni, 104 Cal. 147, 37 P. 883, wherein (without stating the facts of the case) we find that the doctrine above announced was expressly approved; the trial court having found that during the period claimed to have given rise to the prescription there had been sufficient water in the stream for the uses of all of the parties to the action and that therefore there had been no such invasion of the rights of one which could form the basis of a prescriptive right in the other. In the quite recent case of Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 128, 211 P. 11, 13, the doctrine above quoted from Anaheim Water Co. v. Semi-Tropic Water Co., supra, was again approved; the court saying that the use by the adverse claimant "was not hostile unless there was an actual clash between the rights of the respective owners. While there was sufficient water flowing down the stream to supply the wants of all parties, its use by one was not an invasion of the rights of the other."

[15, 16] It is also true, as stated in the concluding paragraph of Pabst v. Finmand, supra, that "the exercise of the mere riparian right can never be hostile to the land below. Where, however, the use is under such circumstances as to be adverse and under a claim of right asserted against lower riparian owners, it may ripen into prescriptive title." For the most recent statement of this principle see Scott v. Fruit Growers' Supply Co., 202 Cal. 47, 258 P. 1095, where the same principle is enunciated. It is contended by the appellants and interveners herein, however, that the foregoing several cases and the principles decided therein have no application to the contentions of the respective parties in the instant case, for the reason that each and all of these cases relate to the respective rights of riparian owners in the several streams to which they refer, and that said rights differ essentially from those which are asserted by the respective parties in the instant case. It is true that as between contesting riparian owners, and even as between riparian owners and upper appropriators, the rights of each to the proportion to which each is entitled in the waters of the particular stream differ materially from the rights which the parties to this action assert or deny. But, conceding this to be true, the misconception of the appellants herein consists in emphasizing these differences and in losing sight of the uniformity of application of the principles upon which prescription rests and which, as we have seen, require, both in the cases cited and in the case at bar, the presence of an adverse use as the essential basis of its assertion. It is for this reason that the principle enunciated in the foregoing cases has direct application to the situation presented in the case at bar. The city of San Diego, by virtue of that prior and preferential right which it derived from the pueblo "to the use of all of the waters of the San Diego river necessary to supply the domestic wants of the inhabitants of said pueblo, to irrigate the lands thereof and for other municipal purposes within the general limits of said pueblo," has never thus far in its history possessed and is not now asserting any right of action to prevent the actual diversion of any quantity of the waters along the upper reaches of the San Diego river or its tributaries, whether undertaken by the defendants and interveners herein or their predecessors, or any other persons whatever, which has not at any particular time interfered with such exercise of its aforesaid rights in the waters of said river as from time to time in the course of its growth and history as a municipality it became possessed of. The right of said city was thus always "uncertain and conjectural," depending upon the particular needs of the city or its inhabitants at each particular stage in its development as a municipality, and it would be the height of unreason to hold that the pueblo in its primitive beginnings and the city in the infancy of its corporate life should have been bound to be continually taking arms against users of the upper waters of the stream to an extent which constituted no interference with its present use or right to use such waters at the time of such diversion. It follows that for this reason also no right by prescription exists or has ever existed in favor of these defendants and interveners or either or any of them arising out of their asserted adverse use of the waters of the San Diego river. The city is not in this action asserting a present right to any such remedy, but, on the contrary, and in the language of our earlier opinion, "the subject of the action is the establishment of the priority of right and not the quantity of water to be taken." It thus appears that the present action is not in any sense remedial but is purely declaratory in its nature and in the relief which, in so far as the plaintiff is concerned, is sought thereby.

[17] Finally, and with direct reference to the defense of prescription, it may be stated as a general rule that no invasion of the rights of property which are held by a public or municipal corporation in perpetual trust for public uses can be held sufficient to furnish the basis of a defense based solely upon prescription. The cases fully supporting this general principle have already been cited, but will be further referred to in considering the subjects of laches and estoppel, to which we shall now address ourselves.

[18, 19] With respect to the defense of laches which the defendants and interveners present and urge little need be said, since what has immediately heretofore been stated fully applies to such defense. The city of San Diego and its officials could not in reason be charged with laches in the assertion of something with respect to which no right of assertion existed and with respect to which no adverse invasion has thus far occurred. There would seem to be another and all-sufficient reason why the defense of prescription and of laches ought not to be available to the defendants as against the plaintiff in the present action. The right which the pueblo of San Diego and the plaintiff herein as its successor acquired in the waters of San Diego river by virtue of the pueblo foundation was essentially a public right and, to employ the language of the findings of the trial court, "was a right and the distribution of such waters by the pueblo authorities was a trust created, imposed and recognized by the laws, orders and decrees of the Kingdom of Spain and the Republic of Mexico." In the case of Cuyamaca Water Co. v. Superior Court, supra, this court adopted the language upon this subject in Lux v. Haggin, supra, wherein it was stated that: "The occupants of lands within the city, the pueblo's successor, are beneficiaries only to the extent that they are entitled to the use of such water, and at such times, as accords with the laws regulating the public and municipal trust." In the case of Vernon Irrigation Co. v. Los Angeles (106 Cal. 237, 39 P. 762, 765), supra, it was stated, with special reference to the rights to the waters of the Los Angeles river which the city had derived from the pueblo of Los Angeles, that "the waters of all rivers were, under the Spanish and Mexican rule, public property * * * for the use of the inhabitants."

If this be true, it follows necessarily that the public right and public trust which the pueblo and its successor, the city of San Diego, had in these waters in no respect differed from those other public rights and properties which the state and its various subdivisions and agencies possess and administer; and it has been uniformly held that such public rights cannot be lost nor the public trust as to their administration and exercise be destroyed either by adverse possession or by laches or other negligence on the part of the agents of the state or municipality who may from time to time be invested with the duty of their protection and administration. People v. Kerber, 152 Cal. 731-733, 93 P. 878, 125 Am. St. Rep. 93, and cases cited. The case of Ames v. City of San Diego, 101 Cal. 390-392, 35 P. 1005, will, when carefully examined, be found to fully uphold this view. We are therefore of the opinion that for the above additional reason the defenses of prescription and laches urged by the defendants and interveners herein cannot be upheld.

[20-22] The defense of estoppel, however, rests upon an entirely different foundation in both law and fact from that underlying the foregoing two defenses. The defense of estoppel rests upon the doctrine that a right conceded for the purpose of such defense to exist in a party, he shall not be permitted to assert against another to the latter's injury because of the existence and proof of certain facts and conditions which would render its assertion inequitable. The question as to the application of this well-defined legal proposition as between the parties to an action in the nature of things depends upon the facts of each particular case. Whether the facts of this particular case are such as to permit the application of this doctrine to the plaintiff in its capacity as a municipal corporation and with respect to the latter's "prior and preferential right to the waters of the San Diego river," as above defined, is the problem to which we must finally devote our attention. The essential facts as developed in the evidence adduced herein, bearing upon this problem, are not, with certain exceptions to be noted, the subject of material dispute. The original defendants in this action were Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, and certain parties alleged to be surviving members or the legal representatives of certain deceased members thereof; also Cuyamaca Water Company, a corporation, which does not seem to have much to do with the case. The evidence in the case, stated as concisely as possible, discloses that in the year 1885 the San Diego Flume Company was organized for the purpose of developing the water supply along the upper reaches of the San Diego river and its tributaries which had theretofore been undeveloped and largely unused, with a view to conserving and utilizing the same upon the region lying between the city of San Diego and the mountains, wherein that stream and its tributaries had their source, and the lands of which region prior to said time being semi-arid, had been but thinly populated and little used. In the course of this development and during the next few years the San Diego Flume Company expended large sums of money, estimated by the trial court to have been in excess of $1,000,000 in the creation of dams, diversion works, pumping plants, ditches, and flumes for the diversion and distribution of said waters to an extent hereinafter to be stated. The Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, ere long succeeded to the rights and property of the San Diego Flume Company, and during the intervening years between 1889 and the date of the institution of this action has augmented the expenditures, continued and extended the activities, and administered the resources thus derived from its predecessor with the resultant effect that within the wide region reached and benefited by the aforesaid development and distribution of the waters of said river, to the extent hereafter to be noted, an extensive productivity has been attained; orchards, vineyards, farms and homes have been created, and cities and towns have been established, such as the city of La Mesa, the city of Lemon Grove, the city of El Cajon, and other growing communities containing as a whole several thousand inhabitants and constituting prosperous centers of civic and community life, and all of which have during all the years of their creation and growth received their water supply from the waters of said river as thus developed and distributed by or through the Cuyamaca Water Company. Of recent years certain irrigation districts have been formed and are being operated within said region and one of these, to wit, the La Mesa, Lemon Grove, and Spring Valley irrigation district, has recently secured an option upon, if not actually acquired, all of the rights and properties of the Cuyamaca Water Company, and has thus become the principal party in interest in the eventuality of the present action in so far as the defendants and interveners are concerned. The legal foundation of the San Diego Flume Company and also of its successor, the Cuyamaca Water Company, rested originally in certain formal appropriations located in due course of the laws permitting the same along the course of said river and its tributaries and to an amount in the volume of water claimed to be as hereinafter stated. In pursuance of these appropriations certain quantities of said waters have been diverted and distributed to an extent also hereinafter to be designated. It would seem also that certain of the defendants put forth certain claims of right herein, depending upon their alleged ownership of certain lands riparian to said stream. During all of the earlier years of the activities of the San Diego Flume Company and of the Cuyamaca Water Company in the appropriation to the extent thereof of the waters of said river and also of the diversion and distribution thereof to the volume and extent thereof, and during all of the earlier years of the settlement, development, and growth of the region and of the several corporate communities therein as a direct result of the application of said waters to said otherwise semiarid region, the city of San Diego regarded quiescently, and in fact it may be said approvingly, the foregoing development of its "back country" through the aforesaid appropriation, diversion, and use of the waters of the San Diego river. It had every reason so to do and it had no reason to do otherwise, since its own advancement, progress, and prosperity in both business and population were being greatly enhanced thereby, and since also its own actual uses of the waters of said river were being in no wise diminished or impaired. It is true, as averred by the defendants and interveners herein and as found by the trial court, that the city of San Diego on various occasions in its municipal history and through its successive legislative bodies has granted certain rights and privileges to private persons and corporations to develop water by wells and works of various kinds within the limits of the former pueblo lands, and has even contracted to purchase such works when constructed and such water when developed for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of said city; but it is also true as found by the trial court that none of these arrangements was made with any predecessor of the defendants or interveners herein so as to entitle the latter to claim that acts and efforts on the part of the city to have developed its own water supply within its limits and for the use of its inhabitants amounted to such an admission of the validity of the appropriation and uses which the defendants and interveners were undertaking upon the upper reaches of the San Diego river as would operate to constitute an estoppel. The essential elements of an estoppel, even as between private persons, were thus far and up to at least the year 1914 entirely lacking. The defendants and their predecessors, the San Diego Flume Company, in entering upon and prosecuting their plans for the appropriation and diversion of the waters along the upper reaches of the San Diego river and its tributaries, cannot lay claim to having been misled as to their rights as a matter of law to thus appropriate and use the waters of said river, since they must be held to have known both as a matter of fact and as a matter of law of the existence in the city of San Diego of the aforesaid prior and preferential right of the city to such waters and to the assertion thereof whenever the expanding needs of the city or its inhabitants required such assertion.

With respect to the knowledge which the predecessor of the defendants and appellants herein—and by which knowledge they are bound—had upon this subject as a matter of fact, the evidence in this case sufficiently shows that the San Diego Flume Company from the date of its organization and first appropriations of the waters of the San Diego river, was fully informed as to the prior and paramount right of the city of San Diego to the use of the waters of the San Diego river, and that upon the advice of its attorneys it caused to be inserted in its contracts with consumers express provisions protecting it, as to its said consumers, against the assertion of such right by said city; and at as early a date as the year 1900, when certain litigation was instituted against the San Diego Flume Company by or on behalf of its consumers to enjoin said company from preferring the city of San Diego pursuant to its said right in the matter of the water supply from said river then being furnished to said city, the San Diego Flume Company expressly pleaded in its answer the existence of the paramount right of said city and the terms of its said consumer's contracts inserted in recognition thereof. The evidence further discloses that, at various times during the decade or more of controversy preceding the institution of the present action, the Cuyamaca Water Company, a co-partnership, through its most active and aggressive member, Mr. Fletcher, was fully advised from time to time as to the existence of the aforesaid prior and paramount claim of right on the part of said city. The findings of the trial court based upon the foregoing state of the record herein are full and ample and are as follows:

"It is not true that the plaintiff has been guilty of any carelessness or any culpable negligence resulting in the defendants, or any of them, being misled as to the state of the plaintiff's title as set forth in its amended complaint. Neither is it true that the defendants were at all times ignorant, or were at any time ignorant of the claim of the plaintiff to the prior and paramount right to the use of the water of the San Diego river. Neither is it true that the defendants had no convenient or ready means of acquiring knowledge respecting the prior and paramount right of the plaintiff in and to the waters of the San Diego river, but, on the contrary, it is true that the defendants and their predecessors in interest at all times had convenient and ready means of acquiring knowledge respecting such right, and at all times knew of plaintiff's claim to such right. It is not true that such acts, omissions and declarations of the plaintiff as are herein found to have been performed, were said or done through fraud, and it is not true that any act or omission or declaration of the plaintiff constituted a fraud upon the defendants or any of them, and it is not true that any act or omission or declaration herein found to have been done or declared by the plaintiff has injured the defendants or any of them, or justified the defendants or any of them in believing that the plaintiff did not own or claim to own an estate in the waters of the San Diego river as alleged in said amended complaint; neither is it true that the defendants nor any of them relying or acting upon any belief fraudulently induced by the plaintiff have expended any money in the development of the waters of the San Diego river. Neither is it true that the defendants nor any of them, or their predecessors in interest, relying or acting upon the belief that the City of San Diego did not own the prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of the San Diego river, expended large or any sums of money in developing said waters and acquiring an estate therein."

That said defendants and appellants, as a matter of law, must be held to have had knowledge of the existence in the city of San Diego of its prior and preferential rights in and to varying amounts of water of the San Diego river, according to its expanding needs, may be said to rest not only upon the general proposition that all persons are held to a knowledge of the law, but may be said to also rest upon the fact that this court from a date as early as the decision of the case of Hart v. Burnett, supra, and at intervals during the intervening years between that early time and the institution of the present action was engaged in uniformly upholding the prior and preferential right of cities founded upon a previous pueblo existence to the waters of such streams as flowed through them. The record herein discloses that the San Diego Flume Company was fully advised by astute and able counsel of the existence of such prior rights in the city of San Diego, as a matter of law. In the light of the foregoing findings of the trial court, with respect to the knowledge of the aforesaid rights of the city of San Diego, which these appellants are held to have possessed as a matter of fact, and by which knowledge they must also be held to be bound as a matter of law, and in the light of the further fact of the total absence from this record of any showing on their part that whatever acts of diversion and use of the waters of the San Diego river they or their predecessors therein have thus far engaged in have in any degree constituted an invasion of the vested rights of said city in and to the waters of said river, the following cases are instructive. The first of these is the case of Anaheim Water Co. v. Semi-Tropic Water Co., supra, to which reference has been made with relation to rights to be gained by prescription, and wherein also the subject of estoppel is considered; the court saying: "With respect to the estoppel relied on by the plaintiffs it is sufficient to say that, as the findings of the court below show that there was sufficient water flowing in the river in 1857 and for nearly 20 years thereafter to supply the wants and demands of the owners of each of the ranchos bordering on the stream, the owners of the Santiago rancho were neither called upon to object to the diversion and appropriation by the predecessors of the plaintiffs, nor had they any right to object thereto. No right of theirs was interfered with. Nor does it appear that there was any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of any kind practiced upon the predecessors of the plaintiffs by the owners of the Rancho Santiago." In certain cases, hereinafter to be noted, and also in the case just cited, we have had occasion to quote with approval what was held in the case of Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 368: "There must be some degree of turpitude in the conduct of a party before a Court of Equity will estop him from the assertion of his title—the effect of the estoppel being to forfeit his property and transfer its enjoyment to another." It is to be noted in this immediate connection that the claim of estoppel which the upper appropriator of the waters of a stream undertakes to assert against a lower claimant thereto, based upon the latter's acquiescence, must be founded, not upon the amplitude of the former's claim as set forth in his recorded appropriation of such waters, nor by the carrying capacity of his ditches or flumes, but upon the actual diversion and use of said waters and only to the extent thereof. Pabst v. Finmand, 190 Cal. 124, 133, 211 P. 11; Haight v. Constanich, 184 Cal. 426, 194 P. 26; Northern Calif. P. Co. v. Flood, 186 Cal. 301, 199 P. 315. We understand the foregoing authorities to state the settled law as declared in this state touching this subject, notwithstanding the array of authorities presented by the appellants and interveners herein from other jurisdictions apparently laying down a different rule.

[23] Even, however, if it were to be conceded that a right based upon estoppel could arise by virtue of mere acquiescence in its assertion as between private persons, we are satisfied that no such claim of right could come into being as against a municipal corporation, founded upon its mere acquiescence or that of its officials in the diversion by any number of upper appropriators or even of upper riparian owners of the waters of a stream to the use of the waters of which such public or municipal corporation was entitled as a portion of its public rights and properties held in perpetual trust for public use. The general rule upon this subject is stated in volume 10 California Jurisprudence, page 650, and cases cited, as well as certain limited exceptions to the rule. The defendants and interveners, appellants herein, have referred us to no case wherein the mere passive acquiescence of a public corporation or its officials in the invasion of its rights of property, however long continued, has been held to operate as an estoppel against its assertion of those rights. They have, however, called our attention to certain cases which are claimed to constitute exceptions to the operation of the general rule, and to which we shall presently refer. It is sufficient at this point in the discussion to state that in so far as, prior to the year 1914, the plaintiff herein may have passively acquiesced in the acts of the defendants and interveners in the diversion and use of the upper waters of the San Diego river, no estoppel in pais can be predicated thereon to any extent whatever in favor of the defendants and interveners herein for the several reasons above set forth. The cases above referred to are City of Los Angeles v. Cohn, 101 Cal. 373, 35 P. 1002, wherein the principle of estoppel in pais was given application to an action brought by the city of Los Angeles to recover possession of a small tract of land lying at the intersection of Spring and Main streets in said city, and which was claimed by it to be a part of a public street. That, however, as the court stated in its decision, was an exceptional case from the fact not only that the defendants had been in possession of the property in question adversely and exclusively for almost forty years, during which time they had erected substantial buildings thereon, but that the city, through its officers, had affirmatively and at the time of the erection of such buildings misled the defendants into the belief that the city laid no claim to the premises in question, and that, acting upon such belief and assurance, the defendants had erected their structures upon the property and occupied the same undisturbed for many years. This case bears no similitude to the case at bar. Counsel also direct our attention to the case of Ames v. City of San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 P. 1005; but a reading of that case discloses that a clear distinction was drawn therein between the two classes of pueblo lands which the city of San Diego holds in succession from the former pueblo, namely, those held in trust for a specific public use, such as a park, which cannot be alienated and the title to which cannot be lost by adverse possession; and those lands, such as house lots, which the city, as successor to the pueblo, held and which might be alienated by it, and which it was held for that reason might be lost by adverse possession. There is no comfort for the defendants herein in the decision of this court in that case. Counsel for the defendants and interveners further insist that under the Spanish and Mexican laws pueblo lands might be lost by prescription. It is needless to follow this argument or the authorities cited therein further than to state that the United States in taking over the territory known as Alta California under the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, agreeing therein to recognize the existence and protect the ownership of certain land titles within said territory, did not also take over and agree to adopt the statutes of limitation of either Spain or Mexico as applicable to lands or waters devoted to a public use.

[24] It may be well, in addition to what has been heretofore stated, to deal, with somewhat more of particularity, with the events transpiring between the years 1914 and the date of the institution of the present action, inclusive, in so far as these affected the relations and respective rights and claims of the original parties to this action in and to the use of the waters of San Diego river. The record herein discloses that in the early part of the year 1914 the city attorney of the city of San Diego, acting in obedience to a resolution theretofore adopted by the common council thereof requesting him to make an investigation of the rights of the city in and to the waters of the San Diego river and submit an opinion thereon, presented to that body a formal report upon that subject, going with much of detail into the history of the pueblo foundation, and citing and quoting at length from the decisions of the state and federal courts touching the nature and extent of the water rights of pueblos in and to the waters of streams passing through them, and making particular application of these decisions to the nature and extent of the water rights of the pueblo and city of San Diego in and to the waters of the San Diego river. This opinion was published in pamphlet form at or shortly after the date of its presentation, and was admittedly brought to the attention of both the defendants and interveners herein about that time. It would seem to follow of necessity that if the asserted rights of the defendants and interveners to whatever extent, if any, we may find them to have been assertable, had not up to that time ripened into rights resting in the doctrine of estoppel, no later assertion of these rights and no later acts in the way of a further appropriation or diversion of said waters could be made the basis for a claim of right which did not then exist, unless they could be held to find their support in some very definite withdrawal of the claim of the city to that prior and preferential right to the use of such waters which was thus definitely set forth by the foregoing report the city attorney made in the month of January, 1914, and then or shortly thereafter brought to the notice and knowledge of the defendants and interveners herein. In the year 1917, however, the city of San Diego took a very definite step in the direction of making available to itself certain of the waters of the San Diego river not as yet conserved or appropriated to any beneficial use. In that year a bill was introduced in the United States Congress at the instance of the city of San Diego purporting by its title "to grant rights-of-way over government lands for reservoir purposes for the conservation and storage of water to be used by the City of San Diego, California, and adjacent communities." The text of the measure thus presented in Congress had reference to a proposed reservoir to be constructed along the upper reaches of the San Diego river and upon lands which formed a portion of an Indian reservation, the title to which was in the United States. While this measure was pending before certain committees of Congress during that and the following year, the passage thereof was strenuously opposed by certain representatives of the defendants and interveners herein; their contention being that the grant of such reservoir rights, with the resultant construction of the proposed reservoir, would constitute a serious interference with the already vested rights of the defendants and interveners to the beneficial use of the waters of the San Diego river. In furtherance of the urge of these opponents and in an effort to so far limit the scope and purpose of said grant and the exercise of whatever reservoir rights and uses were to be asserted thereunder, it was sought to have the city of San Diego, through its officials then in charge of its municipal affairs, adopt certain resolutions disclaiming any intent on the part of said city to interfere with the uses then being made of the waters of the San Diego river by the defendants and interveners herein, and in pursuance thereof certain resolutions were adopted by the then governing body of said city touching this subject. A considerable portion of the record consists of details of this proceeding in Congress and there is considerable discussion in the brief of counsel with respect to the attitude thus taken by the city of San Diego with relation thereto. It would seem, however, that the trial court fully set forth and adequately and correctly considered and treated this entire episode in its findings of fact herein, and that with particular reference to the resolutions adopted by the governing body of the city of San Diego having reference to the aforesaid controversy correctly stated therein that: "It is not true that by said resolutions, or by any resolution, or act of said common council the plaintiff herein, acting by or through its legislative body, has expressly or impliedly admitted the ownership by the defendants, or any of them, of the right to use and develop the waters or any of the waters of the San Diego river prior, superior or paramount to the rights of the plaintiff." With respect to the action of the Congress of the United States as to the form and scope of said proposed legislation, in view of the developed opposition of the defendants and interveners herein to the passage thereof, the trial court found that: "It is not true that the Public Lands Committee of Congress or any other Congressional body, or any member of Congress, upon receiving or noting the protest of defendants, or any of them, or of any city or community served by Cuyamaca Water Company, or for any other reason, refused to adopt said proposed bill or house resolution unless or excepting this plaintiff admitted either expressly or impliedly an ownership and estate of these defendants, or any of them, in or to the waters or the use of the waters of the San Diego river. On the contrary, it is true that the Congress of the United States and the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, and the House of Representatives, and each of them, and the members thereof, explicitly and unequivocally set forth in said bill, and insisted in setting forth in said bill a provision declaring that nothing therein contained should be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the State of California relating to the control, appropriation, use or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses or any vested rights acquired therein, and that the Secretary of the Interior and The City of San Diego in carrying out the provisions of said Act should proceed in conformity with the laws of said State of California." The foregoing findings of the trial court, based as they are on much probative evidence which fully supports them, would seem to set at rest the question as to whether the plaintiff had lost, by its affirmative action or by way of estoppel, whatever rights we have found it to be possessed of prior to the year 1914, to the assertion of its paramount use whenever required of the waters of the San Diego river. There is, however, the further finding of the trial court already adverted to, which would seem to be conclusive as to the existence of any right whatever resting in estoppel on the part of the defendants and interveners herein to a superior right to that of the plaintiff in the use of the waters of the San Diego river, and which we deem it apt to requote, as follows: "It is not true that the plaintiff has been guilty of any carelessness or any culpable negligence resulting in the defendants, or any of them, being misled as to the state of the plaintiff's title as set forth in its amended complaint. Neither is it true that the defendants were at all times ignorant, or were at any time ignorant of the claim of the plaintiff to the prior and paramount right to the use of the water of the San Diego river. Neither is it true that the defendants had no convenient or ready means of acquiring knowledge respecting the prior and paramount right of the plaintiff in and to the waters of the San Diego river, but, on the contrary, it is true that the defendants and their predecessors in interest at all times had convenient and ready means of acquiring knowledge respecting such right, and at all times knew of plaintiff's claim to such right. It is not true that such acts, omissions and declarations of the plaintiff as are herein found to have been performed were said or done through fraud, and it is not true that any act or omission or declaration of the plaintiff constituted a fraud upon the defendants, or any of them, and it is not true that any act or omission or declaration herein found to have been done or declared by the plaintiff has injured the defendants, or any of them, or justified the defendants, or any of them, in believing that the plaintiff did not own or claim to own an estate in the waters of the San Diego river as alleged in said amended complaint; neither is it true that the defendants nor any of them relying or acting upon any belief fraudulently induced by the plaintiff have expended any money in the development of the waters of the San Diego river. Neither is it true that the defendants nor any of them, or their predecessors in interest, relying or acting upon the belief that the City of San Diego did not own the prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of the San Diego river, expended large or any sums of money in developing said waters and acquiring an estate therein."

When we come to consider the essential and elementary basis of the doctrine and plea of estoppel in the light of the foregoing facts and findings of the trial court, the conclusion would seem to be inevitable that the elements of estoppel are entirely lacking in this case. These elements of estoppel are all embraced in the definition thereof found in subdivision 3 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it." This court has frequently been called upon to interpret and apply the foregoing provision of the Code. It is necessary to cite but two of the most recent cases in which it has done so. One of these is Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 461, 472, 168 P. 1037, 1041, wherein this court said: "It is of the essence of an estoppel in pais that the party asserting such estoppel should not only have been ignorant of the true state of facts, but that he should have relied upon the representation or admission of the adverse party." The other case is that of Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 378, 186 P. 599, 601, wherein it was said with reference to the facts of that case: "There was an absence of the essential elements of estoppel, namely, false statements or concealments, or conduct amounting to false statements or concealments, with reference to the boundary made by one having knowledge, actual or virtual, of the facts, to one ignorant of the truth with the intention, resulting in consummation, that he should act upon such false statements or concealments or equivalent conduct."

[25] In the presence of the foregoing findings of fact as made by the trial court, and in the light of the indispensable elements as thus stated by this court essential to be proven in order to the formation of a basis for the defense of estoppel, it is as difficult to understand as it is impossible to uphold the further findings and conclusions of the trial court to the effect that the defendants and interveners are entitled to the benefit of their plea of estoppel to the extent of their diversion and use of the waters of the San Diego river in the amount of twenty-seven cubic feet per second, or in any other amount, and that as against such right resting solely in such use the city of San Diego is estopped to assert its prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of the San Diego river. That this conclusion may be fraught with certain disturbing consequences, affecting chiefly the interveners herein, and which have been insistently and even passionately urged by their counsel in the presentation of this prolonged controversy, can be held to furnish no reason for a deprivation of the plaintiff herein of its ancient, prior, and paramount right to the use of the waters of the San Diego river as defined by this court upon the former hearing. If it be true as the trial court expressly found it to be, that the San Diego Flume Company and its successor, the Cuyamaca Water Company, entered upon and prosecuted their plan for the diversion of the waters of the San Diego river with full knowledge as a matter of law, and also with full means of knowledge as a matter of fact, as to the existence of the prior and paramount right of the plaintiff as the successor of the pueblo to the use of the waters of the San Diego river as such right is set forth and defined in our former opinion, and if it be further true, as it must be conceded to be, that the interveners are entitled to assert and insist upon no further rights or equities in respect to the use of said waters than those which were possessed by their predecessor in interest, the Cuyamaca Water Company, we are unable to perceive upon what principle of equitable application the public trust in which the city of San Diego holds its prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of said river to the full extent which the needs of the expanding city from time to time require is to be subverted for the simple and only reason that other persons or other communities along the upper reaches of the river, with full knowledge of the aforesaid prior and paramount rights of the plaintiff, may have undertaken, at a considerable expenditure of money, to make a beneficial and profitable use of such waters.

[26] The only remaining question for our determination upon these appeals relates to that portion of the judgment of the trial court wherein it purported to enjoin the defendants and interveners from the doing of certain constructive work in connection with their conservation and diversion of the waters of the San Diego river except in subordination to the prior and paramount rights of the plaintiff therein, and also purporting to restrain the defendants and interveners from the assertion of any claims of right or title in or to the waters of the San Diego river except in subordination to the paramount rights of the plaintiff therein, and save and except in the amounts and to the extent in said judgment specified. In respect to the aforesaid portions of the judgment it is clear that the trial court has gone beyond the scope and issues of the instant action. This, as we have seen and as this court has already decided upon the former proceeding, is an action purely declaratory in character and is one wherein the plaintiff has neither pleaded nor attempted to prove any facts which would entitle it to any other or affirmative relief beyond that of having its prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of the San Diego river established. This being so, the trial court was in error in attempting to give to its determination of this matter any other or further effect than that of a declaratory judgment.

It follows from the foregoing conclusions that the judgment herein must be and is hereby modified so as to read as follows:

It is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiff, the city of San Diego, was at the time of the commencement of this action and now is the owner in fee simple of the prior and paramount right to the use of all the water (surface and underground) of the San Diego river, including its tributaries, from its source to its mouth, for the use of said the city of San Diego and of its inhabitants, for all purposes, and that said defendants, and each of said defendants, said cross-complainants, and each of said cross-complainants, and said interveners, and each of said interveners, have not, and no one or more of them have, any estate, right, title, or interest in or to said waters, or any part thereof, or in or to the use of the same, or any right to take or use said waters, or any part thereof, save in subordination and subject to said prior and paramount right of the plaintiff, the city of San Diego, and that the plaintiff is entitled to no other or further relief herein than that afforded by the remedy of the declaratory judgment above set forth, and that the judgment herein, as thus modified, is affirmed, and that each party hereto shall pay its own costs upon these appeals.

CITY OF SAN DIEGO v. CUYAMACA WATER CO. et al. (LA MESA, LEMON GROVE & SPRING VALLEY IRR. DIST. et al., Interveners).★

L. A. 9216.

Supreme Court of California.

March 21, 1930.

Rehearing Denied April 17, 1930.

1. Eminent domain §47(1) — Use of land for supplying water to other municipalities did not prevent condemnation by city without showing inconsistent use (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1240, 1241, as amended).

City was not prevented by virtue of provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1240, 1241, as amended, from condemning land lying along course of San Diego river on ground that waters flowing through such lands were appropriated to use of certain cities, towns, and water districts, in absence of showing that lands, if condemned, would be put to uses inconsistent with and injuriously affecting use and right to use waters as to their ownership, distribution, and use.

2. Waters and water courses §140 — City of San Diego has prior and paramount right to use of necessary waters of San Diego river.

City of San Diego, as successor of the pueblo of San Diego, has prior and paramount right to use of waters of San Diego river to extent that needs of city and its inhabitants require such use.

3. Eminent domain §28 — City could not be prevented from exercising right of eminent domain over lands forming portion of water course to render available superior right to waters (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1240, 1241, as amended).

Those possessing and exercising only a subordinate right to use of waters of San Diego river had no right under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1240, 1241, as amended, to prevent city of San Diego, in the exercise of its superior right to use of waters, from also exercising right of eminent domain over lands forming portion of water course through which waters flow, in order to render available to city its superior right to use of said waters, according to its needs.

4. Appeal and error §1010(2)—Insufficiency of evidence, to justify appellate court's refusal to accept fact finding, must amount to complete absence of substantial supporting evidence.

Insufficiency of evidence, to justify Court of Appeal in refusing to accept and follow a finding of fact, must amount to complete absence of any substantial evidence in support of finding.

5. New trial ⇨72—Trial judge must use his own judgment as to whether evidence supports verdict.

Trial judge should not grant a new trial, unless clearly satisfied that the verdict is wrong, but must act on his own judgment as to whether it is supported by evidence.

6. Eminent domain ⇨224—Counsel's expressions of dissatisfaction with, and emphasis of defendants' opposition to, condemnation of land, held to justify new trial of issues as to value thereof.

Numerous expressions of dissatisfaction with court's decision that right to condemn land had been established by defendants' counsel in jury's presence and their endeavor to emphasize and impress on jurors' minds fact that land was being taken against defendants' will held to justify order granting plaintiff new trial of issues as to value of land on ground that verdict was influenced by such contentions and excessive.

RICHARDS, J.

This action was commenced on May 20, 1924, in the county of San Diego, by the plaintiff, a municipal corporation, against Cuyamaca Water Company, a corporation, and Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, and also against Ed Fletcher, as the sole surviving member of said copartnership, and one C. F. Stern, the defendants named in the original complaint therein, the purpose of said action being that of the condemnation of a certain tract of land containing approximately 200 acres lying along the course of the San Diego river, about twenty miles above said city, and just below what is known as the "Capitan Grande Indian Reservation," consisting of approximately 17,000 acres of land, of which about 1,100 acres had theretofore been conveyed to the city of San Diego by an act of Congress for the development of a municipal reservoir for the impounding of the waters of the San Diego river for the municipal uses of said city. The tract of land involved in the present action adjoins the larger tract thus acquired, and is also adjacent to certain other lands secured by said city from private owners; and the particular uses to which said land, in conjunction with the other adjacent lands, are to be applied are those of a dam site upon which it is proposed to erect a structure to be known as "El Capitan dam." The river flows through this dam site partly upon or under the lands thus sought to be condemned, and partly upon or under the lands which are thus already under the control of the city. The defendants appeared in the action by separate demurrers, which, being overruled, they answered, setting up numerous defenses to the action hereinafter to be considered in detail, and also embracing much the same matters in the form of cross-complaints. Subsequent thereto, the plaintiff proffered certain important amendments to their original complaint, and the defendants also presented certain amendments to their answers and cross-complaints. In the meantime and on January 25, 1925, La Mesa Lemon Grove and Spring Valley Irrigation District, a corporation, caused itself to be made a party to the action, alleging that it had acquired an interest in the properties involved in the litigation by virtue of the fact that shortly before the institution of the action it had obtained from the Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, an option to purchase all of the property of said copartnership, including the particular tract of land in controversy, and that subsequent to the date of the institution of this action it had complied with the terms of said option, which had thereby become a contract of purchase and sale of said properties between itself and said copartnership, and was therefore entitled to urge on its own behalf numerous defenses to said action to be hereafter considered. When these various pleadings, original and amended, were finally filed and the issues thus made up, the action was transferred to the county of Orange for trial, and was there brought to trial upon June 15, 1925. The trial court properly considered the issues in the action as of a twofold nature, the first involving questions relative to the right and necessity for the condemnation sought by the municipality, and second as to the damages to which the defendant would be entitled in the event of such condemnation. The first of these issues was to be determined by the court, the second by a jury, which was accordingly impaneled and sworn. In the meantime the trial court proceeded with the trial of the issues to be determined without a jury, and, having determined these issues in the plaintiff's favor, the trial of the cause upon the issues of damages was proceeded with before the jury, which after a long trial lasting until August 9, 1925, returned a verdict in favor of the defendants, fixing the damages which the defendants would sustain as a result of the condemnation of said lands at the sum of $600,000. The findings of fact and conclusions of law of the court were thereupon signed and filed. Thereafter the plaintiff presented a motion for a new trial upon all the statutory grounds, but particularly stressed therein and upon the hearing thereon that the award of damages by the jury was excessive. The trial court granted the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, chiefly upon the foregoing ground; wherefrom the defendants took and perfected an appeal from the order of the trial court granting a new trial; and also took and perfected an appeal from that portion of the judgment of the trial court determining that the plaintiff was entitled to condemn the lands in question or any portion thereof. These appeals are presented to this court upon a bill of exceptions prepared and settled subsequent to the taking thereof. The cause upon these appeals was transferred to the jurisdiction of the District Court of Appeal, and upon the transfer thereof a motion was therein made to dismiss that portion thereof which had relation to the part of the judgment appealed from, and which motion was denied by said court. City of San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co. et al., 80 Cal. App. 599, 251 P. 341. Thereafter the cause upon its merits was, after decision in said court, transferred to this court for hearing and determination. We may dispose of the foregoing phase of the case by stating that, whether or not we are in accord with all that is stated by said court in its opinion therein, we agree with its order denying said motion to dismiss said appeals, preferring to decide the matters involved in these appeals upon the merits thereof.

In the determination of these appeals upon their merits we shall first consider and dispose of the appellants' contentions made upon their appeal from the portions of the judgments complained of. In their several answers and affirmative pleadings herein the defendants have consistently asserted that the plaintiff, as a municipal corporation, is not as a matter of law entitled to maintain this or any action for the condemnation of the particular lands and properties sought to be taken and applied to the municipal uses through the medium of a condemnation proceeding, for the reason that there are certain statutory provisions in the codes of this state which have application to the instant situation, and which prohibit the plaintiff from the institution and maintenance of this form of action. In support of this contention the defendants have pleaded and undertaken to establish the fact that the lands affected by this proceeding, including the waters of the San Diego river which flow through said lands, form and have long formed an integral portion of the properties of the Cuyamaca Water Company, and as such have for a long time prior to the inception of this action been and still are actually appropriated to the use of certain cities, towns, and water districts other than the plaintiff herein, and particularly to the use of the La Mesa Lemon Grove and Spring Valley Irrigation District, which, as we have seen, has made itself one of the defendants herein. The statutory provisions upon which these defendants and appellants thus rely are those found in certain amendments to the Code of Civil Procedure adopted in the year 1915, the special provisions of which thus relied upon herein reading as follows: "But property appropriated to the use of any county, city and county, incorporated city or town or municipal water district, may not be taken by any other county, city and county, incorporated city or town, or municipal water district, while such property is so appropriated and used for the public purposes for which it has been so appropriated." Code Civ. Proc. § 1240. Whether or not the defendant herein, Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, or the members thereof, or either or any of them, have ever been or now are entitled to claim and be accorded the benefit and application of the foregoing statutory provision in respect to the appropriation and uses which during past years have been by them or either or any of them made of the waters of the San Diego river, or of lands along its course, depends upon an involved condition of mingled law and fact, fully exploited during the long trial of the cause before the court and the jury. We do not deem it necessary upon the record as presented in these appeals to determine the primary legal problem thus presented and thus insistently urged by the appellants herein, which is as to the right, under the foregoing amendment to the statutory law of eminent domain, possessed by a purely private owner of water, whether static or flowing in a stream, and of the land upon which it stands, as in a reservoir or over or through which it flows, as in a stream, to resist condemnation proceedings undertaken by a municipality or other public body having for their purpose the acquisition and application of such lands or waters for public use, based solely upon the ground that the aforesaid lands or waters or both have by such private owner been devoted to another public use. We are of the opinion that upon both the facts of this case as developed by the evidence and found by the trial court the foregoing problem is not herein presented for our solution. The facts of this case, as thus shown by the evidence, may be briefly stated as follows: In about the year 1914 the city of San Diego entered definitely upon the project of creating a vast reservoir and sufficient dam for the impounding of the waters of the San Diego river, both normal and torrential, at and above a gorge along the course of said river and being about twenty miles above said city, through the comparatively narrow confines of which the water of the river makes its exit after passing over the lands of El Capitan Grande Indian Reservation. It accordingly in that year made application to Congress for an appropriate grant of about 1,100 acres of the lands of said reservation for use as a municipal reservoir. After prolonged hearings upon such application, which was staunchly, not to say passionately, resisted, by and on behalf of the Cuyamaca Water Company through its most active and aggressive member, Mr. Fletcher, and also by and on behalf of the interveners herein, the United States government finally determined to make said grant, and through its act of Congress authorized the city of San Diego to acquire such lands by a condemnation proceeding against the Indians of such reservation, which proceeding, being instituted in accordance with the terms of said act, resulted in the acquisition by said city of the aforesaid acreage of land within said reservation for the purposes of creating thereon such reservoir. In the meantime the city acquired by purchase from private owners certain other and adjacent lands of such extent and location that shortly before the date of the institution of the present action it had become the owner of all the lands both above and within said gorge necessary to render feasible its proposed creation of said reservoir and dam, excepting only that body of land lying within and about said gorge which was owned by the Cuyamaca Water Company or by Mr. Fletcher, the active and only surviving member of said firm. This body of land, composing several hundred acres, had been acquired by Mr. Fletcher or his company in the year 1914, about the time when the activities of the city of San Diego for the eventual creation of El Capitan reservoir and dam site had their inception. The land in question does not occupy the entire width of the gorge, nor does it completely contain the stream bed of the San Diego river. The consequence of this situation was that neither the city of San Diego nor the Cuyamaca Water Company could construct a dam across said gorge adequate to impound the downflow of said river at that point without the concurrence of the other, or without the exercise of the right of eminent domain on the part of said city over the said lands and properties of the defendant company, or of Mr. Fletcher, if it should appear that he was the individual owner of said tract of land. In the meantime the Cuyamaca Water Company had been making several if not separate uses of said land, the first of which was that in about the year 1914 it had caused the erection of a pumping plant in the bed of said river and upon its said lands and for a time had extracted a considerable amount of water from the stream, which it had poured into its ditches for the supply of its lower consumers, among which were numbered several municipalities and water-using districts, and among the latter the interveners herein. About nine years prior to the commencement of the present action, however, a torrential downflow of the river had destroyed said that portion of the bed of the river been, rebuilt, nor have the waters flowing through pumping plant and the same has never been since the destruction of said plant, extracted or appropriated or applied to the uses of the Cuyamaca Water Company or of its public or private customers occupying lower areas. The second uses which the Cuyamaca Water Company has been making of said tract of land since its acquisition, and is still making of such portion thereof as is required for such uses, is that of conveying across it by means of ditches the waters of the San Diego river and its tributaries which said company has been appropriating and claiming the right to appropriate for a goodly number of years, and in the extraction and impounding of which it has expended large sums of money in a distribution system by means of which it brings such of these waters as it has extracted and impounded from distances many miles up said river down to the gorge, in a portion of which the lands involved in this action are located, and thence across said lands to lower levels in the course of its ministry to the municipalities, water districts, and individual users of water who are its customers therein. When the present action was instituted the plaintiff herein did not in its original complaint take any note or make any provision looking to the continued utilization of said tract of land for the aforesaid purposes; but, in its amended complaint herein, the plaintiff undertook to set forth affirmatively and in detail the particular use which the original defendants herein were making of the portion of said land occupied by its ditches and other appliances for the conveyance of said upper waters across said land, and in so doing so far modified its demand for the condemnation of said land for its own public uses as to concede and in fact establish in the said defendants the full right and easement in and to the use of the portion of said tract then being occupied and utilized for the foregoing purposes, the same to be and to remain unaffected by the construction and use of the proposed dam to be placed across said gorge, in the event of such condemnation. It is important to take note of the plaintiff's precise averments in that regard. They read as follows:

"Reserving to the defendants and to their successors in interest the easement and right:

"(1) To conduct over and across said land hereinabove described by means of the flume or conduit now located thereon, which said flume or conduit is located on that particular portion of said land more particularly described as follows: A strip of land twenty (20) feet wide, being ten (10) feet on each side of the following described center line to-wit: [Describing it] any water which said defendants, or either or any of them may now or hereafter be entitled to carry or conduct across said land, together with the right to enlarge and repair said flume or conduit, or to relocate the same in a manner not inconsistent with the use of said lands by plaintiff for reservoir purposes. * * *

"(5) Further reserving to said defendants and to each of said defendants, and their successors in interest, the right of access to said property for all purposes hereinabove stated as reserved to said defendants and to each and every of said defendants."

The evidence introduced upon the trial of the action was such as to fully support the aforesaid averments in the plaintiff's amendment to its complaint and also to fully justify the findings of the trial court precisely defining the aforesaid uses which the defendants have been and are making of that portion of the tract of land to be considered, and not only establishing the same, but also declaring that the taking of said land, subject to such uses and the erection of the proposed dam thereon and upon the lands which are already owned by the plaintiff, will not interfere with nor be in anywise inconsistent with the continuance of such easements and uses. As to the claim of the defendants to the effect that by the construction of the pumping plant already noted in the bed of said river and the extraction thereby of certain quantities of water from the river at said point for allocation to the uses of its lower customers, the trial court made a finding to the effect that the defendants had lost whatever right they might otherwise have gained, through the destruction of said plant by torrential floods and by the abandonment of such use for the period of nine years following such destruction and immediately preceding the date of the institution of the present action. But, even if in this respect the trial court could be held to have been in error, it would seem that whatever remaining rights the defendants may still retain in the matter of the re-establishment of said pumping plant, and in the use thereof, these have been fully protected and reserved to them, and hence also to the interveners herein by the further concessions found in the plaintiff's amended complaint, and wherein the defendants are to retain "the right to withdraw and take from said lands by pumps or otherwise any water which the defendants, or either or any of them, now have the right to withdraw and take from said land." With respect to whatever rights the defendants may have acquired in the waters of the San Diego river by virtue of the diversion thereof at the point where said original pumping plant was located, and by the supply thereof from that source to their municipal and other customers below said point of diversion, and whatever rights they may still retain therein, and whatever basis the possession of such rights and the use of the lands in question for their exercise might furnish for the claim of the defendants and interveners herein for their present claim that the plaintiff is forbidden to condemn said lands under the aforementioned amendment to the eminent domain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, will be reserved for discussion at a later stage in the present opinion.

[1] We are thus, as to the facts of this case, brought to the point of considering whether the plaintiff herein, as a municipal corporation, is in either fact or law forbidden to institute and maintain this action for the condemnation for its public uses of the lands sought herein to be condemned by virtue of the provisions of said amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure. The particular lands and the particular portion thereof and the particular rights and uses therein which the plaintiff seeks to acquire by the instant proceeding in eminent domain bear no such relation, under the facts as found by the trial court, to those other lands and properties of the defendants, including water rights they may possess, or claim, or be exercising therein, and in relation to any public or private consumers, as to entitle these defendants to successfully maintain that the lands and properties herein sought to be taken have been or are being "appropriated to the use of any * * * incorporated city or town or municipal water district" so as to be exempted from the exercise of the right of eminent domain over such lands by the plaintiff herein, a municipal corporation, in its effort to so acquire the same for public use. The tract of land embracing about 200 acres, of which the larger portion is sought to be taken, and the remainder of which is sterile, unused, and of little value, is separate and remote from any other lands of these defendants, the main holdings of which lie many miles further up the river and are directly utilized in the appropriation, diversion, storage, and distribution of those waters of the river and its tributaries which these defendants are engaged in transportation and disposing of to its consumers by means of the ditches and appliances above referred to, the only connection by way of either contact or use between these entirely separate land holdings being the long line of said ditch. The only other lands having any proximity to the tract in controversy consists of a body of land lying about five miles down the river, occupied by the El Monte pumping plant, and to which the relation of the defendants herein is that of a riparian owner. This latter tract bears no other relation to the lands to be taken than that the waters of the river which escape from the defendants' upstream appropriations and reach and pass through El Capitan dam site flow down to the El Monte location in the natural downflow of the river. It would seem to be sufficiently obvious that as to the defendants' ditch and appliances across the lands here sought to be taken and as to the waters which flow therein in the course of their distribution to public and private consumers thereof upon the lower levels between these lands and the city of San Diego, neither these defendants nor the said users of said waters can have or claim any right to rely upon the inhibitive provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted, for the purpose of defeating the present action, since, as to each and all of them, the taking of the portion of said tract of land herein sought to be condemned, and under the conditions allowing such condemnation, will not in the slightest degree affect or interfere with or in anywise diminish the full use of said waters, and of the ditch or ditches by which they are and are to be delivered to such use, or in any way involve or call in question the asserted right of these defendants, or of their public or private consumers, or of the interveners herein, to the ownership and use of said waters flowing and to flow in said ditch or any part or portion thereof. In the utter absence of any showing herein that said lands, if so condemned, will be put to uses inconsistent with or injuriously affecting the use and right to use the said ditch and the waters flowing therein, as to their ownership, distribution, or use, there can exist no possible ground for the application of the aforesaid provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure to the proposed condemnation of the land in question, in so far as the rights of these defendants and their consumers or the interveners herein to the use of said ditch and of the waters flowing and to flow therein are concerned.

[2, 3] From the foregoing conclusion we pass to a consideration of whatever rights these defendants and these interveners, or either or any of them, claim to possess by reason of whatever uses have in the past been made or are now being made of the waters of the San Diego river which reach and pass over, through, or under the particular lands herein sought to be taken. These waters, as we have seen, are in no way connected with the waters which arrive at and pass over said lands through said ditch, but, on the contrary, are waters which, escaping appropriation on higher levels, flow down the river to the point of their proposed collection and impounding by means of the El Capitan reservoir, to be created by the proposed dam. Assuming for the sake of argument that the question of the defendants' right to resume the extraction and use of these waters as they flow through said gorge by means of pumps or other devices has not been set at rest by the findings of the trial court, relative to their abandonment of such use, or even by the concession of the plaintiff that whatever right these defendants may have to resume such use they may still exercise, notwithstanding the taking and subjection of said lands to dam site uses, there would still remain the question as to what rights, if any, these defendants or their consumers or successors have or could have in these particular waters which is so far superior to the rights of this plaintiff therein as to operate to prevent the condemnation of these lands in order to the utilization of the waters of the San Diego river flowing therein for municipal purposes by the city of San Diego. As to these particular waters, it will be seen that the rights of these defendants, if any, are riparian and are derived solely from their ownership of the land through which they flow. In the case of City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597 (57 P. 585, et seq.), it was held by this court that the city of Los Angeles, by virtue of its successorship to the rights and properties of the pueblo of Los Angeles, had a prior and paramount right to such of the waters of the Los Angeles river as the expanding needs of such city required, and that the defendants in that action, as riparian owners along the upper course of said stream, could not assert their subordinated riparian rights in and to said waters so as to defeat the right of said city to condemn their lands in order to accomplish the subjection of said waters to the public needs and uses of said city. In the case of City of San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co. et al., 287 P. 475, this day decided, this court has given full application of the doctrine announced in that case in so far as it related to the prior and paramount right of a city, deriving its origin from a pueblo, to the waters of a stream flowing through it, according to its growing needs. It follows from the law, as thus declared, that the city of San Diego, as plaintiff herein, as the successor of the pueblo of San Diego, has had at all times and still has a prior and paramount right to the use of the waters of the San Diego river, particularly involved in the present discussion, whenever, and to the extent that, the needs of the city and its inhabitants require such use. In the instant proceeding the city of San Diego, by the formal resolution of its governing body, declared that the necessity had arrived for the impounding and use of these particular waters through the acquisition of El Capitan reservoir and the condemnation of the lands herein sought for the construction of a retaining dam. The findings of the trial court herein as to the facts support said resolution and reassert the present needs of the city for such waters and for the condemnation of said lands in order to the exercise of the prior and paramount rights of the city to the present use of said waters. In view of the law, as heretofore declared, and again and most recently reasserted, and of the facts as thus found to exist by the trial court, it is impossible to conceive how these defendants, or their successors, or even their consumers, possessing and exercising only a subordinated right to the use of these particular waters, could either possess or, under the aforesaid amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure, be accorded the right to prevent the plaintiff, in the exercise of its superior right to the use of these waters, from also exercising the right of eminent domain over these lands forming, as they do, a portion of the water course through which these waters flow in order to render available to said city its aforesaid superior right to the use of said waters, according to its needs. The foregoing reasoning and conclusions are also susceptible of full application to whatever rights and claims these defendants and their successors assert to that portion of the waters of the San Diego river which, having passed through the gorge wherein lie the lands sought to be taken, flow downward some five miles or so to those lower lands of these parties, upon which is located El Monte pumping plant, the purpose of which is to extract said waters. As to these waters, also, the rights of the defendants and their successors in ownership and use are riparian only, and hence are subject to the same conditions as those already defined affecting these same waters at the proposed dam site. It is obvious that the amended sections of the Code of Civil Procedure were never intended to have application to such a situation as is thus in both instances presented, but that even if given the fullest effect of which the language of said amendment is susceptible could only have been designed to prevent one municipality or water district from seeking to acquire by condemnation and apply to new and other public uses the property of another municipality or water district which had already been appropriated and was being actually put by the latter to a public use, which, in point of right, was equal or prior to that of the municipality or water district seeking such condemnation. The case of Mono Power Co. v. City of Los Angeles (C. C. A.) 284 F. 784, upon which the defendants, and particularly the interveners herein, most strongly rely, is a case to which the foregoing statement as to the proper interpretation of the said amendments to sections 1240 and 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure has precise application. That was a case wherein the plaintiffs in the court below, city of Los Angeles et al., were seeking to condemn certain land, water rights, and rights of way, of which the Southern Sierras Power Company et al., were the owners, and which lands, water rights, and rights of way were at the time of the institution of said action in the actual use by said defendants of supplying electric energy to certain incorporated cities and towns in the counties of Mono, Inyo, Kern, San Bernardino, Riverside, and Imperial for public or municipal uses. The court in that case held that the city of Los Angeles, in order to install and enter upon a municipal use of its own, was not entitled to condemn and apply to such public use on its own account properties which had already been wholly appropriated to the public use of some other county, municipality, incorporated city and town, and the inhabitants thereof. This, however, is, as we have seen, not such a case, but, on the contrary, is a case to which, under our interpretation of the scope and intent of the aforesaid amendments to the Code of Civil Procedure, that case has no application.

We have thus, we think, disposed of every vital question presented upon the appeal from that portion of the judgment herein from which the appellants have prosecuted a separate appeal. We now address ourselves to their appeal from the order of the trial court granting a new trial, as to the issues which were submitted to a jury, and as to which the jury returned a verdict in the defendants' favor, fixing their damages, by virtue of the taking of the property involved in this condemnation, in round numbers at the sum of $600,000. The trial court set aside this verdict as excessive, and in upholding its order in that regard we cannot do so more aptly than by adopting the language of the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District, Division 1, to which these appeals were in the first instance presented, and which court in affirming said order did so in the following appropriate words:

[4-6] "The trial court held, in effect, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; and more particularly that the verdict was so excessive that it appeared to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice. Insufficiency of the evidence, before it will justify a court of appeal in refusing to accept and follow a finding of fact, must amount to a complete absence of any substantial evidence in support of the finding. A common statement of the rule on appeal is that if the evidence is conflicting, the finding will not be disturbed. But it is not so with a trial court in passing upon a motion for a new trial. The trial judge should not grant a new trial unless he is clearly satisfied that the verdict or other decision is wrong. 'But in considering the question upon the motion he must act upon his own judgment as to the effect of the evidence. The parties are entitled to the judgment of the jury in rendering a verdict, in the first instance; but upon a motion for a new trial they are equally entitled to the independent judgment of the judge as to whether such verdict is supported by the evidence.' Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 103, 78 P. 337, 340. In the case at bar there was a wide diversity of opinion of witnesses concerning the value of the land sought to be taken. The value stated in the verdict, though less than that shown by the testimony of some witnesses, is many times the value given by other witnesses. Counsel for defendants were deeply dissatisfied with the announcement of the intention of the court to decide that the right to condemn the land had been established. To such decision they had the right of exception, and the right to have the matter reviewed upon appeal, but upon that issue they had no right of appeal to the jury. Nevertheless, on numerous occasions, and apparently with a studied intention, they expressed this dissatisfaction in the presence of the jury, and endeavored to emphasize and impress upon the minds of the jurors the fact that the land was being taken away from the defendants against the will and contrary to the desire of the defendants. If this overpressed insistence of the defendants that the court was erroneously permitting their land to be taken away from them caused the jury to increase the amount of the compensation award and to raise it above the value which normally would have resulted from the testimony of the witnesses, this easily might have produced an excessive verdict. For the standard of measurement of value of the land about to be taken did not in any way depend upon the fact that the defendants were objecting to the condemnation. The plaintiff was entitled to have the actual market value established in accordance with law, unaffected by any belief or suggestion that the property was being wrongfully condemned and taken. It is apparent that the court in ruling on the motion for a new trial had reached the conclusion that the jurors, in arriving at the amount of compensation given by their verdict, had improperly allowed themselves to be influenced by these contentions of the defendants, and that the verdict so obtained was excessive. We are of the opinion that the order granting a new trial of the issues tried by jury should be affirmed."

In the determination of these appeals we have given careful consideration to the very elaborate briefs and arguments of counsel for the respective parties and of amici curiae, and to the many points made and authorities cited therein, and such of these as have not been noted or commented upon in detail in this opinion are, we think, fully covered and disposed of by our discussion herein of the vital points involved in these appeals.

It is ordered that the portion of the judgment appealed from be and the same is hereby affirmed, and that the order of the trial court granting a new trial as to the issues which were committed to the jury is also hereby affirmed.

WILLIAMSON v. EGAN et al.*
S. F. 12579.

Supreme Court of California.

April 21, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 19, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ☞348.

Action to recover rental value of horses and mules against surety on public contractor's bond held maintainable before expiration of 90 days following filing of claim (Public Works Act 1919, § 2).

Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487) requires filing of verified statement of claim against contractor on public works bond, and provides that at any time within 90 days following expiration of period last mentioned claimant may commence action against surety on bond. Surety when sued on bond contended that foregoing section fixes not only a time after which no suit can be brought, but also time before which no action can be maintained.

2. Appeal and error ☞1041(2).

Error, if any, in permitting amendment to complaint held not to affect merits nor warrant reversal, where recovery was allowed under original complaint.

3. Municipal corporations ☞347(1).

Provisions of public contractor's bond required by statute should be liberally construed to effectuate purpose (Public Works Act 1919).

4. Municipal corporations 347(1).

Surety on public contractor's bond held liable for rental value of mules and horses without reduction for nonuser due to rain or unfavorable conditions (Public Works Act 1919).

Bond covering construction of municipal reservoir given pursuant to Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487) obligated surety to pay for labor, materials, etc., used in, upon, for, or about performance of work. Surety contended that it was liable only for rental value of teams and mules during time they were actually used on work of improvement. It was not shown that contract for rental was unreasonable, nor that it did not represent the usual terms and charge for such rental.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by W. L. Williamson against Andrew Egan, doing business under the name and style of the Egan Construction Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

LANGDON, J.

This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them in an action to recover rental value of teams of horses and mules used in the construction of certain public work.

The defendant Egan was the contractor, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company was the surety upon his statutory bond.

The findings of fact state the case shown by the record and are, substantially, as follows: That on or about the 24th day of October, 1923, defendant Egan made and entered into a contract with the city of Santa Cruz, by the terms of which said defendant was to construct a reservoir on Bay street in the city of Santa Cruz, state of California; that on the same date the defendant surety company executed and delivered a certain bond in the amount of $73,537 by which it became bound unto all materialmen, etc., and especially to all persons, companies, or corporations renting or hiring teams or implements or machinery, for or contributing to said work to be done and whose claim has not been paid by the contractor, in the amount of the bond. The bond required, as a condition of liability of the surety, that all claims for materials, etc., should be filed as required by the statute in such cases made and provided, and that in the event of action being brought, a reasonable attorneys' fee should be charged as costs.

Between November 2, 1923, and March 28, 1924, inclusive, plaintiff furnished and rented 86 head of mules and horses, with harness and equipment, consisting of enumerated plows and scrapers to defendant Egan and said Egan took and hired said mules, horses, harness, and equipment, all at the special instance and request of said Egan for use in connection with said work and during all of said times said mules, horses, harness, and equipment were used in, on, and about said work; that by the terms of the agreement between plaintiff and the said defendant Egan for the renting of said mules, horses, harness, and equipment, there became due the plaintiff the following sums for the following periods and the following items:

For the period November 3, 1923, to December 3, 1923, for mules, horses and harness hired, $507.50.

For the same period, rent of a disc plow, $30.

For the same period, rent of railroad plow, $15.

For the period December 3, 1923, to January 3, 1924, for mules, horses and harness hired, $1,075.

For the same period, rent of 4 slip scrapers, $22.

For the period January 3, 1924, to February 3, 1924, for mules, horses and harness hired, $1,075.

For the period February 3, 1924, to March 3, 1924, for mules, horses and harness hired, $1,075.

For the period March 3, 1924, to March 28, 1924, for mules, horses and harness hired, $859.20.

The trial court also found that defendant Egan promised and agreed to pay the freight upon the mules, horses, and equipment from Santa Cruz to Lathrop, Cal., and to load the same upon the cars, and that said defendant failed to do so and plaintiff was thereby compelled to do said work and pay said freight and that the amount expended therefor was $268; that all of these amounts were properly chargeable against the defendant Egan and the defendant surety company.

It was found that by the terms of said agreement, defendant Egan promised to pay for any damage or injury to said mules or horses, and that in the course of said work and through the negligence and carelessness of said Egan, a horse and a mule were so injured as to be rendered worthless and that their value, in the aggregate, was $225; that defendants are entitled to certain credits for articles appropriated by plaintiff and aggregating in value $265; that all the charges of plaintiff for the rental and use of said mules, horses, harness, and equipment as set forth in the findings as due from defendants to plaintiff were the reasonable, proper, and going charges for such character and kind of mules, horses, harness, and equipment furnished by plaintiff and used upon said work, and for the character of work to be done and the use to be made of said mules, horses, harness, and equipment; that by agreement of plaintiff and defendant Egan, plaintiff was not to be paid for said mules and horses during the period from November 3, 1923, to December 3, 1923, when the said mules and horses were not working on account of rain or due to rainy weather; that due to said rain and rainy weather said mules and horses did not work for fifteen days of said period, and by reason thereof plaintiff is entitled to one-half of the full amount of $12.50 per head per month for said 86 head of mules and horses, with their harness.

That upon the 27th day of March, 1924, plaintiff filed with said city of Santa Cruz and its city clerk and commissioner a verified statement of his said claims against defendants herein, together with a statement that the same had not been paid, and in all respects complied with the provisions of the act of the Legislature approved May 10, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), and entitled "An act to secure the payment of the claims of persons employed by contractors upon public works, and the claims of persons who furnish materials, supplies, teams, implements or machinery used or consumed by such contractors in the performance of such works, and prescribing the duties of certain public officers with respect thereto." That at the proper time and in the proper manner, plaintiff did and performed all things and acts required by the provisions of said act of the Legislature and did all things and acts and filed all notices and other documents necessary to preserve and protect his claims against defendants herein, and each of them.

That it is true that at the time of the commencement of this action, the work on the original contract entered into between defendant Egan and the city of Santa Cruz had not been completed, nor at that time had said work of improvement been completed, nor had there been at said time cessation from labor on said contract and work of improvement for thirty days.

Upon these findings, judgment was given against the defendants.

[1] It is contended on appeal, first, that plaintiff's action was prematurely brought. The following facts are undisputed: The contract between Egan and the city of Santa Cruz was dated October 24, 1923. Egan commenced work at once. He abandoned work on or about February 23, 1924. On February 28, 1924, the city council adopted a resolution declaring that Egan had abandoned work. Within thirty days from the date of abandonment, Egan's surety caused the work to be resumed and completed. Formal acceptance of completion was signified by the city council by the adoption of a resolution to that effect on December 4, 1924. Plaintiff took possession of the rented property and removed it from the work on or about March 28, 1924, and on that date he filed with the city of Santa Cruz a verified statement of his claim against Egan and he commenced the present suit on May 26, 1924. It is the appellant's contention that under the provisions of the Public Works Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), plaintiff had no right to commence suit against appellants on their bond until after the expiration of thirty days following the completion of the work of improvement, i. e., December 4, 1924. Section 2 of the act in question provides, in part: "Any materialman, person * * * renting or hiring teams * * * and whose claim has not been paid by the contractor * * * may at any time prior to the expiration of the period within which claims of lien must be filed for record, as prescribed by the provisions of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, file * * * a verified statement of such claims, together with a statement that the same have not been paid. At any time within ninety days following the expiration of the period last mentioned, the person, company or corporation filing the same may commence an action against the surety or sureties on the bond, specified and required in section one hereof." Appellants concede that the claim was filed in time, but contend, in effect, that the foregoing language of section 2 of the act fixes not only a date after which suit cannot be brought, but also a date before which no action can be maintained. While this precise question seems not to have been decided in this state under the act of 1919, it was decided adversely to appellants' contention with reference to the similar act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 201). French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 P. 92, 94. In the case just cited it was held: "When time is spoken of, any act is within the time named that does not extend beyond it."

We feel constrained to hold upon principle and authority that the language "within ninety days following the expiration of the period" (for filing claims) means not beyond the ninetieth day after such period. It has been held that "within ten days after service" of a commissioner's report, means before, or less than ten days after service (Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Eubanks, 32 Mo. App. 184); that a waiver "at any time within six months after the probate" of a will includes a waiver made two months before probate (Atherton v. Corliss, 101 Mass. 40); that a certificate filed before a vessel's departure is "within four days from the time of the vessel's departure from port" (Young v. The Orpheus, 119 Mass. 179); that a claim filed prior to a declaration of insolvency is filed "within nine months after declaration of insolvency" (Levert v. Read, 54 Ala. 529); that "within thirty days from the time such work is completed" means "before completion, or not more than 30 days afterwards" (French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 641, 68 P. 92; Hub Hardware Co. v. Aetna Co., 178 Cal. 264, 269, 173 P. 81).

[2] It is also contended that the amendment to plaintiff's complaint was filed too late. The work having been completed on December 4, 1924, the last day for filing suits against the surety was April 5, 1925, and the amendment was not filed until November 30, 1925. It is asserted that the purported amendment was in fact not such, but was the statement of a new cause of action. The original complaint was for the contract price of the teams and the amendment sought to add a count for the reasonable value of the rented equipment. However, recovery was allowed to the plaintiff upon the cause of action stated in the original complaint for the contract price, and the error, if any, in permitting the amendment would not affect the merits of the case nor warrant a reversal of the judgment.

Appellants contend that the judgment for rental against both defendants is excessive in the amount of $859.20, because in the itemized statement herein set forth as constituting the elements of the judgment is included that sum as rental from March 3, 1924, to March 28, 1924, after the work had been abandoned by Egan, and that rental for this period and this amount was not asked in the complaint. In other words, it is contended that the judgment is $859.20 in excess of the amount prayed for in the complaint. A discussion of this matter is unnecessary, because plaintiff concedes the correctness of this objection and the judgment must be reduced accordingly.

[3, 4] It is contended, finally, that as against the defendant surety company the judgment is erroneous because it makes no allowance in rental for the time the teams might not have worked on the job due to rain or unfavorable conditions; that the surety is liable only for rental during the time the teams were actually used on the work of improvement. This argument is predicated upon the language of the bond obligating the surety to pay for labor, materials, etc., "used in, upon, for or about the performance of the work." We are not disposed to give so narrow a construction to the terms of the bond. The plaintiff did not agree to permit his teams to be present on the job, ready to work at any and all times, but without compensation in the event they could not work for a day or more or for a fractional part of a day because of conditions over which plaintiff had no control. It is not shown that the contract for rental was unreasonable, nor that it did not represent the usual terms and charge for such rental. Delays due to the weather were a part of the surrounding circumstances which entered into the cost of the improvement. The bond sued upon here is one required by statute and its provisions are to be liberally construed to effectuate its purpose. Continental National Bank v. Republic Cas. Co., 202 Cal. 586, 589, 262 P. 300.

The judgment against each defendant is modified by reducing the same in the sum of $859.20, and as so modified the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Action by B. Z. McKinney, as trustee of the estate of Thomas Wright, bankrupt, against Sarah E. Wright and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment in an action brought by him as trustee of the estate of Thomas Wright, bankrupt, against Sarah E. Wright, wife of said bankrupt, and Edith Lillian Salter, daughter of said bankrupt, in an action prosecuted to set aside conveyances: First, one made by the bankrupt to Sarah E. Wright, and, second, one made by Sarah E. Wright to Edith Lillian Salter. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

The real estate is described in the complaint.

On the 19th day of January, 1925, the minor son of Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright, to wit, Thomas Wright, Jr., was the driver of an automobile which was involved in an accident wherein Aurilla A. Edson and Roxanna J. Archer were injured. Thomas Wright, Sr., had, prior to the accident, signed the application for a driver's license in favor of his said minor son, Thomas Wright, Jr.

On the 25th day of May, 1925, Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright, his wife, one of the defendants herein, by deed, purported to convey a one-half interest in the property described in the complaint to Sarah E. Wright. On May 11, 1926, judgment was rendered in the superior court of Orange county in favor of Aurilla A. Edson against Thomas Wright in the sum of $800 and costs, and on July 21, 1926, judgment was rendered in the superior court of Orange county in favor of Roxanna J. Archer against Thomas Wright for the sum of $3,260. These judgments were based upon injuries sustained in the automobile accident heretofore referred to as occurring on the 19th day of January, 1925, wherein Thomas Wright, Jr., was the driver of one of the automobiles. On the 19th day of July, 1926, Sarah E. Wright, one of the appellants herein, conveyed to Edith Lillian Salter, a daughter of Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright, all the property described in the complaint.

On the 11th day of September, 1926, Thomas Wright was adjudged a bankrupt on a petition which listed as his only creditors Aurilla A. Edson and Roxanna J. Archer. On October 12, 1926, the claims of said Aurilla A. Edson and Roxanna J. Archer were allowed by the referee in bankruptcy of the estate of Thomas Wright. Thereafter, the plaintiff in this action, as the trustee in bankruptcy of Thomas Wright, brought this action to set aside the conveyances heretofore referred to.

The court, among other things, found that Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright were husband and wife and had been such during all the times mentioned in the action; that Edith Lillian Salter was the daughter of Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright. The court also found that on the 19th day of January, 1925, the said Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright were joint owners as tenants in common, with the right of survivorship, and were in possession of the real estate described in the complaint; that on the 19th day of January, 1925, the property described in the complaint was all the property, of whatsoever kind or character, owned by the said Thomas Wright. The court further found that on the 25th day of May, 1925, when the conveyance was made purporting to convey the interests of Thomas Wright in and to said real property to his wife, Sarah E. Wright, that Sarah E. Wright had knowledge of the claim for damages of Aurilla A. Edson and Roxanna J. Archer, arising out of the automobile accident occurring on January 19, 1925, and upon which claims judgments were thereafter entered as herein stated; that the conveyance dated May 25, 1925, wherein Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright, his wife, purported to convey to Sarah E. Wright all of the right, title, and interest in and to the real property described in the complaint, was without consideration; and that said deed of conveyance was made with the intention, and for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of Thomas Wright, to wit, Aurilla A. Edson and Roxanna J. Archer. The court found also that on May 11, 1926, judgment was entered in favor of Aurilla A. Edson against Thomas Wright for the sum of $800, based upon the automobile accident heretofore referred to; that thereafter and on July 19, 1926, Sarah E. Wright, a married woman, made and delivered a purported deed of conveyance of the real property described in the complaint to Edith Lillian Salter, one of the defendants in this action. The court further found that this deed was made without consideration and was made with the intention to and for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of Thomas Wright, to wit, Aurilla A. Edson and Roxanna J. Archer. The court further found that the defendant Edith Lillian Salter was entitled to remove from the premises described a certain dwelling house estimated to be of the value of about $2,000. The conveyances referred to were directed canceled, and likewise, a purported mortgage on the premises, whereby Edith Lillian Salter purported to mortgage the same in favor of Sarah E. Wright for the sum of $20,000, was ordered canceled, and declared to be of no force or effect. Other facts were found by the court not necessary to be here mentioned.

[1] While the testimony in this case was elicited only from the defendants when called to the witness stand to testify under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we think it establishes beyond question sufficient basis for the trial court to find that no actual consideration passed from Sarah E. Wright to Thomas Wright for the conveyance to her of the interest theretofore owned by Thomas Wright in and to the real property described in the complaint, and likewise justified the trial court in holding that no consideration passed from Edith Lillian Salter to Sarah E. Wright for the conveyance by which Sarah E. Wright purported to transfer to her all of said real property. The testimony also shows that Sarah E. Wright and Edith Lillian Salter knew of the automobile accident in which the two judgment creditors of Thomas Wright were injured, where one of the automobiles was driven by the minor son of Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright.

The transcript shows that about 1900 Thomas Wright bought a certain piece of property mentioned in the testimony as the "Broadway property"; that thereafter this property was traded for the property involved in this action. This trade was made some time in the year 1919. That in 1919 the property involved was conveyed to Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright as joint tenants, and on the part of Sarah E. Wright it is claimed that the interest of Thomas Wright was conveyed to her in 1925 for and on account of certain moneys loaned by her to Thomas Wright in 1919. The amount so loaned is alleged to be the sum of $2,650, and that Thomas Wright was to pay 8 per cent. interest thereon; that no note was executed by Thomas Wright to Sarah E. Wright, or any written instrument signed or executed by Thomas Wright, evidencing such transaction. An examination, however, of the transcript shows that all of this money, except a possible $600 alleged to have been loaned by Sarah E. Wright to Thomas Wright, came out of the community earnings of Thomas Wright and Sarah E. Wright, his wife, $800 being profit on what was called the "Broadway Property," when the deal was made, $1,200 being claimed as the interest of Sarah E. Wright in the Broadway property, which had been given to her by Thomas Wright, $1,000 profit on the crops raised on the premises alleged to have been given by Sarah E. Wright to her husband, Thomas Wright. The conveyance made by Sarah E. Wright to Edith Lillian Salter purports to have been made for a consideration of $22,000. The facts disclosed, however, show that Edith Lillian Salter and her husband built a dwelling house on the premises involved, valued at the sum of about $2,000, and executed a mortgage for the sum of $20,000. The judgment in the case permits Edith Lillian Salter and her husband to remove the house from the premises.

The defendant Sarah E. Wright testified that she bought the property, or rather bought the interest of Thomas Wright, to protect herself. After referring to the automobile accident in which Sarah E. Wright stated that she knew thereof, we quote the following:

"Q. Mrs. Wright, was there anything said about this action just prior to the time your husband deeded the property to you? A. Why, I knew of it, yes.

"Q. Did you and your husband discuss that in regard to transferring his property to you? A. Well, because of my interest in the property, and because of my separate property, I bought the property to protect my interest.

"Q. When you say 'protect your interest', you mean this present litigation? A. Yes; it is possibly, not probable, not likely, but it might interfere."

The witness then went on to detail how the money was obtained which went into the property, and testifies in relation to the money being loaned by her to her husband in 1919, and that in 1925, after the automobile accident in question, this discussion was had and the property conveyed to her. We do not need to set out the testimony, and content ourselves with the simple statement that a reading of it shows that the trial court was justified in holding that no consideration was paid for any of the transfers involved herein; that practically all of the money alleged to have been loaned by Sarah E. Wright to Thomas Wright were the profits realized upon community property owned by them.

We find nothing in the testimony justifying the contention of appellants that in May, 1925, Thomas Wright, pursuant to an agreement entered into years prior thereto, conveyed his interest in the property involved to Sarah E. Wright for a consideration in the sum of $12,500.

[2] On the part of the appellants it is claimed that the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist at the time of the transfer of the property involved, made by Thomas Wright to Sarah E. Wright, his wife; that while Thomas Wright was liable to respond in damages for any injury occasioned by the negligence of his son in the automobile accident occurring in January, 1925, he was not, at the date of the transfer of the property in question, to wit, in the following month of May of the same year, a debtor of the two women injured in the accident thereafter adjudged to be due to the negligence of Thomas Wright, Jr. This contention appears to be made without having consulted the decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court relative to the date when one becomes liable to respond in damages, and when the law relative to the existence of the relationship of debtor and creditor, finds its inception.

In the case of Allee v. Shay, 92 Cal. App. 749, 268 P. 962, 966, this court had occasion to examine quite thoroughly, and set forth at length, the authorities bearing upon such relationship. That case involved circumstances very similar to the ones we are now considering. A man by the name of Kienzle was the owner of an automobile, and while driving the same on January 4, 1925, he injured a boy by the name of Lee E. West. Some time after the date of the injury, and before judgment had been entered on account of the injury just referred to, Kienzle disposed of all of his property. Judgment was thereafter entered in favor of West, execution was issued on the judgment, and the property which Kienzle had transferred to one of his relatives levied upon. Thereupon an action was begun against the sheriff to restrain the sale and vacate the levy. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff in that action, and this court, upon a review of the facts, set aside the judgment and findings of the trial court, and directed judgment in favor of the sheriff and his right to proceed with the execution, the holding of this court being that the rights of the parties dated as of the date of the automobile accident. In the opinion in the Allee Case, supra, this court said: "On January 4, 1925, at the instant the automobile driven by Kienzle injured the minor, Lee E. West, a cause of action arose in favor of West against Kienzle, and a claim for damages then and there instantly arose, of which claim J. H. Kienzle then and there had immediate notice. We make this statement upon the authority of Cioli v. Kenourgios, 59 Cal. App. 690, 211 P. 838, and the case of Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 459, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62, 64 P. 709. In the latter case, the opinion quotes from Freeman on Executions, as follows: 'That one having a claim for a tort is a creditor before the commencement of an action thereon, as well as after, and, as such creditor, is, upon recovering judgment, entitled to avoid a fraudulent transfer antedating the commencement of his action.' We do not need to quote further from the case of Allee v. Shay, but will refer to the authorities set out on page 759 of the volume referred to (268 P. 966). In the case of Allee v. Shay, just as appears by the circumstances in the case at bar, no property remained in possession of Kienzle, just as no property remained in the possession of Wright after the date of the purported conveyance to his wife. By that conveyance he rendered himself a bankrupt.

This case, in relation to the appointment of a referee in bankruptcy, comes within the cases of Hemenway v. Thaxter, 150 Cal. 737, 90 P. 116, 117; Wolters v. Ross, 126 Cal. 644, 59 P. 143; Wills v. E. K. Wood Lumber Co., etc., 29 Cal. App. 97, 154 P. 613. Section 3442 of the Civil Code is likewise applicable to this case where it provides that a transfer or incumbrance, without valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors. As said in one of the cases to which we have referred, if the act under consideration renders one insolvent, the intent will be inferred that the transfer was made for the purpose of rendering one insolvent, the language in the case of Hemenway v. Thaxter, supra, in this particular, being as follows: "The consequence of this conveyance being, then, to render Hemenway insolvent, he will be presumed to have intended its natural consequence, from which follows an intent to become insolvent, or contemplated insolvency, in the language of the act." The record clearly shows that the conveyance by Thomas Wright to his wife purported to divest him of all of his property, and also that this fact was known to all the parties concerned. The petition in bankruptcy filed by Thomas Wright listed as his creditors Aurilla A. Edson and Roxanna J. Archer, and constituted very persuasive evidence to be considered by the trial court in determining that the conveyances hereinbefore referred to were made to defeat the claims of creditors.

[3] That the conveyances herein involved come within the provisions of section 3439 of the Civil Code declaring such transfers to be void, we think clearly established, and the trial court could not very well, under the testimony, enter any other judgment than the one from which the defendants have appealed.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Trial §46(2).

Court, in action to quiet title, properly sustained objection to record showing unpaid assessments, where counsel failed to show such evidence was relevant.

There was nothing in the record to show that the evidence was relevant or material, and no showing that the defendants were interested in the assessment or had any claim thereunder, and the court refused to accept the evidence only after repeatedly asking defendant's counsel whether his client had some claim under the assessments, and after defendant's counsel refused to state whether the evidence in question would be followed by other evidence showing its relevancy or materiality.

FINCH, P. J.

This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment entered herein quieting the plaintiffs' title to a city lot in the city of Los Angeles.

[1] Appellant contends that there are technical defects in the plaintiffs' chain of title, but it is not necessary to consider them, as the plaintiffs made a sufficient showing of title without the aid of the instruments claimed to be defective. The property was conveyed to the plaintiffs on November 17, 1923. During the following year the plaintiffs leased a part of the lot and the tenant paid them rent therefor. They also leased a part of the property to another tenant and received rent therefor. They exercised other acts of ownership over the lot and paid taxes thereon. It is a disputable presumption "that a person is the owner of property from exercising acts of ownership over it." Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subd. 12. In the absence of any evidence tending to overcome the presumption, it is of sufficient weight to warrant a judgment quieting title in favor of the person exercising such acts of ownership. Pearson v. Hellman Commercial, etc., Bank, 199 Cal. 305, 249 P. 10. There is not the slightest evidence in this case tending to overcome the presumption. It follows that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings and judgment, and that the defendant's motion for a judgment of nonsuit was properly denied.

[2] The only other point urged by the appellant is that the trial court erred "in sustaining objections of plaintiffs to offer of defendant's maps and assessments." Having identified a record of street assessments, the defendant offered in evidence "the map which appears between pages 160 and 161, and the printed matter on that page; also the fly-leaf on page 161," showing an assessment against lot 73 which did not appear to have been paid. Counsel for the plaintiffs objected on the ground, among others, "that it is not shown that the defendants are interested in any portion thereof." The court thereupon said: "The defendant cannot prove his defense all at the same time. I am assuming, of course, that the defendant will connect it up." The court thereafter repeatedly asked counsel for the defendant whether he expected to show that the defendant had any claim under the assessment, but counsel declined to so state. The court finally said: "I don't want to waste the time of this court having records introduced unless you tell me that you expect to connect them with your clients and show that your clients had some claim under that assessment; if you do, I will overrule it; if not, I will sustain it." Counsel for the defendant, still declining to state whether he expected to make such connecting proof, the court sustained the objection and no further proof was offered by the defendant. For the reasons stated by the trial court, the ruling was eminently proper. There is nothing in the record to show whether the evidence offered was relevant or material to any issue in the case, and the objection thereto was properly sustained upon counsel's refusal to state whether it would be followed by other evidence showing its relevancy or materiality. 24 Cal. Jur. 760; 2 Cal. Jur. 275; People v. Rulia Singh, 182 Cal. 457, 482, 188 P. 987; Snowball v. Snowball, 164 Cal. 476, 479, 129 P. 784; Shasta Lumber Co. v. McCoy, 85 Cal. The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 7258.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

April 30, 1930.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1).

In action on burglary policy where evidence as to date on which insurer received proof of loss conflicted, finding of court would be taken as true.

2. Insurance ⇨539(1).

Burglary policy clause requiring proof of loss to be furnished within 60 days held binding on insured.

3. Insurance ⇨641(2).

Waiver by insurer of proof of loss within 60 days must be pleaded to be available.

4. Insurance ☞645(3).

Waiver of proof of loss within 60 days under burglary policy cannot be proved under implied issue raised by affirmative allegations of answer that proof of loss had not been given.

5. Insurance ☞665(4).

Finding that wife whose property had been stolen, was not member of insured husband's household within burglary policy, held supported by evidence.

The evidence disclosed that the wife, whose property was stolen on September 10, 1924, had commenced an action for divorce on September 4, 1924, and had obtained an injunction pending suit restraining the husband, the insured, from entering premises, and that the husband and wife did not live together thereafter. The policy covered insured's property and property of members of insured's household.

6. Insurance ☞425.

Theft of wife's property held not within burglary policy covering husband's property or "member of his family," where husband and wife had separate residences and wife had court order restraining husband from entering her residence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Member (of Family or Household)," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Insurance ☞670.

Finding, in action on burglary policy, that it was untrue that persons committing theft were unknown to insured, held to support judgment for insurer.

The policy provided that it covered all loss through causes stated by any person except one whose property was covered by the policy, and was therefore a condition precedent to recovery on the policy. The condition was pleaded by insured but not proved.

8. Insurance ☞670.

Finding, in action on burglary policy, regarding insured's residence, held to support judgment for insurer.

The complaint alleged in substance that at time of theft the insured and wife maintained their household at certain place, and the finding was to the effect that it was untrue that at time of acts complained of the plaintiffs maintained their household at place as claimed.

9. Trial ☞395(5).

Contention that court should state probative facts and find whether they are true held untenable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Action by Milton J. Kohner and Lurline Kohner against the National Surety Company. Judgment for defendant, and Lurline Kohner appeals.

Affirmed.

Adolph Johnson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Baillie, Turner & Lake and Richard A. Turner, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This action was commenced by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant the sum of $2,500 alleged to be due them upon a policy of insurance. The insurance is what is commonly called "burglary insurance."

The policy upon which this action is based recites in substance that in consideration of $52.25 premium and of the declarations thereafter contained, which the assured warrants to be true and which are to be construed as conditions precedent, the defendant agrees to indemnify Milton J. Kohner in the sum of $5,000 for the term of twelve months, beginning on the 1st day of January, 1924, for all loss by burglary, theft, or larceny of property insured thereunder, from within the house, building, apartment, or rooms, occupied by the assured as described in the declarations and thereafter called the premises, caused by any person except one whose property is covered thereby.

The policy then sets forth the schedule of articles insured thereunder, which included watches, necklaces, gems, precious and semi-precious stones, jewelry, articles of gold, platinum, sterling silver, and other specific articles, to an amount not exceeding 50 per cent. of the total amount of insurance under the policy. The house which contained the property insured is located at 208 North Beechwood drive, Los Angeles, Cal. It was used as a private residence.

There is a further provision in the contract of insurance that it "applies to all property owned by the assured, or by any permanent member of the household of the assured who does not pay board or rent, or by a relative of the assured permanently residing with him, but shall not apply to such property owned by a domestic servant or other employee of the assured."

It is further provided that: "The assured shall give notice of any loss hereunder so soon as practicable by telegraph to the company at its home office in New York City or to an agent of the company and to the public police or other police authorities having jurisdiction."

The policy further provided that: "Affirmative proof of loss or damage under oath must be furnished to the company at its home office in New York City within sixty days from the date of the discovery of such loss or damage."

There is no dispute in the evidence that said Milton J. Kohner and Lurline Kohner were husband and wife and, with Maxine Rose Kohner, who was treated as a member of the Kohner family, lived on the premises described in the insurance policy up to September 4, 1924. It is also an undisputed fact that Mr. Kohner supported the family during said period and for some time thereafter. On September 4, 1924, Lurline Kohner instituted divorce proceedings against her husband, Milton J. Kohner, and on said date the court issued an order restraining said Milton J. Kohner from entering the home at 208 North Beechwood drive pendente lite. Mr. Kohner thereupon took up his residence in a downtown hotel. An interlocutory decree of divorce was granted in the month of August, 1925. On September 10, 1924, at about 7:45 p. m., some one knocked at the door of the Kohner home. There were then in the house Mrs. Kohner and Maxine Rose Kohner. Mrs. Kohner went to the door and inquired what was wanted. The party answered that he was a deputy sheriff and wanted to talk to her and would tell her his business when she let him in. Mrs. Kohner thereupon opened the door, and the party on the outside exhibited to her a deputy sheriff's badge and together with two others forced an entrance into the house. He claimed that they were prohibition officers and had been sent out by headquarters to search the premises for liquor. Mrs. Kohner immediately denied that there was any liquor on the premises, but one of the men slapped her in the face and pushed her over to the floor, and while two men held her the other man proceeded to the back of the house. Thereupon Maxine Kohner came into the room and one of the men told Mrs. Kohner to send the girl back. This Mrs. Kohner refused to do. The man let Mrs. Kohner up and placed her and Maxine on a davenport in the room. One man stayed with them while the other two went through the premises and took jewelry and diamonds belonging to Mrs. Kohner to the value of $3,100. They thereupon left the house. Under the direction of Mrs. Kohner, Maxine Rose Kohner notified police headquarters and called up a friend and the defendant was notified at its local office. The men from police headquarters arrived in about fifteen minutes, and it appears from the evidence that the bureau drawers and various places in the home had been ransacked. While it is disputed by Mrs. Kohner's testimony, there is evidence that at the time of the arrival of the police, Mrs. Kohner stated that she suspected that her husband had instigated the theft. The evidence also shows that all of the property taken by the thieves was the separate property of the plaintiff Lurline Kohner. On September 11, 1924, Sidney Gerson, an investigator for the defendant, appeared and secured a sworn statement from Mrs. Kohner of the facts and the amount of loss. The proof of loss on regular blanks furnished by the respondent company was prepared by I. R. Ruben, an attorney for Mrs. Kohner, after a communication with George W. Seith, who represented the respondent as their attorney and investigator. On September 17, 1924, this proof of loss was mailed to one John E. Mattress, who was the insurance broker who negotiated insurance for the Kohners. The evidence further discloses that on September 20, 1924, Mattress mailed this proof of loss to the defendant company at its Los Angeles office marked "Personal attention of Mr. Paine." Although Mr. Paine was not then in the employ of the respondent company, the proof of loss, together with Mr. Ruben's letter, was actually received by the respondent on September 23, 1924. Whether this proof of loss ever reached the New York city office of the respondent does not appear.

It further appears from the testimony of Mrs. Kohner that she was advised by Gerson, the investigator of the burglary, that Mr. Kohner should also furnish proof of loss to the company. According to the testimony of Mrs. Kohner, on November 1, 1924, Milton J. Kohner filled out a proof of loss in her presence. It was sworn to by him before Grace C. Newlove, a notary public, on November 1, 1924, and the witness went with her husband to the post office, where he mailed said proof on said day to the company at their New York office. Grace C. Newlove, the notary public, testified that on November 1, 1924, Milton J. Kohner did appear and make his affidavit to the proof of loss, but she further positively testified that Mrs. Kohner was not with him at her office where the proof was sworn to. There was also a registry receipt received by the Kohners on November 6, 1924, for a package forwarded by registered mail to New York to the National Surety Company. Said receipt was produced at the trial by the respondent company and it had indorsed thereon with a rubber stamp, received December 5, 1924. Mr. Weil, the manager of the defendant company at its headquarters in New York, testified that this rubber stamp was placed thereon December 5, 1924, the day of its receipt at the home office; that he probably placed it there himself.

On December 20, 1924, acting under the direction of Mr. Weil, George W. Seith, the attorney for the respondent, notified Milton J. Kohner of the rejection of their claim of loss for the reason "that said claim is not covered by said policy contract and the same is hereby denied for the reason, among others that said premises described in said policy contract ceased to be your residence prior to September 10, 1924, and was not at that time your residence."

The court made a finding that on the 10th day of September, 1924, plaintiff Lurline Kohner was the owner of all the personal property which was stolen from the premises at 208 North Beechwood drive, but neither the property nor the premises were in the possession of Milton J. Kohner. The court further found that at said time Milton J. Kohner did not maintain his household at said place and that at the time the robbery was committed the plaintiff Lurline Kohner was not a permanent or any member of the household of Milton J. Kohner. The court also found that at the time of the burglary the burglars were unknown to plaintiff Lurline Kohner and that said property was taken by theft and larceny and had a value of $3,035. The court further found that it was untrue that the persons who committed said theft were or that either of them was unknown to the plaintiff Milton J. Kohner, and that it was untrue that said jewelry or any part thereof was in the possession of said plaintiff Milton J. Kohner at the time of said theft. The court further found that neither of said plaintiffs within the time provided by said policy of insurance furnished affirmative or any proof of loss or damage to the defendant under oath at its home office in New York, but such proof was made December 5, 1924. It is further found by the court that no notice of any loss was given by plaintiffs or either of them by telegraph to the company at its home office in New York City or to any agent of the company. That within sixty days plaintiff Lurline Kohner caused to be delivered to the Los Angeles office of the defendant under oath a proof of loss, but that said proof stated that the property insured belonged at the time of the said burglary to Mrs. Lurline Kohner and that no other person had any interest therein and that there had been no change of the occupancy of the premises of the assured since the issue of said policy and that said premises were occupied by said Lurline Kohner and Maxine Kohner and by no other person. It is further found that the loss to said plaintiff Lurline Kohner is not one for which the defendant became liable or obligated to pay under the terms of the policy.

The court entered its judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff Lurline Kohner appeals.

Many grounds are advanced by the appellant for a reversal of the judgment. It is claimed that the court erred in its finding of fact that the only affirmative proof of loss was delivered to the defendant at its home office in New York city on December 5, 1924. The evidence upon this branch of the case discloses that three forms of proof of loss were executed by the plaintiffs. The first one was executed by the plaintiff Lurline Kohner and verified by her on September 15, 1924. This proof was forwarded by the attorney for Mrs. Kohner to one L. E. Mattress, the broker who negotiated the insurance for Milton J. Kohner. L. E. Mattress was not connected with the defendant, but was an independent insurance broker. Mr. Mattress mailed this proof of loss to the National Surety Company on September 20, 1924, addressed to its Los Angeles office. This office in turn sent the same to Mr. Seith, who was an independent investigator of losses by burglary, but was also an attorney for defendant. He returned it to the Los Angeles office of the defendant, and at the time of the trial it was produced in court from their files. The second proof of loss was unverified, but was signed by Milton J. Kohner and sent to the home office of the company in New York City. This proof was returned to Kohner because it was unverified. A third proof, executed and verified by Milton J. Kohner, was sent to the company at its home office in New York City, but according to the testimony of one Bert Weil, who was the manager of the burglary proof department of the company, it was received at the home office of the company December 5, 1924. It is claimed by the appellant that this proof of loss was received by the company at his home office on November 5, 1924, and appellants produced a registry received from the company bearing that date. The testimony of the said Bert Weil was that this receipt was for the package containing the unverified proof of loss which they had formerly returned to Mr. Kohner.

[1-4] The evidence upon this point being in conflict, the finding of the trial court that the proof last above referred to was not received by the company at its home office until December 5, 1924, must be taken as true. The policy of insurance provides that affirmative proof of loss or damage under oath must be furnished to the company at its home office in New York City within sixty days from the date of the discovery of such loss or damage. The loss occurred September 10, 1924. No affirmative proof of loss was submitted to the company until December 5, 1924, a period of eighty-seven days. In White v. Home Mutual Insurance Co., 128 Cal. 131, 60 P. 666, it is held that policy of insurance containing a clause that proofs of loss must be furnished within sixty days from the date of the fire is the contract of the parties and is binding on the assured. The same rule is enunciated in Secombe v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 611, 188 P. 305; Harris v. North British & Mercantile Ins. Co., Ltd. (C. C. A.) 30 F.(2d) 94; and San Francisco Savings Union v. Western Assur. Co., etc. (C. C.) 157 F. 695. It is also claimed by appellant that the respondent waived the sixty-day limitation for presenting proof of loss. We do not discover in the record any acts done by the company or its officials that amount to a waiver. Further, the plaintiffs had before them the policy of insurance which provided in unmistakable language that affirmative proof of loss must be furnished within sixty days to the company at its home office in New York City. The waiver claimed by appellant is but another term for an estoppel. Wheaton v. Insurance Co., 76 Cal. 415, 419, 18 P. 758, 9 Am. St. Rep. 216. To be available to a party such waiver or estoppel must be pleaded in the first instance. Aronson v. Frankfort, etc., 9 Cal. App. 473, 99 P. 537; Schwab v. Bridge, 27 Cal. App. 204, 149 P. 603. Nor can such alleged waiver be proved under the implied issues raised by the affirmative allegations of the answer that proof of loss had not been given. Goddard v. Fulton et al., 21 Cal. 430; Arnold v. American Insurance Co., 148 Cal. 660, 668, 84 P. 182, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 6; Bank of Anderson v. Home Insurance Co., 14 Cal. App. 208, 214, 111 P. 507. The ruling by the trial court on this question was correct.

[5, 6] It is also claimed that the finding of the court that it was untrue that at the time of the theft plaintiffs maintained their household, or that plaintiff Milton J. Kohner did maintain his household, at said 208 North Beechwood drive, or the finding that it was untrue that at said time plaintiff Lurline Kohner was a permanent or any member of the household of said Milton J. Kohner, is against the evidence. The evidence in support of this finding is, in substance, that about September 4, 1924, plaintiffs ceased to live together as husband and wife. The former going to an hotel, where he lived until October 16, 1924, the wife continuing to occupy the premises at 208 North Beechwood drive, which was her separate property. The wife, on September 4, 1924, commenced an action for divorce and obtained an injunction pending suit, restraining the defendant in said action (her coplaintiff) from entering the premises at 208 North Beechwood drive. An interlocutory decree of divorce was entered in said action on the 11th day of August, 1925, and the final decree therein was entered October 25, 1926. The evidence shows that the plaintiff Milton J. Kohner never lived at 208 North Beechwood drive after September 4, 1924. The policy of insurance indemnifies Milton J. Kohner for all loss by burglary, theft, or larceny of the property insured and those designated as residing with him from within the house, occupied by the assured. It also insures the property of any permanent member of the household of the assured, etc. It seems to us that the questions presented are: Was Milton J. Kohner at the time of the loss residing on the premises at 208 North Beechwood drive? Was Lurline Kohner a member of Milton J. Kohner's household? We are of the opinion that both of these questions must be answered in the negative. Milton J. Kohner was residing at an hotel. Mrs. Kohner had restrained him by order of a court from again entering the family residence. One of the conditions under which the insurance was accepted by the company was that the premises were occupied by the assured. In Goldstock v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 201 App. Div. 816, 195 N. Y. S. 94, it was held that under a policy of burglary insurance, which covered property not only belonging to the assured, but to any relative of the assured permanently residing with the assured, the company was only liable for such articles as were in the possession of the members of the household of the assured while he was alive and occupied the premises, and therefore a suit by the wife to recover for goods belonging to her and which were stolen after the death of the assured was dismissed. It was held in Balzer v. Globe Indemnity Co., 211 App. Div. 98, 206 N. Y. S. 777, the policy covered only property owned by the assured or by any relative of the assured permanently residing with him. The court held the clause covered the wife "only during the time when she answered the description of a relative of the assured permanently residing with the assured." It has also been held that "A permanent abode is a home, which a party may leave as interest or whim may dictate, but which he has no present intention to abandon." Sullivan v. Detroit, etc., 135 Mich. 661, 98 N. W. 756, 760, 61 L. R. A. 673, 106 Am. St. Rep. 403. In McGrew v. Mutual Life Insurance Co., 132 Cal. 85, 64 P. 103, 84 Am. St. Rep. 20, it is held that upon a suit for divorce the presumption that the domicile of the husband is also the domicile of the wife ceases to exist and it is a matter of proof. Each may have a separate domicile.

In the case at bar there seems to be no question that at the time of the theft Mr. and Mrs. Kohner had separate domiciles and that the husband did not reside at 208 North Beechwood drive, and therefore the loss was not covered by the policy of insurance.

[7] It is also claimed that there is no evidence to support the finding that it was untrue that the persons who committed the theft of the property were unknown to Milton J. Kohner. The contract of insurance provides that it covers all loss through the causes stated by any person except one whose property is covered by the policy. This is a condition precedent to a recovery. Under these circumstances, we cannot say the finding was improper or not supported by the evidence. It was pleaded by plaintiffs, but not proved.

[8] It is a further claim of error that there are not sufficient findings of fact on material issues to support the judgment. This claim seems to be predicated upon the theory that the findings of fact are mere conclusions of law. Fifteen of the findings are attacked as coming within this class. As it would unnecessarily lengthen this opinion to discuss each one separately, we will examine the first alleged error, a decision of this one is sufficient to cover all of said objections. The court found: "That it is untrue that on the tenth day of September, 1924, or at the time the acts complained of in the complaint herein were committed, plaintiffs herein maintained their household or that plaintiff herein, Milton J. Kohner, did maintain his household at said 208 North Beechwood drive, Los Angeles, California." This finding responds to an allegation of the complaint, "That on or about said tenth day of September, 1924, and while plaintiffs herein did maintain their household at said 208 N. Beechwood drive, said city of Los Angeles. * * *" It is held in Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 91, 44 P. 331: "The only purpose of the findings is to answer the questions put by the pleadings; and, if facts are stated in the findings in the same way in which they are stated in the pleadings, they are sufficient." In McCarthy v. Brown, 113 Cal. 15, 45 P. 14, it is said, the "findings should state the ultimate facts pleaded, and not probative facts." The following cases give illustrations of what constitute findings of fact: Weidenmueller v. Sterns, etc., Co., 128 Cal. 623, 61 P. 374; Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 275, 12 P. 161; Hollenbach v. Schnabel, 101 Cal. 317, 35 P. 872, 40 Am. St. Rep. 57. It is necessary for the court to state certain facts as a reason for finding the issue. Dam v. Zink, supra. In Butler v. Agnew, 9 Cal. App. 327, 330, 99 P. 395, it is held that in case of a doubt as to which class the findings belong, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the judgment. We are satisfied that the findings are sufficient.

[9] It is another claim of appellant that the court failed to find upon material issues. Under this particular branch of the case, it seems to be appellant's contention that the court should state the probative facts and find whether or not they are true. The authorities last cited answer this claim in the negative.

The judgment herein should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Contract for sale of furnishings and equipment of apartment provided that owner should pay for same when she sold apartment. Apartment owner in her cross-complaint sought reformation of contract to require payment when building was sold.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Walter J. Aries and another against Ella B. Squires, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Harry A. Finkenstein, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This is an action by Walter J. and Ciella M. Aries to recover the sum of $7,000 alleged to be due from the defendant, Ella B. Squires, by virtue of an agreement entered into by the parties on February 15, 1926. The plaintiffs recovered judgment as prayed for, and from the said judgment defendant appeals.

The agreement, above referred to, recites that Ella B. Squires, the defendant herein, is the owner of the Dresden Apartments, 1919 West Seventh street, Los Angeles. That the plaintiffs Aries, herein, are lessees of said apartments and are in arrears for rent due thereon in the sum of $3,550, which they are unable to pay. That, for the purpose of settling their business difficulties without resorting to the courts, it is provided in said agreement that the Aries will execute a bill of sale for all of the furniture, furnishings, and equipment belonging to them and located in said apartment, and will assign and surrender the lease thereof to the defendant, Squires, and also assign and surrender to the said defendant, Ella B. Squires, certain promissory notes received by them from tenants of said apartments for rent past due. As a consideration therefor the defendant Squires agreed as follows: "the party of the first part (Squires) agrees that she will pay the said second parties (Aries) their heirs, administrators, and assigns, the sum of Seven Thousand ($7,000.00) Dollars in gold coin of the United States, at the time and when she sells the Dresden Apartments, Los Angeles, California."

The present dispute between the parties arises out of the proper interpretation to be given to the paragraph, above quoted, as to the time when the payment of the $7,000 falls due. Under the evidence admitted by the court, it appears that the plaintiffs Aries have performed all of the conditions required by said contract, and that the defendant has resold all of the furniture, furnishings, and equipment conveyed to her by the plaintiffs, also that she has leased the apartment house for a period of five years, but that she still retains title to the real estate and apartment house itself. It is claimed by the appellant that the clause of the contract requiring her to pay the plaintiffs $7,000 fixes the time of payment as of the date she sells the real estate and apartment house thereon. It is the claim of the respondent that the time referred to for the payment was upon the sale of the furniture, furnishings, and equipment, and the leasing of the apartment house.

[1, 2] We think it does not require a citation of authorities to demonstrate that the clause of the contract quoted is ambiguous. The appellant owned the apartment house itself. The respondents had no interest therein except a leasehold. They also owned the furniture, etc. The date of payment of the purchase price depends upon a sale by the defendant of either the real estate and improvements, or a sale of the apartment house furnishings and the lease. To give the contract the construction contended for by appellant would be to postpone the date of payment of the sum due respondents according to the caprice or whim of the appellant, or if she never sold the real property then the amount would never become due. This would be an absurd construction. The evidence admitted by the court to explain this ambiguous clause of the contract was conflicting. The respondents' evidence was to the effect that there was no mention of the time of the sale of the building. The reference was to a sale of the property conveyed by them. The evidence of the appellant was to the effect that it was specifically stated in the presence of the respondents that the amount was to be paid when the building itself was sold. The court having construed the evidence in the light favorable to the respondents' contention, this court is bound thereby.

That the appellant and her counsel have not always entertained their present view that the contract, as to the time of payment, is unambiguous, appears from a cross-complaint filed in this action to reform the above-quoted clause of the contract. It is alleged in said cross-complaint that said clause was intended to mean that she would pay the second parties the sum of $7,000 when she sold the said building, and she prays a reformation for that purpose.

[3] Complaint is also made that the court failed to find upon the issues of her cross-complaint. The court found that the payment was due when the appellant sold the property which had been conveyed to her by the respondents, and not at the time of the sale of the building. We are of the opinion that such findings cover the issues raised by the cross-complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

Wills ⇨ 166(8).

Evidence required finding that will of 70-year old testator, making sons residuary legatees, was not obtained by sons' undue influence.

The proponents of the will who were residuary legatees thereunder were the children of a former marriage, while the will was contested by the deceased's widow who received under it only her rights to community property and a bequest of $100. The property left to the children was that which the mother of those children and decedent had accumulated. The evidence failed to disclose any abuse of confidential relations, though one son had deceased taken to his house, and his wife called the lawyers who drew the will.

STURTEVANT, J.

James C. Peacock died at his home in Berkeley on the 11th day of October, 1928. Thereafter Loyal R. Peacock presented to the probate court a document purporting to be the last will and testament of the deceased, and applied to have the same admitted to probate. Shortly thereafter Zilpha N. Peacock, as the surviving wife of the decedent, filed a contest. The contest was answered and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the contestant, and an order was entered refusing to admit the will to probate. From that order the proponents have appealed and have brought up a typewritten record.

The second amended contest was based on two grounds, unsoundness of mind and undue influence. At the conclusion of the proceedings had in taking the evidence, all issues were abandoned by the contestant except that of undue influence. The proponents assert that there was no evidence introduced to sustain the allegations of undue influence. In support of this assertion they print upwards of 150 pages of the testimony. In reply the contestant summarizes the case and calls to our attention such portions of the record as, according to her contention, tend to support the order complained of.

The decedent had been married twice. By his first wife he had two sons, Loyal and Albert, who are the proponents of the will. During the life of the first wife, the decedent had become the owner of a house and lot in Oakland of the value of $4,000 and which was free from incumbrances. Later they acquired a lot at 5822 Shattuck avenue in Oakland. The decedent built a house on that lot and installed furniture therein. Thereafter he married the contestant, and, at the time of the marriage, he owed the Oakland Bank $3,500. That would be about April 23, 1924, the date of the marriage. At that time the decedent was an engineer on one of the ferryboats, in the employment of the Southern Pacific Company. The contestant was at the time of her marriage a widow. She had three daughters and one son. At times the contestant was engaged in doing restaurant work. On February 1, 1928, the decedent retired from active duty and commenced to draw a pension. The earnings of both went towards the payment of household expenses and the debt to the bank. At the time of his death the balance owing to the bank was $2,050. By the terms of the purported will the decedent directed that the court of competent jurisdiction might ascertain and determine the amount of community property of himself and the contestant, and that said court should confirm to the contestant her rights therein. He also bequeathed to her $100. All of the rest of his property he bequeathed to his two sons, Loyal and Albert, share and share alike.

In support of the claim that the will was made under undue influence, the contestant calls to our attention that at the time it was made the testator was seventy years of age, suffering from many illnesses, very weak physically and enfeebled; that Loyal R. Peacock, during the latter days of his father's life, attended to his father's business, cashed his father's checks, kept his father's papers, and stood in a confidential relationship to him; that prior to the execution of the will Loyal admitted that his father had spoken of making a will and had discussed some property matters with him; that whenever Loyal visited his father during the last illness the attitude of the testator towards the contestant was materially affected and changed; that during the time that the will was signed the contestant was not present, but was absent engaged in her work; that the decedent did not directly employ the attorney who drew the will, but the attorney was called by the wife of Loyal; that the attorney, upon being called, went to Loyal's house and there met the decedent and discussed the provisions of the purported will; that said discussion occurred in the presence of Loyal; that at no time did the decedent discuss any matters with the attorney except in the presence of one or both of the decedent's sons; that at the time of the execution of the will, although the weather was fair and the decedent lived only one block away, Loyal called at the decedent's house and took him in an automobile to Loyal's house; that the decedent was so removed for the purpose of executing the will in the absence of decedent's wife and without her knowledge, and when she returned to her home immediately thereafter she found her husband in an extremely exhausted physical condition; that at the time the decedent signed the will Albert Peacock was also present; that after Mr. Fontaine had prepared the will he took it to the house of Loyal and there it was signed in the presence of both Loyal and Albert; that there is a conflict in the testimony as to what Loyal's wife said to Mr. Fontaine when telephoning him to call on the deceased. Mrs. Peacock, Jr., testified that she did not state the purpose of the call. Mr. Fontaine testified that she did; that Loyal paid Mr. Fontaine for drawing the will, that is, Loyal delivered the money to Mr. Fontaine, but the money had been given to him by the decedent with directions to send it to Mr. Fontaine; and finally it is asserted by the contestant that the will itself is unnatural because it gives to the widow only what the law would give to her as her share in the community property, plus the sum of $100, and then gives all the rest of the estate to the decedent's two sons.

Having called to our attention these matters, the contestant cites Estate of Gallo, 61 Cal. App. 163, 214 P. 496, and quotes extensively therefrom. However, that authority is not in point. The court was there discussing an order granting a motion for a nonsuit made at the end of the contestant's case. The facts in that case were very different from the facts in this case. In the instant case the decedent left to his only children the property which the mother of those children and the decedent had accumulated. In the Gallo Case the decedent left the bulk of her estate to a mere stranger, a small portion of her estate to her son, and practically nothing to her adopted daughter. Furthermore, the report of that case recites verbatim many facts showing or tending to show undue influence. It is statutory law in this state that it will be presumed that persons are innocent of crime or wrong; that prior transactions have been fair and regular; that the ordinary course of business has been followed, and that the law has been obeyed. Conceding with entire liberality that Loyal stood in the confidential relation to his father; that by the terms of the will a gift was made to him, and that on the hearing of the contest it was his duty to fully disclose all of the facts, the record shows that these things were done. The proponents called and examined fifteen or twenty witnesses. Among them they called and examined and turned over for cross-examination Mrs. Peacock, Jr., the individual that the decedent asked to inquire about an attorney; Mrs. Taylor, the individual of whom Mrs. Peacock made her inquiry; Mr. Fontaine, the attorney recommended by Mrs. Taylor and summoned over the telephone by Mrs. Peacock, Jr.; both of the sons who were present when the will was executed; both of the witnesses who witnessed the will, together with many others. Having done so it is freely submitted that the contestant is unable to and does not cite any parts of the record which contain any fact or facts proving or tending to prove undue influence. It is very clear that the proponents have met any burden whatever that may rest on them, and, having done so, that there is nothing in the record supporting the order.

The order is reversed.

McKENZIE, Justice pro tem.

This is an action instituted by plaintiff to recover damages from defendant for injuries alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff by reason of the negligence of defendant in operating an automobile. Judgment was in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $12,750.31. Defendant urges several grounds for reversal: First, that defendant's acts were not the proximate cause of the accident; second, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; third, that special damages were included without having been pleaded; and, fourth, that the award is excessive. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, but no point is made of that.

The accident in question occurred at the intersection of Alisal and Soledad streets in the city of Salinas on the 11th day of February, 1924. Soledad street runs north and south, and Alisal street crosses it at right angles. Immediately before the collision defendant was driving his car on Soledad street in a northerly direction south of Alisal street, and plaintiff was driving his laundry truck on Alisal street in an easterly direction, west of Soledad street. The cars collided with great force in the northeast quarter of the street intersection, the front of plaintiff's car striking about the center of the left side of defendant's machine. The defendant was "knocked out," but suffered only minor injuries, but the plaintiff suffered very severe injury, probably caused by the overturning of his vehicle.

As to the facts relating to and surrounding the collision, the plaintiff himself was the only witness in his behalf. His testimony in this particular is fully and fairly covered in the following condensation: That at about 9 o'clock on the morning of February 11, 1924, he was driving a Ford laundry truck about the center of the south half of Alisal street; that he was proceeding in an easterly direction; that he was traveling at a speed of 18 miles an hour at all times until the collision occurred at about but a little beyond the center of the intersection; that at all times he kept on the right side of the highway until just before the collision, when, at about the center of the intersection, he turned to the left to avoid striking defendant's machine; that at no time did he sound the horn or apply the brakes; that the lot at the southwest corner of the intersection is vacant, and one driving a car easterly on Alisal street west of Soledad street can see a car being driven northerly on Soledad street south of Alisal street; that when plaintiff first saw defendant's car he (plaintiff) was a distance of (plaintiff's testimony ranges from 20 to 60 feet, but we will state the figures of his counsel as stated in his brief) 20 to 30 feet from the curb line of Soledad street, and that at that time defendant's car was on Soledad street going north at the speed of 40 miles per hour and distant 60 or 70 feet from Alisal street; that from a time previous to plaintiff's first seeing defendant's car there was no traffic in or near said intersection other than the cars driven by plaintiff and defendant. As to what plaintiff did after he saw defendant's car, we quote from the transcript of his testimony:

"Q. And after having noticed that car as you have described, what did you next do? A. Well, I drove right on into the intersection and looked to my left to see if there were any cars coming from the other direction.

"Q. At approximately what speed were you traveling, as you drove into the intersection? A. Along about 18 miles an hour.

"Q. Who reached the intersection first, you with your car or the car approaching on Soledad street? A. I reached the intersection first.

"Q. Was it before you entered the intersection or afterward you looked to your left along Soledad street? A. Well, I looked just like this at the street out of the door.

"Q. Well, was it before or after you entered the intersection you looked to your left? A. Along about the time I was at the curb, probably 10 feet before I got into it.

"Q. When did you next see the car that was approaching on Soledad street? A. The car on the right?

"Q. Yes, the car on your right. A. Well, I got into the intersection and supposing that I had the right of way, of course, I kept on going, and I turned to the left and looked and then turned back to the right, and I saw him coming and of course I supposed I had the right of way and seeing him coming then, I knew he was not going to give me the right of way.

"Q. Then what did you do? A. To keep him from hitting right amidships—that is where he was headed—I turned my car right like that and about that time he just dashed right in front of me and we collided right in the street."

The foregoing is a complete summary of all plaintiff's testimony relating to how the accident happened, except what might be inferred from the testimony of three witnesses who described the positions of the respective cars when they saw them some time after the accident. We have read this testimony and do not deem it of sufficient importance to be embodied herein.

The defendant testified that he was a physician and had resided at Salinas eleven years; that his residence was a block and 75 feet distant from the intersection and that on the morning in question he left his home in his car and was traveling north on Soledad street in the direction of Alisal street; that the morning was clear and frosty; that he had been driving automobiles for five years previous to the accident; that he was driving at the rate of 15 miles per hour and was on the right half of the street at all times; that when he approached the intersection he saw a man walking easterly along the northerly line of the intersection; that he honked his horn once and the man paid no attention, he honked the second time and the man looked in his direction and then got on the curb; that the defendant was about the center of the intersection when the man got on the curb; that he never saw plaintiff's machine or any other machine in or approaching the intersection until he felt an impact; that the car was an open car and the curtains were up on the left side and the curtains had rather small lights in them; that Mr. Stockdale was the man he saw walking on the street, and when he saw him he slowed down a little.

Ernest Stockdale, a witness for defendant, testified that he resided at Salinas in 1924 and that he was a horse-breaker employed by the McCrary Estate Company of San Benito county; that on the morning of February 11, 1924, he was at the intersection of Alisal and Soledad streets when an accident occurred, and at the time of the impact he was at the northeast corner of the intersection; that when he was halfway across the street some one honked a horn, when he had taken two or three steps the horn was honked again, and he looked around and saw two cars in the intersection, one car was headed north and the other east; the car that gave him the horn was the car headed north; the two cars came together in the northeast corner of the intersection; the car headed east was fully on the north side of Alisal street; that he saw the cars before they collided; that before the cars came together the laundry truck was running parallel with Alisal street; the automobile was going about 15 miles per hour, the laundry truck was going fast—"I do not know how fast."

Charles Rejewski, a witness called by defendant, testified that he had resided at Salinas for nine years; that he was a florist and had worked at Salinas Nursery for eight years; that at the time of the accident he was driving a florist's car westerly on Alisal street, distant 125 feet east of Soledad street; that he saw the machines before the impact, Dr. Wiley's car was just entering the intersection when he first saw it and it was traveling at a speed of 14 or 15 miles per hour; that he first saw the laundry truck when it pulled out from behind an oil truck that was coming east on Alisal street about 100 feet west of Soledad street; and that the laundry truck, when it pulled out from behind the oil truck, took the north side of Alisal street and continued on the same side of the street until the impact, and that the laundry truck from the time it passed the oil truck until the time of the impact was traveling at a speed of from 25 to 30 miles per hour.

George Fiese, a witness for defendant, testified that he was just a laborer working for the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and had resided at Salinas for 30 years; that on February 11, 1924, he was engaged in driving an oil truck for the Union Oil Company; that on the morning of that day he was driving an oil truck easterly on Alisal street about 300 feet west of Soledad street; that the laundry truck passed him and in passing him pulled over to the north side of the street and continued on that side of the street going at a speed of about 25 miles per hour, until it struck Dr. Wiley's car; that he saw Wiley's car approaching the intersection, which was traveling at a speed of 15 miles per hour; that from the time the laundry truck passed him until the impact he saw both cars at all times; and that Dr. Wiley's car entered the intersection first and that the laundry truck and Dr. Wiley's car came together at right angles in the northeast corner of the intersection.

In rebuttal, Walter Wallace, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he was at the scene of the accident shortly after it occurred and that he did not see there Mr. Stockdale, Mr. Rejewski, or Mr. Fiese, nor did he see an oil truck or florist's wagon, and that he was acquainted with Mr. Stockdale and slightly acquainted with Mr. Rejewski; that he did not know Mr. Fiese. On cross-examination this witness said he would not swear those men or the trucks were not there, but he did not see them. "During the excitement they might have been there and I would not notice them.

Al. Wallace, a son of the preceding witness, testified that the family were at breakfast when they heard the crash; that his father went to the scene of the accident first, and after his father returned he went there and had no recollection of seeing Mr. Stockdale, Mr. Rejewski, or Mr. Fiese, nor did he have any recollection of seeing the oil truck or florist's truck. On cross-examination this witness stated that these men and trucks might have been there and he did not see them. "There was a crowd there, I cannot remember anyone I saw there."

Mrs. Wallace, the wife and mother, respectively, of the two preceding witnesses, was a witness for plaintiff and testified that Mr. Stockdale did not, on the morning of the accident, call at her home and inquire from her concerning her son, Al. Wallace. Stockdale in his direct examination had testified he did.

[1] On this evidence the trial court found that the defendant was guilty of negligence. This finding was justified from Dr. Wiley's own testimony that he never saw plaintiff's car until after the impact. The court further found that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the collision. To justify this finding the court had to reject the evidence of the three apparently disinterested witnesses that testified they saw the movements of both cars immediately before and at the time of collision. The trial court must have rejected this evidence upon either one of two theories: First, that they were at the scene of the accident, but all three had fantastic minds or were deliberately committing perjury; or, second, that they were not there at all, which brings us again to perjury. That three men, and being the only persons that saw the accident other than the principals, from different walks of life, should meet at a street intersection and each and all have a fantastic mind is beyond the realm of probability. Therefore, we are forced to the conclusion that the trial court determined that Stockdale, Rejewski, and Fiese were perjurers; and that this conclusion was arrived at from the testimony of witnesses concerning persons present at the scene after an accident five years previously, coupled, of course, with plaintiff's somewhat improbable story, viewing it from the record alone, concerning the speed at which Dr. Wiley was driving his car. While the defendant was negligent in not observing traffic, and this might have been caused by his exercising care for the pedestrian in his line of travel, there is, so far as the record shows, no reason why his testimony concerning the speed of his car is not entitled to as much, if not more, credit than that of plaintiff. They were both interested parties, but the defendant was not injured and the plaintiff was very seriously injured, which might tend to interfere with a clear recollection of what happened. Then, too, the burden of proof was upon plaintiff.

[2-4] We must admit that judging from the record alone there is strong appeal in appellant's contention that plaintiff did not establish by a preponderance of evidence that the proximate cause of the accident was owing to defendant's negligence. However, one witness is sufficient to prove any fact in a civil case, and a trial judge who sees and hears the witnesses is in a better position to determine the weight of testimony than a reviewing court. This is the universal rule, and a different rule would be hard, if not impossible, to formulate. Therefore we are constrained to hold that the finding of the trial court to the effect that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the accident cannot be disturbed.

Now we come to appellant's next contention that even if defendant was negligent, the evidence shows that plaintiff was also negligent and for this reason he cannot recover. Before going into a detailed discussion concerning the law of contributory negligence, we feel disposed to make a passing observation concerning a fact that is known by all drivers of motor vehicles, and that includes practically all mankind, and this is: That when motor vehicles are being driven on the highway and have to pass each other at right angles, this condition in itself creates a constant sign of danger, something in a modified degree like approaching a railway crossing; and that if two machines are approaching a street intersection where they are to pass at right angles and the view is unobstructed and there is no other traffic in the intersection or close to it and there is no unusual condition or circumstance arising and both drivers know the speed of the respective cars, there cannot be a collision without fault, more or less, on both sides. If the substance of this general statement be correct, then under our laws as they now stand a judgment for damages cannot be recovered by one who is guilty of contributory negligence simply because he suffered the greater loss or was the more needy or that insurance companies may be involved amongst themselves or otherwise. Appellant claims plaintiff was guilty of negligence that proximately contributed to the injury in two particulars: First, that he entered the intersection at an unlawful rate of speed, and, second, that he did not exercise reasonable care in trying to avoid injury to himself.

[5] Section 113 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113 as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436) provides it shall be unlawful for the driver of a vehicle to drive the same at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways when the driver's view is obstructed. A driver's view shall be deemed to be obstructed when at any time during the last 100 feet of his approach to such intersection he does not have a clear and uninterrupted view of such intersection and of the traffic upon all of the highways entering such intersection for a distance of 200 feet from such intersection. To enable one to comply with this law, he is only concerned with the conditions existing at the two near corners of his approach. It makes no difference so far as he is concerned whether or not the two far corners are vacant or built up, because either way does not affect his vision of the street ahead of him or the one to either side, consequently in the instant case we are only concerned with the northwest and southwest corners of the intersection in question. The evidence is somewhat conflicting, but the court was justified in finding that the southwest corner was unobstructing, and as this southwest corner was a corner that defendant had to heed it was common to both. It is conceded that there was a house on the northwest corner that was obstructing, and the question is: Did this obstruction preclude plaintiff from entering and traversing the intersection at a greater speed than 15 miles per hour? His own testimony is that he was traveling 18 miles per hour. So far as this decision is concerned, it is not necessary to determine whether or not such an obstruction under all circumstances would make it an obstructed intersection. We will confine our discussion to the facts of this particular case. At the start we must keep in mind that the violation of a law or traffic rule should not be interjected into an action of this kind unless there is some causal connection which is generally designated as proximate cause between the act of violation and the injury—in this case the collision. By this we do not mean that a law violation having no causal connection with the injury may not be shown for the purpose of proving some other fact in a case. In this case it is clear that at the time of the accident there was no traffic in or close to the intersection other than that created by the plaintiff and defendant, other than Stockdale's walking across the street, which was without the intersection so far as this case is concerned. If after plaintiff first saw defendant he had given all his attention to the defendant and had not spent most of his time looking for traffic at the other corner, we fail to see how there could be any causal connection between the injury and the obstructing corner. However, as it was an obstructing corner and it did engage a lot of his attention there is a causal connection between the unlawful speed, the obstructing corner and the injury.

Preliminary to considering defendant's second specification of contributory negligence, we must revert to a passing observation made earlier in the opinion about plaintiff's account of what happened before the accident being improbable, so far as the record disclosed; but probable or improbable, it is the evidence and the only evidence that fastened a liability on defendant, and now when the question of contributory negligence is under consideration it must stand now just exactly as it did in the other issue. The improbability of the story consists in the statement that plaintiff saw defendant 60 or 70 feet away coming at a speed of 40 miles per hour on a path that would cross his at right angles, and instead of sounding his horn or applying his brakes or keeping his eyes on the onrushing menace, he spent his time in looking in an opposite direction where there was absolutely no traffic, and relied on his legal right of way. If the fact was that the defendant had seen the car but had paid no attention to the speed at which it was traveling, and it subsequently developed the car was going much faster than he thought, then it would be a question of fact for the jury to determine whether or not plaintiff was negligent in misjudging the speed of the car; but plaintiff knew the car was traveling at the rate of 40 miles per hour, and this fact becomes an established factor in the case when we are called upon to determine as a matter of law if plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

[6, 7] The facts of this case must be viewed in the light of the conditions that existed in 1924: At that time motorcars were not so well equipped with brakes as now and the maximum speed allowed by law under any condition was 35 miles per hour. In this case the plaintiff saw defendant approaching him from an angle at a speed 5 miles in excess of the limit allowed by law, yet he did substantially nothing to avoid disaster to himself or his neighbor. A person may not shut his eyes to a danger, in blind reliance upon the unaided care of another, but must himself use reasonable care to observe the conduct of such other person so far as such conduct may affect his own safety at the time. 19 Cal. Jur. p. 579. Respondent's brief in a faint way intimates that the 40 miles per hour is a stumbling block, and rather suggests that this court may by conjecture substitute a lesser speed. Counsel then resort to the rule, "That one using the highway lawfully has a right to assume that others using the highway will exercise due care and caution and will obey the traffic laws." This rule is not comprehensive enough to apply to the facts of this case; there should be added to it, "unless he as an ordinarily prudent person is warned to the contrary."

[8] One traveling on a public highway has no right to assume that other drivers of mo-

for vehicles are superexpert drivers, or that the machines they are driving are the acme of perfection in mechanical construction. Such person can only assume that the other drivers are reasonably competent and that the machines are reasonably well equipped. Consequently, when we determine the distance in which a moving vehicle may be stopped, we must have in mind the average driver and the average machine. Section 94 of the California Vehicle Act, which was adopted in 1929 (St. 1909, p. 530), has in a somewhat circuitous way determined what are reasonable distances in which to stop moving cars, which are as follows, the first figure of each designation being the speed per hour and the second figure the stopping distance: 10-9.3, 15-20.08, 20-37, 25-58, 30-83.3. At the same rate of progression, 40 miles per hour would call for more than 140 feet. The Society of Automotive Engineers has determined that under favorable conditions the average car traveling 40 miles per hour can be stopped when equipped with four-wheel brakes in 82 feet and with two-wheel brakes in 155 feet. We do not hold that the foregoing figures establish distances that must be observed by persons traveling on highways; they are only given for the purpose of aiding this court in determining when as a matter of law a reasonably prudent person should know that he and others were in great peril and should act accordingly. It is not necessary to fix the exact point or distance on Soledad street where in this instance safety ceased and danger commenced so long as we are satisfied it is well within the danger zone. We therefore hold: That where one driving a motor vehicle at a speed of 18 miles per hour is approaching a street intersection from the west and when he is 20 feet from the intersection he sees an automobile, which he knows is traveling at a speed of 40 miles per hour and shows no sign of slackening speed, approaching the intersection from the south at a point 60 or 70 feet from the intersection, that this situation of itself, as a matter of law, is a sign of danger, and such one is required to exercise reasonable care to avoid injury to himself, notwithstanding he may have the legal right of way.

[9] We are of the opinion that the testimony of plaintiff clearly shows, as a matter of law, that he did not exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury; consequently he was guilty of contributory negligence and is not entitled to recover in this action. This makes it unnecessary to consider the other points raised by appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

This action involves the ownership and right to possession of certain real estate situated in this state.

Plaintiff rests his claim upon a sheriff's deed. Defendants contend that the deed is void and of no effect. Both sides here agree that the sole question presented both in the court below and here is on the validity of said sheriff's deed. The trial court held that the deed was effective to transfer title and entered its decree in favor of plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. At the outset, it may be noted that no claim of irregularity is made as to any proceeding up to the time of the issuance of the writ of execution under which the sheriff's sale was made. In other words, the writ of execution was regularly issued. Appellants contend that in making the sale no legal or sufficient notice thereof was given and that the property sold, consisting of three parcels of real estate, was sold en masse.

The facts are that the sheriff sold the property after having given fifteen days' notice and that the property did consist of three separate pieces and the sale was en masse. Section 692 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so far as material here, provides: "Before the sale of property on execution * * * notice thereof must be given as follows: * * * 3. In case of real property: by posting a similar notice particularly describing the property for twenty days, in three public places of the township or city where the property is to be sold and publishing a copy thereof once a week for the same period. * * *" Section 693, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an officer selling without such notice forfeits $500 to the aggrieved party, in addition to his actual damages.

[1] The entire question here is as to what effect noncompliance with the statutory provision has upon the sale by the sheriff. The question is to be determined by a review of the authorities in point. In the early case of Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 47, 65 Am. Dec. 475, construing similar sections of the Practice Act, we find this statement:

"It has been often decided that the provisions of statutes similar to ours, with respect to levy and notice of sale under execution, are merely directory, and the failure of the officer to comply with the requirements of the law, in this respect, would not vitiate such sale, but the party aggrieved by his neglect is left to his remedy by an action against the officer. * * * This rule is founded in justice and sound policy. * * *

"The intention of the Legislature, where it can be ascertained, must govern in the construction of a statute. This intention should not be taken from a particular section, but from the whole statute. Section 221 of the [Practice] Act provides that the sheriff shall, before a sale of real estate under execution, give notice of the time and place of sale, for twenty days. If the officer neglects to give such notice the following section provides, not that the sale shall be void, but 'an officer selling without the required notice shall forfeit five hundred dollars to the aggrieved party in addition to his actual damages.'"

The only argument advanced by appellants to offset the effect of this ancient ruling is that, under the Practice Act, it was provided that notice shall be given, while under the present Code section, notice as prescribed therein must be given. Without going into the distinction, it is sufficient to note that the reasoning of the cited case has been approved and the rule announced is followed under the code practice. 11 Cal. Jur. 133; Frick v. Roe, 70 Cal. 302, 11 P. 820; Sheehan v. All Persons, 80 Cal. App. 393, 252 P. 337; Williams v. Reed, 43 Cal. App. 434, 185 P. 515.

As stated, a review of the cited authorities will disclose, beyond dispute, that our courts are still committed to the earlier rule. Particularly is this true where the attack is collateral and no showing, other than of defective or insufficient notice, is made. Doubtless much well-directed criticism may appear justifiable and many plausible arguments might be advanced against the holding. But all of these arguments have been weighed and considered and found insufficient to disturb the rule. Obviously, the courts have had in mind the harmful results following an easy voiding of judicial sales and have decided that mere deviation from the statute would not bring such results, unless by the statute itself so provided. And, further than this, the courts have always lent a willing ear to the debtor who could show fraud or unfairness in the sale of his property, and where a proper showing has been made full relief has followed. No such showing is attempted here.

[2] It is somewhat weakly urged that there has been shown a gross inadequacy of consideration. This is not wholly true. The value of the property was between $5,000 and $6,000 and the said property was incumbered to the extent of $4,300, which, with accrued interest, amounts to now practically $5,400. The sale price was $412. Hence, it is obvious that the claim of gross inadequacy cannot be maintained.

[3] The final contention of the appellant is that the sheriff's sale was void by reason of the fact that three parcels of real property were sold en masse instead of separately, as required by section 694, Code of Civil Procedure.

Appellant makes no showing other than that such was the method of sale. No evidence was offered nor is argument made that any different price could or would have been obtained, nor is there any attempt to show any injury to appellant in the slightest degree. The mortgage referred to covered each lot.

Hudepohl v. Liberty Hill Consol. Water & Mining Co., 94 Cal. 588, 29 P. 1025, 28 Am. St. Rep. 149, holds that a sale of property under execution will not be set aside because sold en masse, unless it is made apparent to the court that a larger sum would have been realized from the sale of the property had it been sold in parcels, or that a sale of less than the whole tract would have brought sufficient to satisfy the writ. In Bechtel v. Wier, 152 Cal. 443, 93 P. 75, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 549, the same rule was followed.

In Sargent v. Shumaker, 193 Cal. 122, at page 132, 223 P. 464, 468, we find the following language: "The sale en masse of several known lots or parcels, in the absence of special circumstances to justify it, is clearly an irregularity; but this court has frequently held that such an irregularity will not justify vacating the sale, in the absence of an affirmative showing that it operated to the actual injury of the owner," citing Hudepohl v. Liberty Hill, etc., Co., supra; Meux v. Trezevant, 132 Cal. 487, 489, 64 P. 848; Summerville v. March, 142 Cal. 554, 76 P. 388, 100 Am. St. Rep. 145.

On the showing here made, which is nil, we see no grounds to set aside the sale in question.

Judgment affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an appeal from an order refusing to grant a motion to change the place of trial from the city and county of San Francisco to Mendocino county.

[1] The plaintiff's husband, William F. Coen, and Paul E. Falk were traveling in an automobile in a southerly direction from Healdsburg toward San Francisco. Stanley Watson was traveling in a Buick automobile along the same road northerly from San Francisco to Healdsburg. At a point about three miles south of Healdsburg, the automobiles collided. Plaintiff's husband and Falk were both killed. In her complaint the plaintiff sued Watson and Anita Falk and First Doe, Second Doe, and Third Doe. Among other things she alleged "that on the third day of September, 1928, defendant Anita Falk was the owner of a certain Ford automobile which was on said day being driven by one Paul B. Falk, who was then and there the agent of said Anita Falk and acting within the scope of his employment by her; and that said Anita Falk is a resident of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California." The defendant Anita Falk has never been served. The defendant Stanley Watson appeared and answered and filed the formal papers asking for a change of venue. When the motion for a change of venue came on for hearing, the defendant offered in support of his motion the plaintiff's complaint, Watson's answer, his demand for change of venue, his notice of motion for change of venue, his affidavit of merits, the deposition of Anita Falk, and the deposition of plaintiff. The plaintiff offered in opposition to the motion her complaint. From the foregoing papers the following facts appear and are not contradicted: At the time of the accident, plaintiff and William F. Coen were husband and wife residing in San Francisco. The husband was a special policeman. Prior to the accident Anita Falk and Paul B. Falk had been husband and wife, but she had applied for a divorce and had obtained an interlocutory decree eight months prior to the accident. Paul B. Falk was by occupation a truck driver for the Acme Ice Cream Company in San Francisco. From the time Mrs. Falk applied for a divorce she had had no business relations whatever with her husband. Mrs. Falk never owned a Ford car nor any other kind of an automobile. Whether business or pleasure had taken Mr. Falk and Mr. Coen from San Francisco to Healdsburg does not appear. Mr. Coen was the owner of a Ford car at the time of his death, and afterwards the plaintiff made no inquiry to ascertain where that Ford car was. At the time of the accident Mrs. Falk was at Healdsburg on a visit. She knew nothing of the trip being made by Mr. Falk and Mr. Coen until the morning after the accident. At the time of the accident, Mrs. Coen was in San Francisco, and of her own knowledge knew nothing of the facts concerning the accident. When her complaint was framed, she had not communicated with any witness or witnesses, and knew nothing of the facts concerning the accident. The defendant Stanley Watson is and was at all times a resident of Mendocino county. From the foregoing it clearly appears that Anita Falk was improperly joined as a defendant, and that she was made a defendant solely for the purpose of having the action tried in the city and county of San Francisco, where she resides. Under these circumstances her residence should not have been considered in determining which is the proper county for the trial of the above-entitled action. Code Civ. Proc. § 395.

[2] The allegations of agency contained in the plaintiff's complaint were but conclusions of law. They did not create any conflict as to the facts hereinabove recited. Petrich v. Francis, 83 Cal. App. 72, 256 P. 444; 1 Cal. Jur. 669, 670. There was not, therefore, any evidence in opposition to the motion, and it should have been granted.

The order denying the motion is reversed.

HAMELIN v. FOULKES et al.★
Civ. 6847.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
May 2, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 29, 1930.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(2).

Lessee is ordinarily liable for injuries to third person occasioned by defective condition of premises after beginning of lease.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(2).

Liability of lessee to third person injured as result of defective condition of premises arises by virtue of lessee's exclusive possession and control.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(1).

Lessee must exercise ordinary care in maintenance of leased premises to avoid injuring third persons.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(5).

Lessee of store held liable to pedestrian for injuries sustained due to failure to maintain proper covering over sidewalk hydrant box used in connection with store.

Since the hydrant box was solely for the use of the lessee's store, and was connected with the lessee's meter, possession and control thereof passed as an appurtenant to the lease of the store and basement, and the lessee became liable to the pedestrian for injuries by virtue of having such possession and control. Moreover, the lease provided that all repairs to the leased premises should be made at lessee's expense, and that lessee waived right to charge them to lessor, so that lessee's liability might be based on duty to make repairs. The grating used to cover the hydrant box had been broken for more than a month prior to the accident, and lessee had knowledge of this condition during that time, but did nothing to repair it except to report the matter to the lessor.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(5).

As regards lessee's liability to pedestrian falling in hole over sidewalk hydrant box, question whether lessee actually used hydrant was immaterial.

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(5).

That hydrant box connected with store was defectively covered at time of lease did not relieve lessee from using ordinary care to protect public.

7. Damages ⇨132(3).

$10,000 for injury to back and spine, causing pain, numbness, sleeplessness, exhaustion, and permanent incapacity for active work by 30 year old woman earning $150 per month, held not excessive.

At the time of the trial, a little more than two years after the accident, plaintiff had expended $333.50 for treatments, had lost earnings in the sum of $3,450, was unable to stay on her feet more than ten minutes at a time, and was still wearing a surgical corset, and, according to medical testimony, would never be able to undertake vigorous employment, and would have to forego the possibilities of motherhood. Her only hope of recovery was by surgical operation resulting in incapacity for three to five months.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1004(1).

Verdict will not be set aside, unless so plainly excessive as to suggest at first blush passion or prejudice.

9. Damages ⇨62(2).

Injured person is only required to act in good faith and exercise ordinary care respecting treatment.

10. Damages ⇨62(2).

Plaintiff who wrenched her leg was not precluded from recovering damages for injury to back and spine by having failed to secure immediate medical assistance.

Plaintiff obtained medical treatment on discovering that injury amounted to more than a simple wrenching of her leg and spine, and it did not appear from the record that failure to obtain medical treatment immediately aggravated her injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Ethel Hamelin against Edward T. Foulkes, H. C. Swanson, and the H. C. Swanson Company. Plaintiff recovered judgment against the two defendants last named, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

M. Mitchell Bourquin and Ford & Johnson, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

An action for personal injuries was brought by Ethel Hamelin, respondent, against Edward T. Foulkes, H. C. Swanson, and H. C. Swanson Company. A motion for nonsuit was granted as to the defendant Foulkes. The jury rendered a verdict in the sum of $10,000 in favor of respondent and against the appellants H. C. Swanson and H. C. Swanson Company. This appeal is taken from a judgment entered upon the verdict.

Respondent sustained her injuries on the night of November 6, 1926. While alighting from an automobile, she stepped into an open hole in the sidewalk occasioned by failure to maintain a proper covering upon the sidewalk hydrant box in front of appellants' store in the Webster block in the city of Oakland. The defendant Foulkes was the lessor of the premises known as the Webster block. The building consisted of stores on the ground floor, offices above, and basement below. Appellants were the lessees of a portion of the premises described in the lease as that certain store and basement thereof known as 361 and 363 Twelfth street. Each of the stores on the ground floor had its own hydrant box in front of the store. A water hydrant was housed in each hydrant box for use by the tenant in the washing of windows, cleaning of sidewalks, or for whatever purposes the tenant desired. The hydrant in front of each store was connected with the water meter of that store, and each tenant paid his own water bill. The hydrant boxes were cut in the concrete near the curb, and were approximately ten inches square. The openings were covered by iron gratings. The basement referred to in the lease extended under the sidewalk, and appellants' water meter for his store and basement was in the basement almost directly under the sidewalk hydrant box. Sidewalk elevators were used leading to this basement. The only keys to the basement were in control of the appellants, and access to that portion of the building could be had only through appellants' store or through the sidewalk elevators. The lease of these premises was made in August, 1922, and the injuries were sustained by respondent more than four years later. The grating used to cover the hydrant box in front of appellants' store had been broken for more than a month prior to the accident and a portion thereof was being displaced constantly, thus leaving the opening unguarded. Appellants had knowledge of the dangerous condition for a month or more prior to the accident. According to appellants, they reported the matter to the lessor, but did nothing more.

[1-5] On this appeal, numerous specifications of error are urged in the giving and refusing of various instructions. Primarily, the questions involved in these specifications depend upon whether the appellants, as lessees of a portion of the building involved, are liable for the injuries to the respondent. In brief, appellants contend that the liability rested solely upon the lessor and not upon the lessee. With this proposition we cannot agree.

The lessee and not the lessor is ordinarily liable for injuries to third persons occasioned by the negligence of the lessee or due to a defective condition of the premises occurring after the beginning of the lease. Rider v. Clark, 132 Cal. 382, 64 P. 564; 15 Cal. Jur. 737, par. 150. This liability of the lessee exists irrespective of the covenants of the lease relating to repairs, and arises by virtue of his exclusive possession and control of the premises. The right of the lessee to possession and control of the premises is accompanied by a corresponding duty to exercise ordinary care in the use and maintenance of the premises so as not to occasion injuries to third persons. That such liability ordinarily is imposed solely upon the lessee, with certain exceptions hereinafter noted, is conceded by appellants, but it is contended that the general rule applies only where the possession and control of the entire premises passes by the lease and does not apply to the facts in the present case where only a portion of the building was leased and the injury was occasioned by failure to properly maintain a sidewalk hydrant box. There would be much force in this contention if the hydrant box was appurtenant to the entire building rather than to appellants' store, but, where the hydrant box was solely for the use of appellants' store, and was connected with appellants' meter, the lease of the store and basement to appellants passed with it the possession and control of the hydrant box as an appurtenance thereto. "A lease of a part of a building passes with it, as an incident thereto, everything necessarily used with or reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of the part demised. * * * The general rule is that where a store is leased, everything then in use for the store, as an incident or appurtenance, passes by the lease." Runyon v. City of Los Angeles, 40 Cal. App. 383, 387, 180 P. 837, 839.

Much stress is placed upon appellants' testimony to the effect that they did not use the hydrant. However, it is not the actual use which is important, but the right to the exclusive possession and control which governs.

The general rule and the exceptions thereto are stated in Rider v. Clark, supra. The court there said at page 386 of 132 Cal., 64 P. 564, 565: "When the tenant enters into possession under a lease, the landlord parts with all his right to and control over the premises, and is not liable to third persons, except for such defects in the premises or defective construction as existed in the premises when let to the tenant. * * * 'It is well settled that a landlord is not liable for such consequences unless: (1) The nuisance occasioning the injury existed at the time the premises were demised; or (2) the structure was in such a condition that it would be likely to become a nuisance in the ordinary and reasonable use of the same for the purpose for which it was constructed and let, and the landlord failed to repair it; or (3) the landlord authorized or permitted the act which caused it to become a nuisance occasioning the injury.'"

[6] Appellants seek to evade liability under the second exception above noted, claiming that at the time the lease was made the hydrant box was in such condition that it would be likely to become a nuisance in the ordinary and reasonable use thereof. We find nothing in the record which would warrant a finding that at the time the lease was made in 1922 the cover of the hydrant box was in such condition, but, if such were the case, it would only operate to impose a liability upon the lessor. It would not serve to relieve the lessee from the duty imposed upon him by virtue of his possession and control of the premises, nor permit him, after notice of a defective condition, to sit idly by and fail to use ordinary care in protecting the public therefrom.

No reference has been made thus far to the terms of the lease between the lessor and the lessees. It was provided "that all repairs to the demised premises shall be made by and at the sole cost and expense of the lessee and said lessee hereby waives all right to make repairs at the lessor's expense under the provisions of section 1942 of the Civil Code of California." There were other provisions regarding damage, alteration, and repairs, including a provision for restoration by the lessor in the event of partial destruction of the premises with a waiver by the lessee of the provision of section 1932 and subdivision 4 of section 1933 of the Civil Code. Reading the provisions of the lease together, it appears that the duty was upon appellants to make such repairs as were here required. There can be no question under these circumstances concerning the lessee's liability for injuries resulting from the failure to exercise ordinary care in keeping the premises in a safe condition. Runyon v. City of Los Angeles, 40 Cal. App. 383, 390, 180 P. 837. As heretofore stated, the duty is imposed upon the lessee by reason of his exclusive possession and control, and it has been said that "a covenant by the tenant to repair but enforces his liability." 15 Cal. Jur. 740, par. 152.

Considerable space in appellants' briefs is devoted to a consideration of cases which have sustained liability against the lessor under certain circumstances. The question here involved is not whether the lessor might also be held liable, but whether the liability may be properly imposed upon the lessee. This is an appeal from the judgment against the lessee, and is not an appeal from the judgment of nonsuit granted upon motion of the lessor. The duty to use ordinary care to keep the premises in a safe condition having been imposed upon appellants both by virtue of their exclusive possession and control of the premises and also by the covenants of the lease regarding such repairs, we find no prejudicial error in the giving or refusing of any of the instructions relating thereto.

[7, 8] Appellants further contend that the damages were excessive, and that respondent failed to use ordinary care and diligence in procuring medical or surgical treatment following the injury. On November 6, 1926, when respondent's foot went into the open hole, she was thrown to the pavement, and her foot was thereafter pulled from the hole. Her leg was wrenched, but the main injury was to her back and spine, more particularly to the sacroiliac joint. The respondent suffered severe pain, but the injury appeared to consist of nothing more than a severe wrenching. She was immediately put to bed, her back was strapped, and relief was attempted by means of the application of home remedies by her mother and sister. She remained in bed the following day, and on Monday, the second day following the accident, she returned to her work as saleslady. In spite of severe pain and loss of sleep she continued her work under difficulty until December 22, 1926. She had consulted Dr. Boscowitz in the latter part of November or first part of December, and on December 22 he ordered her to bed. She remained in bed for six weeks under treatment consisting of taping and electrical treatments. She then began treatment with Dr. Hitchcock, who ordered her to wear a surgical corset and to have boards under the mattress to keep her firm. In April, 1927, she consulted Dr. Hunkin, who prescribed a different form of corset, the wearing of a higher heel on the right shoe, and gave her certain injections. Thereafter, during the spring of 1927, she sought relief from Dr. Fraser, an osteopath, whose treatment consisted of adjustments and manipulation of the spine, which treatment continued up to the time of trial in November, 1928. At the time of the trial, a little more than two years after the accident, she testified that she was never free from pain; that her legs became numb and cold at frequent intervals; that she did not sleep well at night, and could not eat as well as she formerly did; that she could not sit up all day because she became exhausted; that she could not stay on her feet more than ten minutes at a time, and that she was still wearing a surgical corset, sleeping with boards under the mattress, and wearing specially constructed shoes. She had lost considerable weight due to her suffering. Shortly before the trial she was examined by Dr. Cleary, who testified for respondent, and Dr. Cary, who testified for appellants. Although not entirely in accord in all details, both agreed that respondent had suffered an injury to the sacroiliac joint, the exact nature of which injury was described by the use of X-rays. Dr. Cleary testified that she was absolutely incapacitated for active work, and that he did not consider that treatment by surgical operation or otherwise would completely restore her to capacity. He stated that, after the best could be done for her, she could never undertake any vigorous employment and would have to forego the possibilities of motherhood. The only hope of recovery held out by Dr. Cary, appellants' witness, was by means of a surgical operation which he termed the Smith-Peterson-Cary operation, which surgical procedure would result in incapacity for three to five months. Prior to the injury, the testimony showed that respondent was a woman thirty-one years of age, in good health, and regularly earning $150 per month. At the time of trial, respondent had already expended $333.50 for treatment of her injuries, and had lost earnings in the sum of $3,450. Further facts could be set forth, but a recital of the above testimony is a sufficient answer to appellants' claim that the damages were excessive. It is fundamental that upon appeal the verdict will not be set aside upon this ground, unless it is so plainly excessive as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury.

[9, 10] Nor do we find any merit in the claim that respondent failed to use ordinary care and diligence in procuring medical or surgical treatment following the injury. The exact nature and extent of the injury were unknown to respondent. It should be noted that medical men were not in accord on this subject, nor upon the proper treatment for the relief of her condition. Respondent obtained medical treatment upon discovering that her injury amounted to more than a simple wrenching of her leg and spine, and there is no evidence in the record that the failure to obtain medical treatment at an earlier date had aggravated her injury. The evidence is ample to show that respondent acted in good faith and exercised ordinary care and diligence, which is all that is required. Marshall v. Ransome Concrete Company, 33 Cal. Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by George Singleton and another against the Hartford Fire Insurance Company. Case was dismissed as to the Indian Valley Bank, and judgment rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Percy V. Long and Bert W. Levit, both of San Francisco (S. C. Young, of Quincy, of counsel), for appellant.

Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, and L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff Singleton which was entered upon a directed verdict. The suit was founded upon liability under a fire insurance policy. The defenses were urged that the fire was of incendiary origin caused by the willful acts of the plaintiff Singleton, and that his recovery was barred by willfully rendering a false claim of loss.

The plaintiff Singleton owned a hotel at Crescent Mills, in Plumas county, which he acquired by exchange of properties in 1924. The exchange value of this property was about $6,000. It was alleged the property was worth $8,000 at the time of the fire. The building was somewhat dilapidated. The equipment was poor and the business did not prosper. The hotel building was insured by the appellant April 2, 1926, for $4,000 and the contents for $1,000 additional. The policy conformed to the California statutes of 1909, page 404. It contained this forfeiture clause: "Matters avoiding policy. This entire policy shall be void, (a) if the insured has concealed or misrepresented any material fact or circumstances concerning this insurance or the subject thereof; or, (b) in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss." Section 1. The property was subject to a mortgage of $800 held by the plaintiff Indian Valley Bank, which was paid by the appellant subsequent to the commencement of the action. The cause on the part of the bank was then dismissed.

The building and its contents were completely destroyed by fire which occurred at about noon on September 2, 1926. The respondent promptly made a claim for the full amount of insurance on both the building and its contents. No question is raised on appeal as to the value of the building. The respondent included in his statement of loss, which was sworn to and filed with the defendant, an itemized list of personal property which he claimed was destroyed in the fire. It included no separate valuations of items but merely a claim of loss of an aggregate valuation of $2,000. The number and description of these items of personal property are included in the following statement, to wit:

7 Wood beds	at	$15.00	$ 105.00
23 Iron beds	at	13.50	310.50
30 Springs	at	9.50	285.00
30 Mattresses	at	15.75	472.50
22 Dressers	at	22.50	495.00
3 Bureaus	at	24.50	73.50
52 Chairs	at	3.50	182.00
11 Tables	at	18.00	198.00
4 Rugs	at	25.00	100.00
4 Sofas	at	36.00	144.00
10 Iron stools	at	4.50	45.00
Dishes and cooking utensils			300.00
50 Pillows	at	2.00	100.00
36 Sheets	at	2.25	81.00
6 Blankets	at	8.50	51.00
36 Pillow cases	at	.50	18.00
4 Quilts and blankets	at	4.50	18.00

Replacement value ...	$2,978.50
Depreciation	1,490.00

Sound value and loss	$1,488.50
----------------------	------------

Testimony was adduced to the effect that a substantial number of the foregoing items were not included in the building at the time of the fire. There was also evidence of circumstances tending to indicate that the respondent may have set fire to the building, which issues should have been submitted to the jury. At the close of the evidence, however, the court directed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff, which it accordingly did. A judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of his insurance, less the sum of $800, which had been previously paid to the bank in settlement for the mortgage which it held. From this judgment the appeal was perfected.

At the trial, the respondent was the only witness called in his own behalf. With the exception of a single item of the personal property, he persisted in testifying that he did not know the separate value of any of the articles of hotel equipment, but said that the agent, Bacher, who wrote the policy, listed the personal property at a total valuation of $2,000 and that "they were worth $2,000 to me there in the hotel."

Substantial evidence was adduced in support of the defense that the fire was caused by the incendiary acts of the appellant and that his recovery on the policy was barred by subsequent false, fraudulent, and exaggerated sworn statements with respect to the articles of property which were burned, and their valuation.

The following circumstances which appear in the record sufficiently support the foregoing defenses to have required the submission of these issues to the jury notwithstanding the fact that they were contradicted by the respondent. A directed verdict was therefore erroneous.

[1] The appellant was precluded from proving the value of the hotel building on the theory that the insurance company had waived its right to question the value which was asserted in the claim of loss by its failure to dissent therefrom by written notice to the insured within twenty days from the receipt of the proof of loss, as required by the policy. The policy, however, contained the further provision that: "This company shall not be held to have waived any provision or condition of this policy or any forfeiture thereof, by assenting to the amount of the loss or damage. * * *" Evidence of the value of the building was competent not for the purpose of reducing the amount of insurance to be paid thereon, but to determine whether the policy had become void on account of the incendiary acts of the insured. He testified that the building and its contents were originally procured by him at an exchange valuation of only $6,000. Exchange valuations are usually exorbitant. The evidence indicates that the building had deteriorated and was sadly in need of repairs and that the business had not prospered. Assuming that the evidence might have shown the building to have been worth much less than the amount for which it was insured, it would have furnished a motive for the fire. This evidence should not have been excluded. In support of the court's ruling upon Victoria Park Co. v. Continental Insurance Co. of New York, 39 Cal. App. 347, 178 P. 724, and other similar cases. But in none of these cases was the issue of an incendiary fire or fraudulent declarations of values involved. In the case above cited it is said: "There was no issue in the case as to the fire having occurred as alleged by the plaintiffs."

[2, 3] In the present case the witness Joe Palazzi testified that within a few months prior to the fire the plaintiff twice tried to persuade him to burn the hotel. The first occasion was about a month or two before the property was insured. Palazzi said the plaintiff came to his cabin near by and offered to pay him $200 if he would burn the hotel. He testified that Singleton said: "You go in the hotel. * * * I will put insurance on that building * * * and then * * * we will burn him down; if you don't want to do it, I will get somebody else. * * * I take five gallon coal oil and I will soak all of the carpet on the second floor. * * * I will let you know when I am ready to go, and * * * you can take your stuff away. * * * I will (then) build for you a little restaurant on the corner of my lot. * * *

"That (conversation occurred) a month or two before (I moved, which was in March)." As a matter of fact the hotel and its furnishings were subsequently insured April 2, 1926, for $5,000. The record discloses the existence of no previous insurance on the property. Palazzi further testified that in June after the property had been insured, the plaintiff again returned and renewed his offer to pay him $200 to burn the property. In a long cross-examination the witness strenuously adhered to his story. There is evidence to support the theory that the fire was in fact started in the upper story of the hotel, which was unoccupied. The plaintiff had been absent for a week or ten days prior to the fire and had just returned a day or two before that occurrence. In spite of the fact that he denied having been in the alleyway behind the hotel at any time "for half a month" prior to the fire, the witness Mary Esani, who lived back of the hotel, testified that she saw him just a few minutes before the fire going into the hotel from the alleyway in the rear "through the fence," which was attached to the woodshed. This was corroborated by a witness by the name of Rose Lucier, who said: "He went right through the gap of the fence, right in front of my place there, to go in through his back yard." Within a few moments after he entered his premises from the rear smoke was seen coming through the roof of the hotel toward the rear of the building. After this Mrs. Lucier testifies that "about half an hour or twenty minutes" after she saw him leaving the hotel to go up the street, he returned and she says, "When I saw him peeking through between the houses, that was after the fire." Mr. William Kingdon, Jr., who was a clerk in a store across the street from the hotel, testified that about a month before the fire he saw a truck standing in the back yard of the hotel "right close to Mr. Singleton's bedroom," upon which Mr. Westover, a truckman who was then stopping at the hotel, had a number of small boxes. He said, "It was somewhere about a month before (the fire), and it was along in the morning when it was being loaded." There is evidence that during the burning of the building, while many of the neighbors were frantically working to control the fire and to save some of the contents of the building, the plaintiff stood calmly by, neatly dressed and apparently unconcerned. Mr. Kingdon, Sr., whose store across the street from the hotel was also destroyed by fire, testified that he rushed across to assist in putting out the fire, and, seeing Singleton calmly standing there, accused him of burning the property. He said: "I advanced towards him and called him a vile name and accused him of setting the fire for the purpose of bettering himself and not paying any attention to what became of the rest of us. * * * As soon as I accused him of setting the fire, he backed away from me and acted as if he was afraid of me." Shortly after the fire the plaintiff visited the garage of John Haker, who testified that he seemed nervous and agitated. He said, "He appeared rather nervous. * * * He was rolling a cigaret, his hands were shaking." Singleton owned an automobile, which was not insured and which he usually kept in a garage adjoining the hotel. He testified that about a month or six weeks before the fire this car had been taken by him to Woodland, where his wife was then living. Upon the contrary, however, Mr. Kampschmidt, an automobile mechanic, testified that he had worked on that machine at Crescent Mills shortly before the fire. He said, "I am pretty fairly positive that it was about a week or ten days before the fire." In conflict with the itemized statement of the articles of hotel furniture and their valuation, which the plaintiff had previously sworn he had lost in the fire as above specified, a number of witnesses, including the barber who rented a couple of rooms in the building and had charge of the hotel in the absence of the owner, testified to an absence of furniture and equipment which is at startling variance with the plaintiff's claim of loss. As a matter of illustration, instead of 30 mattresses, which he claimed to have lost, there is evidence that the hotel contained but 13 which were of any value; instead of 22 dressers, one witness says there were but 3; there is evidence which tends to reduce the number of 50 pillows claimed to have been lost to 12; 36 sheets were reduced to 15; and 36 pillow cases to 15.

The foregoing state of the record conclusively indicates that the issues as to the cause of the fire and respecting the alleged fraudulent misrepresentation as to the personal property which was claimed to have been destroyed by fire, should have been submitted to the jury. The liability of the insurance company depended upon the solution of these questions.

[4] A direction to the jury to render a verdict on a question of fact, where there is substantial evidence to justify a contrary decision thereon, is an invasion of the province of the jury and in conflict with the constitutional inhibition against a trial judge charging the jury on matters of fact. 24 Cal. Jur. 916, § 164; Umsted v. Scofield Eng. Const. Co., 203 Cal. 224, 263 P. 799.

[5-7] Upon a motion for a directed verdict every reasonable inference from the evidence should be resolved in favor of the party against whom the application is made. When reasonable minds may differ as to the effect of the evidence upon the solution of an issue of fact, the application to direct a verdict should be denied. Boyle v. Coast Imp. Co., 27 Cal.

App. 714, 151 P. 25; Robertson v. Weingart, 91 Cal. App. 715, 726, 267 P. 741; 33 C. J. 130, § 863. From time immemorial the courts have jealously guarded the rights of juries to pass upon facts. An application to direct a verdict upon facts should be granted with caution, and only when it is clear there is no substantial evidence to support a contrary finding. In the present case it may not reasonably be said there is no substantial evidence to support the appellant's contentions that (1) the fire was of incendiary origin, and (2) false statements of the property alleged to have been lost were willfully made. These were questions for the jury to determine. This evidence was material.

[8] Under the provisions of the policy in the present case, willful destruction of the property on the part of the insured, or willful and false statements made by him on his proof of loss with intent to defraud the insurance company, will totally avoid the policy and relieve the insurer from all liability thereunder. Pedrotti v. American Nat. Fire Ins. Co., 90 Cal. App. 668, 266 P. 376; 33 C. J. 19, § 667; 6 Cooley's Br. on Ins., p. 4933; 7 Cooley's Br. on Ins., p. 5858.

The judgment is reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM.

Upon petition for rehearing it is ordered that column 2, lines 24 to 31 of 287 P. 530, be stricken out, and in lieu thereof that the following be inserted: "The respondent included in his statement of loss, which was sworn to and filed with the defendant, an itemized list of personal property which he claimed was destroyed in the fire. It included no separate valuations of items but merely a claim of loss of an aggregate valuation of $2,000. The number and description of these items of personal property are included in the following statement, to-wit:"

[9] The petition for rehearing is chiefly addressed to a general discussion of the weight of evidence and to a criticism of the character of the witness Palazzi, asserting that his testimony is therefore unworthy of belief. These are questions solely for the consideration of the jury and conclusively illustrate the error of directing a verdict. This court does not decide that the plaintiff burned the property or falsely swore to the value or character of the property destroyed. Circumstances disclosed by the record are marshaled in the opinion merely to indicate there was substantial evidence to support the defendant's claims and that it was therefore error to take these issues from the jury and direct a verdict.

The petition for a rehearing is therefore denied.

Jack Hall and Harry Russell were found guilty of first-degree robbery after pleading guilty of robbery, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J.

Appellants were charged by information with the crime of robbery. Each defendant pleaded guilty of the offense charged, and they were sentenced to the state's prison for the period prescribed by law. On the date set for the pronouncement of judgment, a hearing was had by the trial court under the provisions of section 1192 of the Penal Code, to determine whether the defendants were guilty of robbery in the first or second degree, as the charging language of the information did not allege facts sufficient to bring the offense definitely within the scope of the statute defining first-degree robbery.

It appeared on the hearing that they had entered the office of a Dr. Young, robbed him of the sum of $206 and other personal property. After committing the crime they tied their victim with a rope and departed. Appellant Russell was captured a few moments later, and a revolver and black-jack were found upon his person, together with the stolen property. Appellant Hall was arrested shortly thereafter, and he admitted to the arresting officers that he participated in the robbery, and, further, that he was armed at the time with an automatic pistol loaded with seven bullets. Both defendants denied that they had exposed any deadly weapon during the commission of their act. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court found both defendants guilty of robbery in the first degree.

[1] Appellants claim that the trial court committed error in finding that they were armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon in perpetrating the offense to which they pleaded guilty, and that the crime committed by them was therefore robbery in the second degree. This contention is based upon the claim that the weapons were not exposed to the victim at the time of the perpetration of the crime. As above stated, the evidence showed that both defendants were armed with a revolver, and that, in addition thereto, one of them was possessed of a black-jack. Whether or not they exposed these deadly weapons in order to carry out their criminal act is of no consequence. The fact that they had them in their possession available for immediate use is sufficient to bring the case within the statute. "Armed" with a dangerous weapon means furnished or equipped with weapons of offense or defense. State v. Lynch, 88 Me. 195, 33 A. 978. Section 211a of the Penal Code, which declares that "all robbery which is perpetrated by torture or by a person being armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon, is robbery in the first degree," does not require proof that there was an actual assault upon the person with a deadly weapon, but only that the accused was armed with a dangerous or deadly weapon. People v. Seawright, 72 Cal. App. 414, 237 P. 796.

[2-4] Appellants next complain of the admission in evidence of their extrajudicial confessions for the purpose of ascertaining their degree of crime without a showing first being made that such confessions were free and voluntary. The contention is without merit. No objection was made by appellants to this evidence, but, even assuming that the burden was upon the prosecution to show that the confessions were freely and voluntarily made before they could be properly received, a hearing to determine the degree of crime, after a plea of guilty, is in no sense a trial. People v. Chew Lan Ong, 141 Cal. 550, ★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

75 P. 186, 99 Am. St. Rep. 88. It is a mere investigation to determine the degree of guilt. Moreover, the so-called confessions as to the possession of the deadly weapons are mere admissions of acts of guilty conduct, as they do not include all the elements of the crime. Defendants' pleas of guilty established the corpus delicti. It is only with respect to confessions, which are acknowledgments in express terms by a party in a criminal case, of the truth of the crime charged, that the rule prevails that preliminary proof that they were voluntary must be made before they can be admitted in evidence. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 664, 174 P. 892. There is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by John Gilmour, as executor of the estate of Sarah Gilmour, deceased, against Andrew Gilmour. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Emilio Lastreto, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

[1, 2] The plaintiff, as executor, commenced an action against the defendant to obtain possession of the funds alleged to be the property of Sarah Gilmour, deceased. The defendant answered, and the trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed. The defendant claims to be the absolute owner of the funds by reason of the fact that, as he claims, on the 25th day of April, 1923, the decedent joined him in opening a joint savings account, and that as the survivor he is entitled to the funds in dispute.

In reply the plaintiff asserts that prior to the opening of said account, to wit, on the 22d day of May, 1920, the decedent was adjudged an incompetent person and this plaintiff was appointed guardian of her estate, and that thereupon he qualified and thereafter continued to act and was so acting at the time of the death of the decedent. If the proceedings so appointing him guardian were regular and free from legal objection, the contention of the plaintiff must be sustained. O'Brien v. United Bank & Trust Co. of California (Cal. App.) 279 P. 1048. However, the defendant asserts that the probate court had no jurisdiction to appoint the plaintiff as guardian of the estate of Sarah Gilmour. In this connection the defendant claims that the finding: "That the appointment of John H. Gilmour as guardian of the estate and person of Sarah Gilmour as an incompetent was proper and lawful," is not sustained by the evidence. Some of the undisputed facts are that the guardianship proceeding was commenced by John Gilmour. He presented to the trial court a verified petition. The court ordered citations issued. They were issued, served, and returned. The citation as to Sarah Gilmour was not addressed to her, but there was evidence that the citation was issued and served and that she was present at the hearing of the guardianship proceeding. No objection was made in said proceedings regarding the informality of any paper. In its judgment the trial court recited " * * * coming on regularly to be heard." We will concede the citation was irregular in form. Code Civ. Proc. § 1707. But it was not void. Walker v. Carver, 93 Fla. 337, 112 So. 45, 47. Jurisdiction depended upon the fact of service and not on the return of service. Morrissey v. Gray, 160 Cal. 390, 117 P. 438.

We think it cannot be said that the trial court sitting in probate did not have jurisdiction of the person of Sarah Gilmour when it heard the guardianship proceeding.

The judgment is affirmed.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for indemnity on a fire insurance policy.

The plaintiff is the trustee of the Feather River Pine Mills Company, which operates its lumber mills near Oroville, in Butte county. It was successor to the Hutchinson Lumber Company. In 1923 a trust indenture was executed by the first-mentioned company to the plaintiff, by the terms of which it was provided the trustee should keep the milling property insured for 80 per cent. of its insurable value, payable in the name of the trustee. Marsh & McLennan were general insurance agents. However, for several years this company had acted as brokers for the milling company in procuring its insurance and for this purpose became its agent. Mr. Land, president of the Feather River Pine Mills Company, testified, "They (Marsh & McLennan) were acting as our brokers." They were not the agents of the defendant insurance company. Mr. Hoditz, chief accountant of this brokerage company, testified: "Marsh & McLennan did not * * * act as general agents for the Transcontinental Insurance Company of New York. Marsh & McLennan had nothing to do with the writing or issuance by the Transcontinental Insurance Company of New York of its policy numbered 79,348." Pursuant to directions from the plaintiff, said brokers procured and forwarded to it, September 1, 1927, several policies of insurance on the milling plant, equipment, and stock on hand aggregating a large sum of money. Included among these policies was one numbered 79,348 for $2,500 written by the defendant insurance company. The uniform rate of premiums on these policies had formerly been 1.319 per cent. According to custom a large amount of insurance, such as is involved in this transaction, was apportioned among twenty or more insurance companies so as to divide the liability. This was done in the present instance. The defendant company carried only this one small policy and another one for $6,500, which is not involved in this action. In 1927 the general rate of all such policies was increased by the Pacific Board of Underwriters to 3.14 per cent. The various insurance companies which had executed these policies had charged plaintiff's brokers with the premiums at the increased rate of 3.14 per cent. This increased rate of insurance was charged from July 15, 1927. On September 16, 1927, seventeen of these policies, aggregating the sum of $348,750, including the $2,500 policy which is involved in this action, were returned by the plaintiff to its said agents, Marsh & McLennan, accompanied with a letter which reads in part: "Confirming conversation of yesterday, together with understanding, we advise as follows: You will cancel without charge to us, for either the so-called earned premium or otherwise, the following policies: * * * 79,348, Transcontinental, $2,500. * * * The above policies were handed to you by the writer on yesterday with advice that we would not pay for these policies and would not want any policies issued at figures above our old rate, namely, 1.319."

Instead of procuring the cancellation of these policies, the brokers held them for some three weeks attempting to obtain an adjustment of the rate. In the latter part of September, a representative of the firm of Marsh & McLennan visited the office of the defendant in San Francisco and informed it that the plaintiff refused to accept, among others, policy number 79,348 for $2,500 at the increased rate, and requested the defendant to issue a cover note in lieu of the policy. This the defendant refused to do and declined to cancel the policy until the premium, which was at this time earned, was fully paid. Mr. Morrice, representing the defendant, testified in this regard: "I talked to him about the flat cancellation. * * * Q. And he (Mr. Parry, manager of the defendant company) told you then that they would not cancel the policy flat, didn't he? A. Why yes, he said * * * that they could not cancel the policy flat." The premium on this policy was subsequently paid to the defendant in full on September 27th by the check of Marsh & McLennan, which check was accepted and cashed by the defendant. The policy was retained in the office of plaintiff's brokers. The fire which destroyed the property covered by this policy occurred October 6, 1927. Proof of loss in the total sum of $1,162,504.08 was subsequently duly made. Upon demand of the defendant, without further communication with the plaintiff about the matter, the brokers, Marsh & McLennan, returned the policy to the defendant after the fire on October 12th and it was thereupon marked "canceled." Without knowledge or consent on the part of the plaintiff, on December 28th, the defendant credited the brokers with the amount of this premium which had been previously paid. Upon the trial the court found that the defendant "executed and delivered to said Feather River Pine Mills" Company policy number 79,348 for $2,500 insurance on August 8, 1927. The court further found that this policy "was not cancelled by said defendant and was at all times prior to said fire and on the date thereof in full force and effect"; that in said transaction, with relation to the insurance of said property, the brokers Marsh & McLennan were the agents of plaintiff and were not the agents of the defendant.

The complaint alleged that the value of "said property so damaged and destroyed by said fire was the sum of $1,162,504.28," and that said property was insured in the aggregate sum of $1,226,641.21, including said $2,500 policy which is involved in this action. The answer denied that "said property was insured against loss or damage by fire in the sum of $1,226,641.21, or any sum in excess of the sum of $1,033,891.21, and alleges that said last-named sum does not include any insurance issued by the defendant herein." Upon the foregoing pleadings the court properly found from defendant's admission that the property was insured for a total sum of $1,033,891.21 in addition to said $2,500 policy. Thereupon judgment was rendered upon said policy for $2,369.28. Accepting, as correct, the allegations of the answer with respect to the total amount of insurance with which the milling property was covered at the time of the fire, the loss by fire greatly exceeded the aggregate insurance, and, under such circumstances, the judgment may not be said to be excessive. Even though the total insurance to which the plaintiff might resort, to compensate its loss by fire, exceeded the amount of loss by substantially $64,137, as appears from the findings, still the amount of the judgment which was rendered was not excessive.

[1, 2] The defendant contends that the insurance brokers, Marsh & McLennan, were not acting as the agents of the plaintiff in this transaction; that plaintiff's return of the policy to these brokers, together with the accompanying letter, constituted a repudiation of such agency and a definite rejecting of the policies, and that the subsequent payment of the premium on this bond by Marsh & McLennan was made by mistake. The question of agency must, however, be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case, together with the conduct and communications between the parties. If there is substantial evidence to support the court's findings with relation to the agency, then the judgment should be affirmed. If Marsh & McLennan had authority from the plaintiff to procure this policy of insurance and was not limited as to the rate of premium it was permitted to pay, then the defendant should be bound by this policy, for the policy was in the possession of the plaintiff's agent uncanceled and the premium was fully paid. The controversy between the plaintiff and its agent respecting the rate of insurance had nothing to do with the validity of the policy. The payment of the premium and the retaining of the policy by Marsh & McLennan after their fruitless effort to adjust the rate with the defendant is a circumstance strongly tending to show their agency for the plaintiff. Regardless of their relationship toward other insurance companies, there is ample evidence to support the finding that in this particular transaction Marsh & McLennan acted as the agents of the plaintiff. Mr. Hill, who was manager of the milling company, testified: "Marsh & McLennan had full charge of all of the insurance for the Hutchinson Lumber Company. * * * Under mere general instructions as to the extent of the lines to be carried, they were charged with all of the details of seeing that we were kept covered and seeing that we maintained conditions at the plant that we were required to maintain under the policies and seeing that our rates were kept low and in general serving us in the capacity of insurance agents—brokers—and managers to whom we intrusted all of our insurance affairs."

[3] In the case of Solomon v. Federal Ins. Co., 176 Cal. 133, 138, 167 P. 859, 861, the following language is used which is peculiarly applicable to the present case: "It is well settled that, where, in circumstances such as are presented here, an insurance agent requests insurance from a company which he does not represent, he is acting for the insured."

This agency in behalf of the insured may exist even though the commissions are paid to the broker by the insurer. Solomon v. Federal Ins. Co., supra; Parrish v. Rosebud M. & M. Co., 140 Cal. 635, 74 P. 312; Bennett v. N. W. Nat. Ins. Co., 84 Cal. App. 130, 135, 257 P. 586; Mahon v. Royal Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. (C. C. A.) 134 F. 732; McGraw Wooden Ware Co. v. German Fire Ins. Co., 126 La. 32, 52 So. 183, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 614, 20 Ann. Cas. 1229; 5 Cooley's Br. on Ins., (2d Ed.) p. 1452.

[4] We are satisfied the record sufficiently supports the findings to the effect that Marsh & McLennan were the agents of the plaintiff in this transaction, that the policy was not canceled at the time of the fire, but, upon the contrary, was then in full force and effect, and that the defendant was therefore liable.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOLISH v. VAN PELT.
Civ. 6871.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

May 1, 1930.

Appeal and error — 612(1), 657(1).

Failure to present transcript to respondent, or to judge for authentication, prevented effective appeal; hence return of transcript for approval was denied (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a-953c).

Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, requires that transcript shall be presented to judge for his approval, and that respondents may require alteration or amendment. Section 953c requires clerk to transmit the record "prepared in accordance with the two preceding sections." Appellant relied upon the alleged oversight or neglect of the clerk of the superior court, or judge, or both, but it affirmatively appeared that the clerk, pursuant to appellant's request, forwarded the transcript given him and that the transcript had not been presented to the respondent or to the judge as required by the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by R. H. Golish against Peter R. Van Pelt. From an order vacating a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Motion by plaintiff to return transcript to superior court for approval.

Motion denied.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. J. Welch, Jr., of Riverside, for respondent.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The plaintiff appealed under the alternative method from an order vacating a default judgment, whereupon a purported transcript was forwarded to the clerk of this court as required by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, without the certificate of authentication of the trial judge. The appellant has moved that it be returned for preparation, examination and approval in the superior court in accordance with said sections.

The clerk's certificate recites that the contents of the transcript are "full, true and correct copies" of the originals, but it does not appear that it contains all of the papers filed below. The asserted grounds of the motion are that through no fault of appellant, the clerk and judge inadvertently neglected to obtain its authentication as a full, true, and fair transcript of all the proceedings. However, it is shown by affidavit of the clerk, and is uncontradicted, that upon demand of appellant's counsel a copy of the transcript as originally served upon counsel for the respondent was recalled, and a portion of the same was removed. Further, that: "He then requested that I mail the original transcript to the clerk of the court of appeals, asking if I would mail it that afternoon, and that he could call at the clerk's office the next day and pay the filing fee, and I informed him if such was his request that same be immediately forwarded to the clerk of court of appeals that I would do so, to which he answered: 'Yes, that is what I want you to do.' I thereupon forwarded the original transcript as so altered to the clerk of the District Court of Appeal, Los Angeles, mailed copy to Mr. Backus, and took Mr. Welch's copy to his office and left same with his secretary."

Although it appears from the same source that respondent had repeatedly expressed a desire that other matters be embodied in a transcript, and had objected to the sufficiency of the one in controversy, as to which the trial judge had also indicated a doubt, the same was at no time presented to the court as required by the Code of Civil Procedure, nor was respondent afforded an opportunity to propose alterations or amendments. Section 953a of said Code provides, in part:

"* * * Said transcript shall be presented to the judge for his approval, and the judge shall examine the same and see that the same is a full, true and fair transcript of the proceedings had at the trial, the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, instructions, acts or statements of the court, also all objections and exceptions of counsel and matters to which the same relate. * * *

"The respondents on said appeal may at the time said transcript is presented for settlement and allowance, require the insertion therein of such other papers, files, documents, records and proceedings of said cause as they then desire to have incorporated therein. * * *

And section 953c specifically requires that: " * * * It shall be the duty of the clerk of the court from which the appeal is taken, within ten days after the preparation of the record, to transmit to the clerk of the court to which the appeal is taken, the record *prepared in accordance with * * * the two preceding sections.* * * *"

The appellant bases this motion entirely upon the asserted oversight or neglect of the county clerk, or judge, or both, and wholly relies upon the authority of Lake v. Harris, 198 Cal. 85, 243 P. 417, 419. This was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the trial judge to authenticate a transcript containing matters which had been stricken from the clerk's transcript as constituting no part of the judgment roll. While the petition was dismissed for reasons not here pertinent, it was said: " * * * While it may be said that the appellants should not be prejudiced because of mistakes on the part of the reporter and the clerk, * * * it may also be said that the respondents should have the opportunity, after notice, to object to the inclusion of the said 21 items or any of them before the same are authenticated by the trial judge as a part of the reporter's transcript, and it appears that they have not had such notice."

In the proceedings here under consideration there is not alone an absence of the asserted oversight or inadvertence, but an affirmative showing of strict compliance by the clerk of the superior court with appellant's demands. There is but one transcript before us, which contains the judgment roll and notice of appeal, certified by the clerk. Other matters are discussed in the briefs as properly constituting an additional transcript for authentication, had one been filed. But it is the duty of the appellant in such a case to prepare and present in the trial court, upon notice, a proposed transcript, and to afford the respondent an opportunity to participate in its final settlement for examination and approval. Since none of these steps requisite to a valid appeal have been taken, and no transcript is available for return or approval, appellant's motion is without foundation.

The motion is denied.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

[1, 2] The defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought for the recovery of damages for personal injuries. And inasmuch as it is earnestly insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury, we shall first set down that portion of the testimony which justifies the jury's finding. The respondent was a fireman on a freight train and in the employ of appellant on a run between Winslow, Ariz., and Gallup, N. M. On the night of the accident, September 17, 1925, the train, in charge of one D. M. Birney as engineer and respondent as fireman, was scheduled to stop at Houck, Ariz., for the purpose of taking on fuel coal. As the train approached the coal bins, which are located above the level of the tender and from which coal is loaded by gravity, after the fireman has pulled down an iron apron long enough to extend from the bin to the tender, it was traveling an upgrade of about $\frac{7}{10}$ of 1 per cent., or about 37 feet to the mile. There was in effect at the time a rule of the appellant that when coal was to be taken the engine should be uncoupled and spotted at the bin. On this occasion, according to the testimony of the respondent, the engineer refused his request to uncouple the engine, saying that they were in a hurry to meet, at a certain other siding, a passenger train. Accordingly, with 60 freight cars attached, they drifted by the bins four or five car lengths and then back up to the proper place. During the time the train was being reversed the respondent was riding on top of the cab in view of the engineer, although he could not see the latter. According to respondent's testimony, he stood there for ten or twelve seconds after the train stopped and then the engineer told him that the "first pocket there was all right, to get down and get to work." Whereupon respondent stepped down on "the tool box just behind the cab." After four or five tons of coal had run into the tender the engineer told him to get out of there, that he was going to spread it with the engine, but, to quote the witness, he "didn't have time—caught me before I could get out." The respondent's right leg was so badly crushed as to necessitate an amputation, near the hip, rendering him a permanent cripple. It is only just to say that evidence produced by the defendant was in conflict with much of that we have already recited, but it is sufficient for our purposes to set down that which the jury evidently accepted as the true version of the occurrence. It is manifest from the statement that there is ample support therein for their verdict and their belief that the engineer negligently and carelessly and without sufficient warning moved the train while the respondent was in a perilous position. The running out of the slack of the train insistently pressed upon us by appellant as a reason for the accident does not accord with the respondent's statements that he waited some time after the train had stopped before descending from the cab, and that he had loaded four or five tons before the train was again moved. The jury having found the fact upon substantial evidence we are bound thereby.

[3-6] The next question for consideration is whether the court properly instructed the jury upon the subject of assumption of risk. In this connection it is to be noted that the allegations of the acts negligently done were to the effect that the engineer in charge of the engine negligently failed to hold the train standing still and negligently permitted it to move during the time of loading the tender with coal. It is further to be observed that the defendant was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the accident, and therefore the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 22, 1908 (35 Stats. at Large, 65, c. 149, 45 USCA § 51 et seq.), and acts amendatory thereof, commonly known as the Federal Employers' Liability Act, are applicable in determining the liability of the carrier in this instance. It cannot be doubted that according to the ordinary rule or at common law a servant assumes all risks naturally and obviously incident to the physical situation of his employment, plus such super-added dangers as are caused by the employer's negligence which are obvious or fully known and appreciated by the employee. Boldt v. Penna. R. Co., 245 U. S. 441, 38 S. Ct. 139, 62 L. Ed. 385; Morgan v. Robinson Co., 157 Cal. 348, 107 P. 695. Nor has the statute enlarged the defense in any particular. Rather it has eliminated the defense in certain cases of which this is not one, indicating, as has been declared, a legislative intent that, in all other instances, such assumption shall have its former effect. Seaboard A. L. R. Co. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 S. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475. Upon turning to the instructions we find that the court instructed the jury that the respondent not only assumed the risks and dangers incident to his work but also extraordinary risks "caused by the employer's negligence which are fully known and appreciated by him or which are so obvious that an ordinarily careful and prudent person would, under the circumstances, have observed and appreciated them." In fact, from a reading of not less than six instructions pertinent thereto we are of the opinion that the jury was very fully instructed upon the law in this particular and that appellant can have no possible complaint. Appellant's counsel suggests that assumption of risk in this case is a question of law and not of fact. It is a sufficient answer to this assertion to say that we could only apply the doctrine here as a matter of law by assuming a state of facts contrary to that which the jury evidently believed to be the true circumstances.

The arguments already reviewed are put in other forms by the appellant, but we deem further discussion unnecessary.

Judgment affirmed.

After midnight he went to the garage, and the next morning he was found in the car in the garage and seated at the wheel. STURTEVANT, J.

Walter Carpenter was an employee of Bissinger & Co. He was a traveling salesman. On September 10, 1929, and for a short time prior thereto, he had possession of and was entitled to use an automobile owned by his employer. His employer paid for the upkeep and repairs of the car, but permitted Mr. Carpenter to use the car for his private and pleasure uses as well as for business uses, and, when he was in San Francisco, to keep the car in his own garage. On September 10, 1929, he had been in Santa Cruz. His wife was with him. As they were coming home over the Santa Cruz grade, Mr. Carpenter noticed that the motometer became quite hot, and he stated that he would have to fix that before starting on the next trip. He also stated that he would also have to fix the gasoline gauge, as it became stuck. On the next day he went to his office, and later called for his wife at her club and took her home and put the automobile in the garage which adjoins their home. They went into their home, had their dinner, and the wife thereafter reclined on a davenport, and her husband sat down in an armchair and went to sleep. About 9:30 she arose and went to bed. Later the husband arose and walked into the bedroom and inquired if she was asleep. He then went into the kitchen and from there down to the basement. The wife testified that she looked at the clock, and it was then about 12:20 a. m. About 7 o'clock the next morning a tenant of their building awakened Mrs. Carpenter. Immediately before doing so, the tenant and his wife had smelled gas escaping from the garage, and had opened it, and there they found Mr. Carpenter seated at the wheel in the front seat of the automobile. After Mrs. Carpenter was notified, she went downstairs, and Mr. Carpenter was sent to the emergency hospital. He was dead at the time. When he was discovered in the garage, he had his left hand on the steering wheel and his right arm on the seat, and his head was resting on his right arm. His coat and vest were found hanging in the basement of the house. The engine in the automobile was running, and the lights were turned on. A flashlight was lying on the floor of the car. A duster or mackintosh folded up was lying on the seat. Some two days later a small screwdriver was found on a ledge in the garage. It had formerly been upstairs. On the right sleeve of Mr. Carpenter's shirt there was a splotch of dirt. There was evidence that Mr. Carpenter sometimes replaced light bulbs and changed the tires, but there is no evidence that he ever at any time made repairs at night. After his death, Mrs. Carpenter presented to the Industrial Accident Commission her claim. The commission made award in her favor, and the employer and its insurance carrier have commenced this proceeding to review said award.

[1-3] The petitioner claims that there is no evidence showing that Mr. Carpenter's death arose by reason of an accident "arising out of his employment when overcome by monoxide gas while working on his employer's automobile." The respondents contend that said finding is supported by the inferences that may properly be drawn from the evidence introduced. Our statute, Code of Civil Procedure, § 1960, provides as follows: "An inference must be founded: 1. On a fact legally proved; and, 2. On such a deduction from that fact as is warranted by a consideration of the usual propensities or passions of men, the particular propensities or passions of the person whose act is in question, the course of business, or the course of nature."

It was a proved fact that a certain screwdriver theretofore was kept upstairs; that two days later the screwdriver was on a ledge in the garage. It is said, it may be inferred that the decedent took the screwdriver to the garage, that he did so on the night of the accident, and that he took it for the purpose of making adjustments on the car. No one of these inferences may properly be indulged. The only inference that may be indulged is that somebody at some time took the screwdriver from upstairs to the garage.

It was a proved fact that a spot of dirt was on the shirt of the decedent. It is said it may be inferred that there was dust and dirt on the car; that the decedent made adjustments to the car; that in doing so he rubbed up against the car; and that in doing so he got a splotch of dirt off of the car. No one of these inferences may be drawn. The only inference that may be drawn is that the decedent's sleeve had rubbed some dirty object.

There were also proved facts that the decedent had in his possession his employer's car; that the decedent had formed the opinion that adjustments were needed in the car; that it was no part of decedent's duty to make said adjustments; that he had not been in the habit of making such adjustments at night and in particular after midnight; that after midnight the decedent went to the garage; that the next morning he was in the car in the garage and was seated at the wheel; that at that time he was dead; that the engine in the car was then in motion; and that the garage was filled with monoxide gas. In addition to that direct evidence there was a presumption, as distinguished from an inference, which must be considered. It is the settled law of this state that it will not be presumed that a person has committed suicide. Ross v. Railways Co., 47 Cal. App. 753, 760, 761, 191 P. 703; Wilkinson v. Standard Accident Ins. Co. of Detroit, Mich., 180 Cal. 252, 256, 180 P. 607. That being so, the question is narrowed down to whether death was caused by accident or by natural causes. To answer that question, the commission was entitled to consider these facts and draw these conclusions: The decedent went into his garage and started the engine in motion. That is a proper and legal inference. Thereafter large quantities of monoxide gas accumulated. When discovered, the decedent was dead. As there was no evidence of a post mortem examination or any other evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that things happened according to the ordinary course of nature. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 28. Therefore, as his dead body was found enveloped in a deadly gas, it will be presumed that he was asphyxiated by that deadly gas. If the petitioners believed that death followed natural causes, they should have introduced evidence rebutting the foregoing evidence.

[4] He was not in the act of taking a drive, because the doors of the garage were closed. He was not there to amuse himself, because that act at that time of day was not "the usual propensity" of men, nor was it shown to be "the particular propensity" of the decedent. Therefore he must have been making adjustments to the car. When there are two different inferences which may be drawn, one of which will support and the other of which will overthrow the judgment, in support of the judgment we must presume the fact-finding body adopted the former and not the latter.

At the time the decedent and his wife went home on the day before his death, according to the ordinary customs of business, his day's work was at an end. As stated in the beginning, he was not employed to make adjustments to automobiles either during the daytime or at nighttime. Whether his acts, at midnight and later, in the nature of making adjustments to automobiles, came within his employment, might be debatable. So far as we are advised, that question was not presented to the defendant commission. It has not been presented by either side in this court. Therefore we express no opinion thereon.

The defendants did not exceed their jurisdiction.

The award is affirmed.

Failure of purchasers to make monthly payments worked forfeiture of purchase contract, where time was of essence.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨186.

Removal of house and trees by vendor did not, ipso facto, affect validity of purchase contract, and could not excuse performance by purchasers.

In grantee's action to quiet title against defaulting purchasers, evidence of damage done by vendor in removing improvements held inadmissible.

The evidence as to damage was inadmissible, since it was offered for sole purpose of permitting purchasers to carry out contract and receive credit on purchase price for alleged damages, and since purchasers had their remedy of a personal action for damages against vendor for removal of house and trees, and which remedy they had apparently pursued.

Davis & Thorne, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem.

This is a consolidation of two actions to quiet title to lots 9 and 10 of tract 6698 in the city of Monrovia. Each action involved one of said lots.

The complaints are in the usual form of such an action. The answers deny the allegations of the complaint. As a further defense, defendants in each case set forth a contract of purchase covering said realty. They allege that, on the day following the execution of said contract, their vendor entered upon said realty, without their consent, and removed a house of the value of $500 and three trees of the value of $100. They state that they stand ready to make full payment of the balance due under said contracts and to fully perform the same, but pray that the court adjust the value of said house and trees, in arriving at the said balance. There is also a prayer for general relief. The pleadings in each case are practically identical.

[1] The trial court found that defendants had no right, title, or interest in said property, and judgments were entered accordingly.

At the trial the court excluded all evidence bearing upon the second defense referred to above, and upon this ruling error is predicated.

Plaintiff introduced in evidence the deed to said property from the vendor of defendants. The contracts of purchase were then admitted in evidence. Then followed evidence of the failure of defendants to make the payments due under said contract.

The evidence of plaintiff showed, and defendants admitted, that on one contract no monthly payments whatever had been made, while on the other only two had been made. In other words, for some three years prior to the filing of the complaint, no attempt had been made by defendants to comply with the terms of said contract of purchase. By the terms of said contracts time is made of the essence of the same.

Appellants take the position that, when said house and trees were removed (which they offered to prove) and until they were given credit on the purchase price for damages thus inflicted, they were no longer under obligation to further perform said contracts.

Throughout the trial and on the pleadings, appellants consistently maintain the position that the contract is still in full force and effect. They do not set up a repudiation. It also appears that some time prior to the commencement of this action, one of appellants filed an action to recover damages from his vendor, based upon the removal of the house and trees. No judgment had been entered therein. The present action is brought by a grantee of the vendor of defendants.

By the terms of the contract, time of payment is made of the essence thereof, and failure to make said payments when they become due worked a forfeiture, and the effect was to nullify the agreement, and the vendor was thereafter entitled to act as if the contract no longer existed. Northern Assurance Co. v. Stout, 16 Cal. App. 548, 117 P. 617.

[2, 3] The removal of said improvements did not, ipso facto, affect the validity of the contract, and hence could not excuse performance upon the part of the vendees. If a rescission were involved, an entirely different question would be presented. Defendants have their remedy of a personal action for damages against their vendor, and this they apparently pursued, without in any manner assailing the validity of the agreement.

And so when plaintiff here proved that defendants had failed to make the installment payments as we have indicated, the contract was at an end, and defendants could no longer assert any rights based upon the same. The only purpose appellants had in mind and the only relief they asked was to be permitted to carry out their contract and to receive credit for any damages which might be awarded them.

We are of the opinion that the learned trial judge was correct in refusing to admit evidence of damage done by the vendor, for the sole purpose of permitting defendants to carry out the contract and receiving credit on the purchase price for the amount of said claim.

Judgments affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GAGAN.

Cr. 1570.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

April 28, 1930.

1. Automobiles ☞355(13).

That intoxicated motorist, without slowing down, struck automobile standing near intersection while crosswise traffic passed, sufficiently supported manslaughter conviction for pedestrian's death.

2. Criminal law ☞1130(5).

Court need not consider alleged errors unsupported by statement of reasons or citation of authorities.

On appeal from a manslaughter conviction against a person who had operated automobile while intoxicated, it was insisted that verdict was rendered by reason of passion and prejudice; that trial judge erred in decisions on questions of law; and that numerous inadmissible and prejudicial statements were made during trial.

3. Criminal law ☞1035(5).

In manslaughter prosecution, where entire new jury was selected at defendant's request, presence of three former jurors on second panel was not prejudicial, lacking objection (Pen. Code, § 1123).

It was suggested, after illness of one of jurors, that new juror be selected under Pen. Code, § 1123, but at defendant's request entire jury was discharged and new panel called. Although three of the former jurors were selected on the second panel, defendant made no objection at the time and did not exhaust his peremptory challenges.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Homer R. Spence, Judge.

Jack Gagan was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. R. Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, P. J.

The defendant was tried before a jury and convicted of manslaughter. He appeals on a typewritten record from the judgment and from the order denying him a new trial.

[1] The evidence is that the defendant, while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, was operating a Chevrolet coupé along Oak street, in the city of Oakland, at an excessive rate of speed. Other machines traveling ahead of defendant along Oak street in the same direction had stopped near the intersection of Fourteenth street to permit the traffic to pass on that street. At that time the deceased left the sidewalk on Oak street and attempted to pass behind a Nash sedan, which was the last of the line of cars to stop on that street. When she was directly behind the Nash the defendant's car, without slackening its speed, crashed into the Nash, striking the deceased with such force that she died soon thereafter.

On this appeal it is said that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The portion of the evidence just stated is sufficient for this purpose.

[2] It is stated that the verdict was rendered by reason of passion and prejudice; that the trial judge erred in decisions on questions of law; and that many inadmissible and prejudicial statements were made during the course of the trial which prevented appellant from having a fair trial. We have nothing more than the mere statement that errors occurred in this way. If counsel do not deem them of sufficient importance to state their reasons or to cite authorities, we are not required to consider them. People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 309, 67 P. 770; People v. Meyer, 94 Cal. App. 696, 271 P. 751.

Criticism is made of a portion of an instruction given the jury. The criticism is made to appear plausible by quoting a portion of the instruction only. When the entire instruction is read it is as favorable to the appellant as he might ask. It was approved in People v. Wolff, 182 Cal. 729, 739, 190 P. 22.

[3] When a portion of the testimony on behalf of the people had been heard, one of the jurors became ill. It was then suggested that a new juror be selected to fill his place under the provisions of section 1123, Penal Code. At the request of appellant the entire jury was discharged and a new panel was called. Three of the former jurors were selected on the second panel, and it is now argued that this in some way prejudiced the appellant. But he made no objection at the time and did not exhaust his peremptory challenges. We find no error that he may assert at this time. The entire record discloses that appellant had a fair and impartial trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BAKALOFF v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 7308.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

April 19, 1930.

1. Master and servant ☞419.

Industrial Accident Commission has power to alter award, as by terminating compensation, "upon good cause appearing" (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 20(d).

2. Master and servant ☞419.

Employee, struck on wrist by falling timber, refusing re-employment at easier work, was properly denied further compensation, especially since medical treatment continued (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 20(d).

The injury was found to have caused a temporary total disability from June 15 to August 5, at which time the employee was tendered suitable work, at his former wages, which the evidence tended to show would not have interfered with recovery from the injury. On October 24, the commission ordered medical treatment to be continued to effect a cure, and further compensation payments to be terminated.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by H. Bakaloff, claimant, opposed by Lindgren & Swinerton, employer, and the Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company, insurance carrier. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission directing further compensation payments to cease, claimant brings certiorari.

Affirmed.

Wayne R. Millington, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

Petitioner sued in certiorari to review an order of the respondent commission.

On June 15, 1929, while in the course of his employment as a laborer, petitioner was struck on the left wrist by a falling plank. The injury was found to have caused a temporary total disability from June 15 to August 5, 1929, during which time petitioner received a weekly compensation of $20.38, based upon wages of $5.50 a day. He was also given all necessary medical care. On August 5 the petitioner was tendered by his employer "suitable light work and work which the applicant was capable of doing" (referee's findings), and for which the petitioner would receive the same wages he was receiving at the time of the injury. The petitioner refused to accept any offer of re-employment, and on October 24, 1929, the commission directed the insurance carrier to furnish further medical treatment to effect a cure of petitioner's injuries, and ordered further compensation payments to cease. The certiorari is directed to this order.

[1] The power of the commission to alter an award "upon good cause appearing therefor" is found in subdivision "d" of section 20 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 850). This power includes the right to increase, diminish, or terminate an award "upon the grounds that the disability * * * has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated."

The application of this section of the act was before us in Miller Creamery v. Ind. Acc. Commission, 66 Cal. App. 404, 226 P. 402, 403. In that case the injured employee, after receiving medical and hospital care, returned to work, and in about six weeks he claimed that his condition had grown steadily worse. We held that this was "a change in the facts of the case * * * a recurrence of disability," and that the commission had jurisdiction under this section to reopen the case and to make a new award.

In Standard Sanitary Manf. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 282 P. 948, the Supreme Court, citing numerous authorities, held a mistake or inadvertence of the commission in originally denying compensation was "good cause" for the exercise of this continuing jurisdiction under section 20(d), and affirmed an award of compensation made under the authority of that section.

[2] There is evidence tending to show that the work offered petitioner would not have interfered with a recovery from his injury, but that it would have contributed to the curing of that condition. As the employee would have received the same wages paid prior to his injury, he is in no position to complain of this arrangement if he is fairly interested in his ultimate rehabilitation to the position of self-support. As the insurance carrier was required to continue medical treatment of the injury, it seems to us that the commission has taken every caution to insure the rights and privileges of the petitioner under the Compensation Act.

The order is affirmed.

April 19, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 19, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 16, 1930.

1. Negligence ⇨93(2).

If motorist was contributorily negligent in making left turn against approaching traffic, negligence must be imputed to wife riding with him (California Vehicle Act, § 130).

California Vehicle Act, § 130 (St. 1923, p. 558), provides that motorist before turning shall first see that turn can be made safely, and, if it cannot, he must wait.

2. Negligence ⇨136(26).

Contributory negligence is ordinarily question of fact, lacking standard established by statute, judicial decision, or custom.

3. Automobiles ⇨246(25).

Instruction that if motorist, changing northerly course by attempting left-hand turn, entered northwestern quarter of intersection first, he had right of way over vehicles going south, was erroneous (California Vehicle Act, § 130).

Although an automobile first reaching the intersection may have the right of way, it does not follow that a motorist who changes his course at the intersection is entitled to the full protection of this rule.

Action by Vera Ekwall against the Los Angeles Hat Company, a copartnership consisting of Desery Robinet and Joseph Z. Robinet, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, and Snook, Snook & Chase, of Oakland, for appellants.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages for personal injuries arising out of an automobile accident. The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in the sum of $18,000. From the judgment on the verdict, the defendants appeal upon typewritten transcripts.

The complaint alleged that the injuries were due to the negligence of the defendant Marks, who was at the time of the collision a salesman in the employ of the Los Angeles Hat Company. An answer was filed, verified by the defendant Marks, in which this allegation was not denied. On the morning of the trial the defendants, having procured new counsel to represent them, moved the court for leave to amend the answer for the purpose of denying this allegation. The motion for leave to amend was denied and the cause went to trial before the jury on the original pleadings. The claim of the Los Angeles Hat Company was that, although the defendant Marks was a salesman in its employ, he was also engaged by two other concerns, and that at the time of the collision he was in the course of his employment with one of these others. On this theory the defendant Los Angeles Hat Company sought the privilege to urge in its defense that the defendant Marks was not in the course of his employment with the Hat Company at the time of the accident, and that the Hat Company was not, therefore, responsible for plaintiff's injuries. Offers to prove this theory were denied because of the admissions in the pleading. Denial of the request for leave to amend in this particular is assigned as error on this appeal. In answer to the point, the respondents cite numerous authorities holding that the application for leave to amend is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and that the exercise of this discretion should not be interfered with by the court on appeal. The appellants do not quarrel with the rule of the cases cited, but insist that under the peculiar facts of this case the denial for leave to amend was an abuse of discretion, and that the cause should be reversed upon that ground. The question of when judicial discretion has been properly exercised is a difficult one to determine, because ordinarily it depends entirely upon a difference of opinion of the individual who is called upon to determine it. The fact that the original answer herein was verified by the defendant Marks, rather than by an officer of the Hat Company, and that the facts upon which the proposed amendment was based were not known to the Hat Company at the time the answer was verified present a different state of facts from those involved in any of the cases cited and would seem to have warranted a greater leniency on the part of the trial judge when the application for leave to amend was made. However, as the judgment must be reversed upon another ground, it is not necessary to determine this point, as the amendment will be allowed prior to the new trial.

The facts of the case are practically without conflict. The plaintiff was riding with her husband, Arthur Ekwall, going northerly on Telegraph avenue in the city of Oakland. The defendant Marks was driving southerly upon the same avenue. Plaintiff's husband signaled for a left-hand turn when he approached Apgar street. After he had turned to the left in the middle of Telegraph avenue, and had proceeded over the car tracks running north and south on that avenue, he came to a stop to allow other cars bound south on Telegraph avenue to pass him. After three such cars bound south had passed him, he started ahead and was struck by the Marks car before he had proceeded more than six or eight feet. He had witnessed this defendant's car approaching at a point about 150 feet north from the intersection. He noticed it again when at a point about 50 or 75 feet from the intersection, and saw that it was then going at a rate of 35 miles an hour. At this time defendant's car was traveling alongside of another car—on the east side of that car and closer to the street car rails than to the curb. With these two cars approaching in this order, the defendant's car traveling at a speed of 35 miles an hour and close to the street car rails, the plaintiff's husband put his machine in low gear and started to cross the path of this approaching traffic.

[1, 2] Upon this state of the evidence, the appellants insist that we should hold that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law arising out of negligence of her husband with whom she was riding. It is conceded, as it must be, that if the respondent's husband was guilty of contributory negligence, such negligence must be imputed to her. But when it comes to determining whether a particular state of facts constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law, we are confronted with the rule "the question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury to solve under proper instruction, and not one of law, save in those cases in which, judged in the light of common knowledge and experience there is a standard of prudence to which all persons similarly situated must conform." Williams v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 177 Cal. 235, 237, 238, 170 P. 423. As was said in Swartz v. Acme Express & Drayage Co. (Cal. App.) 283 P. 358, 360, "in the absence of some rule of conduct which is established by statute, by judicial decision, or by established custom or practice, we cannot say that any particular method employed to avoid injury is negligence as a matter of law because it is not the method that we would have used under the same circumstances."

In the case before us the rule of conduct prescribed by statute is found in section 130 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 558), and reads: "The driver of any vehicle upon a public highway before starting, turning or stopping such vehicle shall first see that such movement can be made in safety, and if it cannot be made in safety, shall wait until it can be made in safety. * * *" It would seem to be evident that when any driver, while making a left-hand turn, comes into collision with another car proceeding along the line of traffic which he attempts to intersect he did not "first see that such movement" could have been made in safety. Here we have a statutory rule of conduct to which all motorists similarly situated must conform, and which casts upon the motorists "the duty of exercising greater care than is ordinarily required of them." Donat v. Dillon, 192 Cal. 426, 430, 221 P. 193, 195. But we have not been cited any statute or rule of decision which determines what is a breach of this duty under any state of facts. However, if the argument of respondent is sound—that the issue of contributory negligence in this case is one of fact for the jury—it is patent that, because of the error in the instruction hereafter referred to, the jury did not have that issue properly before it for determination.

[3] The error in this instruction, number 46, is such that the cause must be reversed for a new trial. Therein the trial court instructed the jury that if the automobile of the respondent entered the northwesterly quarter of the intersection before the vehicle of defendant Marks had entered the intersection, then the respondents "would be entitled to the right of way to cross Telegraph avenue ahead of any vehicle coming from the north which had not at that time entered the intersection." The effect of this instruction was to advise the jury that any motor vehicle entering an intersection had the right of way to cross through that intersection making a complete left-hand turn (and even what is called a "U" turn) ahead of any other machine which had not previously entered the intersection at any other point. This is not the law, as was clearly pointed out by the Supreme Court in Donat v. Dillon, 192 Cal. 426, 430, 221 P. 193, 195. The facts in that case were very similar to the facts here, excepting that the party claiming a continuous right of way was the defendant in the action. In dismissing this claim the Supreme Court said: "Although a machine first reaching the intersection may have the right of way, it does not follow that one who changes his course at the intersection of a street is entitled to the full protection of this rule, for common sense tells us that he is bound to exercise great care to avoid colliding with machines that are on the street, and across whose path he must travel. Clark v. Fotheringham, 100 Wash. 12, 170 P. 323. It seems to us that this was what the Legislature had in mind when it provided that a vehicle, before starting to turn, 'shall see first that there is sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety,' so that the practical effect of this provision is to cast upon motorists intending to turn the duty of exercising greater care than is ordinarily required of them."

The only defense to the instruction made by the respondent on this appeal is that it must be read in connection with all other instructions. This, of course, is a general rule of practice, but in this particular case the reading of this instruction with the others merely emphasizes the vice of the instruction complained of. In instruction number 45 the jury was advised that if the respondent's husband failed to ascertain that the left turn could be made in safety or neglected to give the requisite hand signal, that this constituted negligence as matter of law. This instruction was immediately followed by number 46, which is the one complained of. Taking these two instructions together, the jury could not escape the conclusion that if the respondent's husband approached the northwest corner of the intersection before appellants' car reached the corresponding corner, then respondent's husband had a clear right of way to proceed through that intersection turning to the left and crossing Telegraph avenue, and that this legal right was in itself sufficient to satisfy him that the left turn could be made in safety within the meaning of instruction number 45.

Judgment reversed.

HULL v. RAY.★
Civ. 4060.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

May 2, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 31, 1930. Hearing
Granted by Supreme Court June 30, 1930.

1. Sales ⇨127.

Notice of rescission of contract for sale of cattle held insufficient to support action to rescind based solely upon omission to execute bill of sale.

Contract for sale of registered cattle required seller upon payment of purchase price to execute and deliver good and sufficient bill of sale together with warranty of title. Bill of sale and warranty of title were never executed. Written notice of rescission was based upon ground that seller failed to deliver certificate of cattle club showing transfer and seller's failure to correctly certify to date of service of certain of cattle, but omitted to mention seller's failure to execute or deliver bill of sale.

2. Sales ⇨135.

Seller's failure to furnish certificate of cattle club showing transfer of cattle sold would not furnish ground for rescission, absent covenant to that effect.

3. Contracts ⇨271.

Giving notice of intention to cancel contract is ordinarily prerequisite to maintaining action for rescission.

4. Contracts ⇨271.

Notice of intention to rescind contract expressing intention to terminate contract for breach thereof is ordinarily sufficient.

5. Contracts ⇨271.

Notice of intention to rescind contract assigning single specific ground of rescission will preclude one from abandoning ground designated and resorting to entirely different ground.

6. Contracts ⇨271.

Fact that notice of rescission need not generally specify ground of cancellation does not permit false ground assigned to be treated as surplusage.

7. Animals ⇨26(1).

Agister's lien, to secure purchaser's expense incurred in feeding and caring for cattle purchased, depends entirely upon validity of rescission proceedings.

8. Animals ⇨26(1).

Purchaser of cattle is entitled to agister's lien only after rescission and restoration of cattle has been refused, purchaser being under duty to exercise due care to preserve cattle (Civ. Code, §§ 3051, 3052).

9. Animals ⇨26(5).

When agister's lien and costs of sale have been satisfied, balance of proceeds of sale belongs to seller.

10. Animals — 26(5).

In action to rescind contract for purchase of cattle wherein buyer asserted agister's lien, evidence showing circumstances surrounding assertion of lien held competent.

Evidence in question showed what expense had been necessarily incurred in caring for cattle purchased, proceedings pursued to secure lien and to foreclose same, and amount of proceeds acquired from sale.

Action by John S. Hull against Carl Ray to rescind contract for purchase of cattle and for return of purchase price. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Sloane & Sloane, of San Diego, and M. B. Wellington, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of rescission of a contract to buy cattle and for return of the purchase price therefor.

The appellant contends that the judgment is erroneous on account of a fatal defect in the notice of rescission, and because he was precluded from showing that plaintiff's sale of the cattle to satisfy an agister's lien was illegal and that he had failed to account for the entire proceeds of such sale.

November 13, 1922, the parties to this action executed a written contract by the terms of which the plaintiff agreed to purchase fourteen head of registered cattle for the sum of $3,500. This sum was fully paid and the plaintiff took possession of the stock. The contract provided that upon payment of the purchase price the defendant would "execute and deliver to the * * * (plaintiff) a good and sufficient bill of sale of the said property, together with warranty of title." This bill of sale and warranty of title was not executed. After the plaintiff had fully performed all the covenants of the agreement on his part, he orally demanded of the defendant the delivery of the stipulated instruments, which was refused. At the same time the plaintiff also offered to restore the cattle to the defendant and attempted to rescind the contract. Pursuant to his effort to cancel the contract, the plaintiff served upon the defendant a written notice of rescission containing the following language: "You will please be advised that John S. Hull does hereby rescind that certain contract of sale * * * (describing the agreement heretofore referred to). This rescission is made by reason of the failure of said Carl Ray to deliver to the said John S. Hull a certificate of The American Jersey Cattle Club, showing transfer of the said cattle, and by reason of the said Carl Ray's failure to correctly certify to the date of service to certain of said cattle." It will be observed this notice of rescission omits to mention the defendant's failure to execute or deliver the bill of sale. This failure to deliver the bill of sale, and not the cause complained of in the notice of rescission, was the sole ground of cancellation relied upon by the plaintiff at the trial. The notice of rescission was admitted in evidence over the objection of the defendant. This variance in proof from the notice of rescission was fatal to the plaintiff's cause.

The court found that on May 5, 1923, the plaintiff did "rescind said contract of November 13, 1922, and notified the defendant in due form of such rescission." A decree was thereupon rendered in favor of the plaintiff canceling the contract and awarding him a judgment for the purchase price of the cattle in the sum of $3,500. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion the notice of rescission was fatally defective. It was insufficient upon which to maintain an action to cancel a contract for the purchase of cattle based solely upon an omission to execute and deliver a bill of sale. The court found that a notice of rescission in due form had been given. A notice of rescission which specifies only an erroneous ground of cancellation is misleading and would tend to deceive the adverse party and prevent him from defending the action on its merits. The fact that a "certificate of The American Jersey Cattle Club, showing transfer of the said cattle" on the records of said club had not been supplied the purchaser of the stock, in the absence of a covenant to that effect, furnishes no ground for cancellation of the contract. Upon a former appeal in this same case (Hull v. Ray, 80 Cal. App. 284, 251 P. 810), this court held the foregoing ground which was specified in the notice was not cause for cancellation of the contract. That decision becomes the law of this case. It was, however, held upon the former appeal that the failure of the vendor to execute and deliver a good and sufficient bill of sale was cause for a rescission of the contract for the reason that the agreement specifically provided for the delivery of a bill of sale which is tangible evidence of ownership and title and is therefore a valuable part of the consideration for the purchase.

It therefore follows that, since the notice of rescission was invalid, the effort to cancel the contract was ineffectual and the sale of the cattle to satisfy the agister's lien was void.

[3-6] It is ordinarily a prerequisite to maintaining an action for rescission that a notice of intention to cancel the contract be given to the adverse party. Zeller v. Milligan, 71 Cal. App. 617, 625, 236 P. 349; 2 Black on Rescission (2d Ed.) p. 1399, § 569. This notice, however, is not required to be couched in any particular form. It is ordinarily sufficient if it clearly expresses the intention to terminate the contract for a breach thereof. McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 405, 213 P. 36; Simmons v. Briggs, 69 Cal. App. 447, 463, 231 P. 604; Guscetti v. Dugan, 60 Cal. App. 187, 212 P. 397; 2 Black on Rescission (2d Ed.) p. 1410, § 573. Assuming that a notice of rescission is adequate in form, which identifies the instrument and asserts an intention to cancel it, without specifying the particular ground of rescission, yet when a single specific ground of rescission is assigned, it will preclude one from abandoning the ground which is stated and resorting to an entirely different cause. This principle appears to be sound and just. Because one may not ordinarily be required to specify the ground of cancellation in the notice of rescission, it does not follow that a false ground which is assigned may be treated as surplusage and harmless. The danger of such a construction is evident from the facts of the present case. The contract required the vendor of the cattle to furnish the buyer with a good and sufficient bill of sale. It did not require a certificate of the transfer of registration of the stock on the records of the cattle club. The cattle had been delivered to the purchaser. The vendee might waive his right to a bill of sale assuming that his possession of the cattle was satisfactory evidence of his title. His notice of rescission on the sole ground of failure on the part of the defendant to furnish him with a certificate of transfer of registration of the stock clearly inferred that he was waiving his right to a bill of sale and that he relied solely upon the ground mentioned in the notice for cancelling the contract. The right of the plaintiff to an agister's lien and compensation for feeding the stock depended upon the validity of his cancellation of the contract. Knowing that the agreement did not require the delivery of a certificate transferring the registration of the stock upon the records of the cattle club, the defendant was warranted in assuming that the contract was not subject to rescission on that ground and that he was therefore not liable to the plaintiff for compensation for feeding the stock. For this reason he was justified in refusing to accept a return of the cattle. To permit the plaintiff, under such circumstances, to sell the stock for the satisfaction of an agister's lien and then seek to justify the sale on a false notice of rescission would encourage fraud and deceit. The result of such a misstatement as was contained in the notice in the present case led the defendant to assume that the contract was valid; that the plaintiff therefore held no lien; was entitled to no compensation for feeding the stock and was therefore deceived into permitting cattle of the value of $3,500 to be sold to the wife of the plaintiff for the nominal sum of $154. Certainly the law will not countenance so radical a departure from justice.

[7, 8] The plaintiff was entitled to an agister's lien to secure his expense incurred in feeding and caring for the cattle, dependent entirely upon the validity of his rescission proceedings. While the purchaser held possession of the stock under the provisions of an existing contract to buy them, obviously he would not be entitled to compensation for feeding the cattle. After the contract had been canceled and restoration of the cattle had been refused, the owner would become liable for the cost of feeding and caring for them. Under such circumstances it was the duty of the holder of the cattle to exercise due diligence to preserve the property. After a rescission of the contract had been accomplished, however, a statutory lien would be created to secure the payment of the necessary expense incurred in feeding and caring for the stock. Section 3051 of the Civil Code provides in part: "Persons pasturing horses or stock, have a lien, dependent on possession, for their compensation in caring for, boarding, feeding, or pasturing such horses or stock."

[9] As provided by section 3052 of the Civil Code, after notice to the owner, this lien may be satisfied by sale of the cattle at public auction. When the lien and the costs of sale have been satisfied, the balance of the proceeds of sale belongs to the owner. This was the process sought to be enforced by the plaintiff in the present case.

[10] Incident to the chief issue in this case was the plaintiff's claim of an agister's lien upon the cattle to compensate him for feeding and caring for them after his alleged cancellation of the contract. The complaint clearly asserted this claim and alleged that the cattle had been sold at public auction pursuant to law, but that the proceeds of sale were insufficient with which to satisfy the lien. The validity of this claim, the existence of the lien, the regularity of the proceedings, and the alleged insufficiency of the proceeds of sale were all controverted by the answer. No deficiency judgment on account of the cost of feeding the stock was prayed for or allowed. The defendant asserts that he was erroneously precluded from introducing evidence to refute this claim incident to the lien. Since, assuming that the contract had been canceled, the agister's lien was a proper issue incident to the chief cause for rescission, obviously evidence was competent to show what expense had been necessarily incurred to care for the stock, what proceedings were pursued to secure the lien and foreclose the same, and the amount of proceeds which was acquired from the sale. Likewise the defendant was entitled to any reasonable opportunity to cross-examine witnesses or adduce evidence to refute the plaintiff's showing in this regard. In spite of the court's erroneous assumption that this evidence regarding the agister's lien and the sale of the cattle was competent only to account for plaintiff's failure to restore the property to the owner upon cancellation of the contract, the defendant appears to have been granted every opportunity to present all favorable evidence upon this subject which he possessed. If it be true that the application of this evidence was limited by the court to the sole question of inability of the plaintiff to restore the cattle to the owner as a prerequisite to maintaining an action for rescission, still the defendant is not injured by such limitation, since it becomes necessary to reverse this judgment for failure to prove the serving of an adequate notice of rescission. The legal authority to sell the cattle to satisfy an agister's lien depends entirely upon the validity of the rescission proceedings. If the contract was still in force the plaintiff acquired no lien and had no authority to sell the stock. Since it is necessary to serve a notice of cancellation as a prerequisite to the maintenance of an action of rescission, and the notice thereof was fatally defective, it follows that the sale of the cattle was invalid, and the decree of rescission was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

Civ. 7124.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

April 28, 1930.

Rehearing Granted May 28, 1930.

1. Contribution ☞5.

There is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors.

2. Action ☞27(1).

Whether action is on contract or in tort is to be determined by nature of grievance rather than by form of pleadings.

3. Action ☞27(1).

When it is not clear whether action is on contract or in tort, it will ordinarily be construed as on contract.

4. Landlord and tenant ☞130(3).

As between landlord and tenant, where lease contains covenant for quiet enjoyment, usual remedy of tenant wrongfully dispossessed is an action for breach of covenant.

5. Landlord and tenant ☞130(3).

Where breach of covenant in lease for quiet enjoyment amounts to eviction, tenant may sue landlord for damages.

6. Contribution ☞9(5).

As regards landlord's right of contribution against co-landlord, complaint setting up lease containing covenant for quiet enjoyment and eviction by landlord held to state action on contract.

7. Appeal and error ☞757(3).

Failure to find on issue that landlord falsely represented facts to co-landlord, resulting in co-landlord's sanction of lessee's eviction, held not to require reversal, where no evidence was printed covering such issue (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

8. Appeal and error ☞1071(6).

Failure to find on issue requires reversal only when issue would affect judgment and different finding might have been made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Miriam Nathan against William J. Locke and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

H. A. Postlethwaite, of San Francisco, for appellants.

William Klein and Arthur H. Barendt, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for contribution against each of the defendants upon a final judgment which had been rendered against the three. Plaintiff had a several judgment against each of the defendants, from which they join in an appeal upon typewritten transcripts.

The three parties were co-owners of real property situated in Mendocino county. Plaintiff held an undivided one-half interest, and each of the defendants held an undivided one-quarter interest in the property. The three owners joined in a written lease to one Miller on May 16, 1922. In September, 1922, Miller notified the plaintiff herein that he would be unable to pay the balance of the rent due in October of that year, and offered to give her a note for it. Such a note was taken by the plaintiff and handed to the defendants herein, who declined to accept the note, unless it was secured by a mortgage on the fall crops. Demand was thereupon made upon the lessee that such a mortgage be given, but the note was not returned to him. Thereafter a controversy arose between the lessors and the lessee as to the right of the latter to cut and remove wood from the premises, and, as a result of this controversy and the matter of the unsecured note, notice was given to the lessee to deliver possession of the property to an agent of the lessors, and about the same time suit was commenced against the lessee on account of the October installment of rent, in which wood which he had cut upon the premises was attached. The lessee vacated the premises a few days later, and thereupon brought an action for damages against the three lessors. The cause was tried before a jury in Mendocino county, and resulted in a verdict for the lessee in the sum of $2,500. This judgment was appealed to the District Court of Appeal and affirmed. Thereafter, being threatened with execution upon her property located in Mendocino county, the plaintiff in this action paid the judgment, with the costs and attorneys' fees incurred in defending the action, amounting to something over $3,500. She then commenced this proceeding, demanding from her co-lessors contribution to her of their proportion of the amount paid, based upon their individual interest in the property which was under lease.

[1] The one issue involved in this appeal is whether the action maintained in Mendocino county was ex contractu or ex delicto. It is conceded that in this state there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors. 6 Cal. Jur. 512. If, therefore, the Mendocino action was one in tort, the respondent herein may not seek contribution from the appellants.

[2, 3] In determining whether an action is on the contract or in tort, the general rule is that the character of the action is to be determined by the nature of the grievance rather than by the form of the pleadings. Ft. Smith & W. R. Co. v. Ford, 34 Okl. 575, 126 P. 745, 746, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 745; 1 C. J. p. 1015. Another rule which is universally accepted in determining the nature of an action of this kind is that, when it is not clear to which class the action belongs, it will ordinarily be construed as in contract rather than in tort. 1 C. J. p. 1015. The reason for this rule is that the construction should be against the pleader and the liability in contract is less extensive than the liability in tort. May v. Georger et al., 21 Misc. Rep. 622, 47 N. Y. S. 1057, 1059. Another guide is noted in 1 Corpus Juris, p. 1016, where it is said: "Where a complaint states a cause of action in contract and it appears that this is the gravamen of the complaint, the nature of the action is not changed by the fact that there are also allegations in regard to tortious conduct on the part of defendant.

* * * Conversely, if the complaint states a cause of action in tort and it appears that this is the gravamen of the complaint, the nature of the action is not changed by allegations in regard to the existence or breach of a contract." Illustrations of the latter class of actions are those for damages arising out of the contract relations between bailor and bailee, carrier and passenger, master and servant, innkeeper and guest, etc. In such cases the tort which is the basis of the claim for damages lies in the breach of the duty imposed by law, and the allegations of the contract relations between the parties are merely for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff was not a trespasser or that he was lawfully in the position or situation at the time the defendant's breach occurred. On the other hand, if there is no liability except that arising out of the breach of a purely contractual duty the action must be in contract, and an action in tort cannot be maintained. Illustrations of this class are found in the cases cited in the note, 1 Corpus Juris, p. 1016.

[4, 5] As between landlord and tenant, where the lease contains a covenant for quiet enjoyment, the usual remedy for the tenant is an action for a breach of the covenant. 36 C. J. 82, and cases cited. Where the breach of the covenant amounts to an eviction, either actual or constructive, the tenant may sue for damages resulting from the eviction, but, if the tenant's damage is a result of the lessor's failure to perform the covenant of quiet enjoyment only, and not the result of a trespass or other overt act on the part of the lessor, then, under the rules heretofore discussed, the presumption would be that the action is on the contract. Putting it in another way, if the acts complained of were actionable only because of the contract, and there is no negligence or breach of duty distinct from the breach of promise under the contract, the case is ex contractu. Tuttle v. George H. Gilbert Mfg. Co., 145 Mass. 169, 13 N. E. 465, 467.

[6] With these rules in mind, we may refer briefly to the amended complaint upon which the Mendocino trial was had. The execution of the lease containing the covenant for peaceable and quiet enjoyment was first pleaded. It was then alleged that, notwithstanding the terms of this covenant, the lessors evicted and ejected the lessee from the possession of the property, and that, if he had been allowed to continue in the peaceable possession thereof he would have obtained in profit from farming the land leased for the remainder of the term a sum of $6,500. It is also alleged that the plaintiff had prepared a portion of the land and sown the same to grain at an expense to him of $271.50, that he had also made permanent improvements to the land to the value of $550, and that he had been prevented from obtaining the profits from the sale of wood cut on the land which he was permitted to cut under the terms of the lease and which profits would have amounted to $750. Other items were listed under special allegations of financial loss to the lessee which were attributed solely to the lessors' failure to perform the covenant of undisturbed and peaceable possession of the premises. No overt act constituting a trespass or act of negligence on the part of the lessors was alleged, but the whole theory of the complaint, including the prayer, was based upon the loss of anticipated profits which the lessee would have received if he had been allowed to continue in the peaceable and undisturbed possession of the premises. We are satisfied from our examination of the pleading that the action was based upon the contract and was not an action in tort.

On this appeal the appellants insist that we cannot reach this determination upon a review of the pleadings in the former trial, but that we are bound by certain language found in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal on the appeal from that judgment. Miller v. Nathan, 87 Cal. App. 185, 261 P. 1047. Stress is laid upon the language of that decision, where it is said that, after the lessee vacated the premises, an action was brought for damages for the "eviction," and that upon the review of the evidence in the case the district court affirmed the judgment, holding that such evidence was sufficient to justify the judgment "as to the eviction." But, if the court in that case had been called upon to determine whether the eviction relied on was forcible or constructive, it would have been compelled to hold that it was constructive merely because of the allegations of the complaint. We have heretofore said that in cases of this character the action may be one upon the contract or it may be one in tort. But, where the pleadings upon which the action was tried unmistakably stamp the action as one upon the contract, we are not permitted to find it to be otherwise because of language in the opinion of the appellate court, where the point was not before that court to be decided.

[7] One other point raised by appellants requires attention. It is argued that the judgment herein must be reversed because the trial court failed to make a finding upon appellants' separate defense to the effect that respondent falsely represented to them the facts regarding the conduct of the tenant, and that by reason of such false representations they were led to sanction the actions of this respondent, which resulted in the eviction of the tenant, and which became the basis of the judgment in the Mendocino court.

[8] No evidence is printed covering the issue, as is required by section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, and the appellants have therefore wholly failed to disclose any prejudicial error. The failure of the trial court to find upon an issue raised by either party requires a reversal only when it is shown that the issue is material to and would affect the judgment, and that the evidence was such that a different finding might have been made. 2 Cal. Jur. p. 1034. The principle is stated in Cutting Fruit Packing Co. v. Canby, 141 Cal. 692, 696, 75 P. 564, 565: "Error is not to be presumed, and, if the appellant would contend that the court should have found * * * it was incumbent upon him to cause the record to show that such finding was required by the evidence." Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 106, 23 P. 1098; Pre-luzsky v. Pacific Co-operative C. Co., 195 Cal. 290, 295, 232 P. 970.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by G. L. Richards against J. G. Tavares. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Herman A. Bachrack and Brownstone & Goodman, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clark & Heafey, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered against him on two promissory notes, one for $5,000 and the other for $1,000. The notes were executed to the Latham Square Corporation and by it assigned to the plaintiff. Defendant alleged that the notes were conditional obligations payable only in the event that certain units of the stock of the corporation were sold by him, which was not done. The same contention is made on appeal, and, further, that the trial court erroneously permitted the plaintiff to amend his complaint to conform to the proof.

The facts are as follows: The commissioner of corporations on June 19, 1925, granted the corporation a permit to sell and issue six thousand shares of its preferred capital stock and six thousand shares of its common stock in units of one share of preferred and one share of common stock for the price of $120 per unit. On August 20, 1925, the corporation entered into an agreement with defendant by which he was appointed its sole and exclusive agent for the sale of the units mentioned, it being provided therein "that all expenses in connection with the sale of said stock, including advertising and circularization as well as salaries or commissions to the salesmen, are to be paid" by the defendant. It was also provided that the agreement should continue in force to and including March 1, 1926, the defendant agreeing to sell on or before that date 3000 units, in which event the contract was to remain in force for six months thereafter. Between August 20, 1925, and November 20, 1925, the corporation loaned to defendant the sum of $4,000 to assist him in the expense of selling the stock, and on the last-mentioned date the further sum of $1,000 was loaned for the same purpose. On that date the first note for $5,000 was executed by defendant, and at the same time the following memorandum was signed by him and the secretary of the corporation, the George G. Jamieson mentioned therein being its president:

"Memorandum of understanding had between George G. Jamieson, Maury I. Diggs and J. G. Tavares this 20th day of November, 1925.

"Having advanced prior to this date the sum of $5,000.00 to J. G. Tavares in accordance with our previous understanding for expense money for the Latham Square Corporation stock sales matter, it is understood by the parties hereto that when and as J. G. Tavares had sold 2,000 units of the Latham Square Corporation stock, that thirty days thereafter said J. G. Tavares is to repay said $5,000 advanced in the following manner, to wit:

"Commencing 30 days after the sale of the said 2,000 units the sum of $1,000.00 is to be repaid.

"60 days after the sale of said 2,000 units the sum of $2,000 is to be repaid.

"90 days after the sale of said 2,000 units the sum of $2,000 is to be repaid.

"As specified above the total sum of $5,000.00 is to be repaid within 90 days after the sale of said 2,000 units, said moneys to bear no interest.

"It is understood that the above-mentioned $5,000.00 is a sum which has been advanced to J. G. Tavares as a loan to assist him in the expense of the sale of said capital stock and is to be repaid in the manner above outlined.

"M. I. Diggs

"J. G. Tavares."

The note, by its terms, was payable in accordance with the above memorandum. The defendant not having sold 3,000 units of the stock by March 1, 1926, as required by the original agreement, at a meeting on April 6, 1926, the following letters were written and exchanged between them:

"April 6th, 1926.

"Mr. J. G. Tavares.

"Dear Sir:

"According to the terms of your contract you were to have sold 3,000 units of the capital stock of the Latham Square Corporation by March 1, 1926. To date this has not been accomplished. Please be advised that according to the terms of your contract the contract became null and void on March 1, 1926.

"Any sales that you are able to make in the future we will be pleased to accept, reserving the right, however, to stop the sale of our capital stock at any time hereafter.

"If this is satisfactory please acknowledge the same.

"Yours very truly,

"Latham Square Corporation,
"G. L. Richards, Treasurer."

"Oakland, Cal., April 6th, 1926.

"Latham Square Corporation.

"Gentlemen:

"I acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 6th, 1926, informing me that I have not sold 3,000 units of the capital stock of the Latham Square Corporation by March 1, 1926, in accordance with the terms of our contract, and that therefore said contract has expired.

"I will be pleased to proceed with the sale of said units of capital stock, and hereby give you the right to stop the sale of same at any time.

"It is understood that you are to advance moneys to be used for expenses in the sale of said units of stock, and that same will be repaid by me out of commissions accruing on sales of said units, but should you terminate the sale of said units at any time then said loans up to a limit of $3,000 will be considered to have been satisfied and liquidated.

"Yours very truly, J. G. Tavares."

"April 6th, 1926.

"Mr. J. G. Tavares.

"Dear Sir:

"In consideration of advancing you a loan of $1,000 this day, for which we have taken your note payable in 90 days, please be advised that this loan is made with the expressed condition that the money so advanced to you is to be used only for expenses pertinent to the sale of the capital stock of the Latham Square Corporation.

"You agree to submit to us vouchers showing that the money has been spent for this particular purpose and no other.

"Yours very truly,

"Latham Square Corporation,
"G. L. Richards, Treasurer."

Simultaneously with the exchange of these letters and as part of the same transaction, a further loan of $1,000 was made to the defendant, and the note sued upon was executed by him. This note was dated April 6, 1926, and made payable 90 days after its date. Thereafter the defendant continued to sell stock, and on October 5, 1926, received the following letter from the corporation:

"October 5, 1926.

"J. G. Tavares.

"Dear Sir:

"Please be advised from this date on we will not accept stock subscriptions from any one other than the sales made by salesmen who are operating under a corporate permit and directly in the employment of the Latham Square Corporation Securities Department and working from this headquarters.

"Yours truly,

"Latham Square Corporation,
"M. I. Diggs, Secretary."

His reply was as follows:

"October 9, 1926.

"Latham Square Corporation,

"Attention M. I. Diggs, Secretary.

"Gentlemen:

"This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 5th as well as to confirm my conversation with your Mr. Diggs of yesterday with respect to said letter. I would have replied to this letter sooner but it arrived at my office while I was out of town, and immediately on my return I endeavored to locate Mr. Diggs on the telephone and only succeeded in doing so yesterday.

"My understanding with Mr. Diggs is that I am not to solicit any new sales of the capital stock of your company, but that I may however complete such sales which were solicited by me prior to the receipt of your said letter of October 5th, and that you will accept the same and pay me my regular commission therefor. I have spent a great deal of time and effort in such prospective sales which I now have pending, and I expect you to allow me up to and including the 15th of October in which to complete the same. In other words, after October 15th, 1926, our existing arrangement is to be entirely terminated.

"Please confirm this understanding to me.

"Very truly yours, J. G. Tavares."

To the latter communication the corporation made no reply, but accepted sales of stock from the defendant to and including October 15, 1926, and the present action was filed on December 30, 1926.

The memorandum of November 20, 1925, referred to the completion of the sale of 2,000 units of the stock as the date, after which the $5,000 first advanced to defendant should be repaid in installments as therein provided, and the complaint alleged that to and including July 1, 1926, more than that number of units had been sold by the defendant. It was shown at the trial, however, that the total number of units sold by him from August 20, 1925, to October 15, 1926, was 1,747, for which he received commissions amounting to $34,940; the commissions received from sales made after April 6, 1926, being the sum of $13,040.

It appears that the taking of testimony in the case was concluded on October 27, 1927, and that thereafter on February 3, 1928, the court, without notice to the defendant, granted the plaintiff leave to amend his complaint to conform to the proofs by striking out the allegation last mentioned and inserting the following in lieu thereof: "That said defendant has failed, neglected and refused to sell 2,000 units of the capital stock of said Latham Square Corporation; that said defendant has had a reasonable time within which to sell 2,000 units of the capital stock of said corporation, and that said reasonable time expired March 1, 1926." The order further provided that the allegations of the amendment were deemed denied. The amendment was filed on February 3, 1928, and on the same date a copy thereof, together with a copy of the proposed findings, was noticed for presentation to the court on February 9, 1928, and was signed and filed on February 28, 1928.

That under the contract of August 20, 1925, all expenses in connection with the sale of the stock were to be paid by the defendant, and that the amount evidenced by the promissory note for $5,000 was advanced as a loan to assist him in making such sales is undisputed. He contends, however, that his obligation to repay this sum was modified by the memorandum of November 20, 1925, and thereafter depended upon the condition that at least 2,000 units of the stock be sold by him.

[1, 2] The original contract was to remain in force until March 1, 1926, within which time defendant agreed to sell 3,000 units. The memorandum of November 20, 1925, indicates no intention to extend the contract, and that such was not its purpose is shown by the letters of April 26, 1926, wherein defendant was notified that his contract had expired, to which he assented, stating that he would be pleased to proceed with the sale of stock, the corporation to have the right to stop such sales at any time. That the parties at the time the memorandum was executed contemplated a sale of at least 2,000 units before the expiration of the original contract may fairly be inferred from the above, and supports the finding of the trial court that a reasonable time within which to dispose of this amount of stock expired on that date. It further appears, however, that following his request defendant continued to sell until October 15, 1926, on which date he had disposed of but 1,747 units; and that on October 9, 1926, in response to the company's letter of October 5, 1926, he stated that, according to his understanding with the secretary of the company, " * * * after October 15, 1926, our existing arrangement is to be entirely terminated." Whether the defendant failed to dispose of the 2,000 units within a reasonable time, or within the period contemplated by the parties, or the agreement was terminated by mutual consent before that number had been sold, is not material to the right of the plaintiff to recover.

Contrary to defendant's claim, the advances were not gifts, but loans; and when the defendant failed to perform, as found, or the contractual relation between the parties was terminated by agreement, as shown by defendant's letter, these amounts became due and payable. Williston v. Perkins, 51 Cal. 554; Rosenheim v. Howze, 179 Cal. 309, 176 P. 456; Looney v. Scott, 71 Cal. App. 308, 235 P. 76; Green v. Darling, 73 Cal. App. 700, 239 P. 70; Dugan v. Phillips, 77 Cal. App. 268, 246 P. 566; Noland v. Bull, 24 Or. 479, 33 P. 983. While it is the general rule that where a note is payable on the happening of a contingency, the payee, in order to recover, must show that such contingency has happened (Sanders v. Whitesides, 10 Cal. 88; McLaughlin v. Clausen, 85 Cal. 322, 24 P. 636), as the court said in Hogan v. Globe Mutual, etc., Ass'n, 140 Cal. 610, 74 P. 153, 154, quoting with approval from De Wolfe v. French, 51 Me. 420: "If the debt is understood to be absolute, and the happening of the future event is fixed upon as a convenient time for payment merely, and, for some unforeseen or unthought-of cause, the event never happens, the creditor's right to recover will not be defeated. The law will require the payment to be made within a reasonable time after it is ascertained that the event will not happen. The debt will be contingent or otherwise, depending on the intention of the parties."

[3, 4] The above is peculiarly applicable to the facts of the present case. That the obligation to repay the advances was absolute at the time the same were made admits of no reasonable doubt; and the implied conclusion of the trial court that the event subsequently fixed upon for payment was merely for the convenience of the defendant is fully supported by the evidence. The note for $1,000 was executed on April 6, 1926, and was payable 90 days after its date. As appears from the letters of the same date, this sum the defendant agreed to use exclusively for expenses in connection with the sale of the stock, and to furnish vouchers showing that it had been used for no other purpose; but the evidence shows and the court found that the defendant failed to use any part of it for that purpose. While the parties further agreed that should defendant's authority to sell the stock be terminated the above, with any future advances made by the corporation up to $3,000, should be considered to have been satisfied, nevertheless, having failed to use the money for the agreed purpose, the breach resulted in a failure of consideration for the loan and gave the plaintiff the right to recover the amount advanced. Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 2; McDonald v. Pacific Debenture Co., 146 Cal. 667, 80 P. 1090; Morlock v. Fink, 81 Cal. App. 686, 254 P. 578.

[5-7] The allowance of amendments to conform to the proofs rests in the discretion of the trial court. Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 P. 44. Such amendments may be allowed after the submission of the cause (Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 P. 549, 955; Hancock v. Board of Education, supra; Myers v. Holton, 9 Cal. App. 114, 98 P. 197), and are deemed denied (Bank of Italy v. Johnson, 200 Cal. 1, 251 P. 784). In the case at bar a copy of the amendment was served on the day the same was filed, and on February 9, 1928, the order for judgment was entered. The findings and judgment, however, were not filed until February 28, 1928. No request that the cause be reopened for the purpose of permitting the defendant to produce further evidence on the question presented by the amendment was made in the meantime, and it is not contended that all the facts relevant to the issue were not adduced at the trial. Before it can be held that the allowance of such an amendment was an abuse of discretion, it must be shown that the adverse party has been prejudiced thereby (McClure v. Alberti, 190 Cal. 348, 212 P. 204), and no reasonable ground for this conclusion appears in the present case. No judgment can be set aside for error in any matter of procedure unless after an examination of the entire record the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½. The record shows that the findings of the trial court were fully supported by the evidence, and no error appears which in our opinion would warrant a reversal of the judgment or justify the conclusion that the result was a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

5. Prohibition ⇨10(2).

Where superior court had jurisdiction to determine questions presented on application for prohibition, writ to restrain superior court from proceeding was refused.

Corporation which had conveyed its property to designated trustees for purposes of liquidation after expiration of trust brought action in superior court against trustees for an accounting. Trustees contended that corporation's right to an accounting was dispute required to be submitted to arbitration under terms of trust agreement, and therefore applied for writ of prohibition to restrain superior court from proceeding with case.

Original application by G. I. Fischer and another for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County to restrain proceedings commenced therein, on the ground that the issues are referable to arbitration.

Writ denied.

NORTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition directed to the superior court in and for the County of Los Angeles commanding said court to refrain from further proceedings.

in an action therein commenced on the ground that the issues involved in such action are referable to arbitration.

The plaintiff in the suit in question entered into an agreement bearing date May 2, 1929, wherein it conveyed to three trustees all its assets for the purpose of converting them into cash and liquidating its indebtedness. The contract provided that, when the indebtedness of the debtor and all expenses of administration of the trust had been paid in full, the trustees were to pay any balance remaining to the debtor. It further provided that the trust should terminate three months from the date of the execution of the contract unless the term thereof was extended by consent in writing of two of the principal creditors, who were parties to the agreement, or unless the trustees decided to terminate the trust prior to such time. It contained the further provision that, "In case any dispute arise between the trustees and any of the creditors or debtor as to the amount or validity of any debt or claim, or as to any other matter under or concerning this agreement, then every such dispute shall be referred to the arbitration of three persons."

The debtor, Abrasive Engineering Corporation of California, commenced an action in the above superior court in which it seeks an accounting of the administration of the trust and of the properties conveyed by, or received from, the trustees. In its complaint this plaintiff alleges that all of its assets, together with its good will, have been conveyed by the trustees; that the trust terminated on the 2d day of August, 1929, pursuant to the provisions of the contract to that effect; that the trustees are not pursuing or carrying out the provisions of the contract in connection with the liquidation of the affairs of plaintiff, and that, prior to the commencement of the action, and on or about the 12th day of September, 1929, plaintiff in writing demanded of the trustees that they render an account of the administration of the trust, and that the trustees and each of them have failed, neglected, and refused to render any account of any character whatever of their administration of the trust. An application by two of the defendant trustees to stay the action until arbitration was had was denied by the superior court.

The answer of these defendant trustees denies certain of the allegations of the complaint, but, for the purposes of this opinion, it is unnecessary to set forth the scope of these denials. The plaintiff's right to relief will depend upon the proofs adduced at the trial, but its right to be heard should in this proceeding be determined by the allegations of its complaint. For the purposes of this case, we are presented with a situation where all the trust property has been conveyed by the trustees, the trust has expired, and the trustees are no longer operating thereunder, and the matter for decision is whether the demand for an accounting in such circumstances is a dispute as to any matter under or concerning the trust agreement.

[1] A fair construction of the language of the agreement would appear to limit the provision for arbitration to differences of opinion regarding the interpretation of the contract and the administration of the trust. Disputes as to the time when or terms on which the property should be sold and kindred controversies which involve the recognition and carrying out of the trust agreement are those which are to be determined by arbitration. In Young v. Crescent Development Co., 240 N. Y. 244, 148 N. E. 510, the arbitration clause provided for the submission of "all questions that may arise under this contract and in the performance of the work thereunder." The court said: "We know by common experience the class of questions to which this language naturally applies. It applies as stated to questions arising under and in the performance of a contract and such questions are those which involve an interpretation of its provisions for the purpose of determining whether work has been done according to the contract, whether work which has been demanded under the contract is really covered by its provisions or constitutes extra work, when payments become due, and so on. All of these questions involve recognition of the contract and not repudiation of it."

The record in the present case discloses no dispute regarding any matter which is within the fair meaning of the arbitration clause of the contract. In fact, it discloses no dispute of any character except as to plaintiff's right to an accounting upon the termination of the trust.

[2] The arbitration statutes of this state contemplate a controversy either existing or which may subsequently arise out of the contract containing the arbitration provisions. Code Civ. Proc. § 1230.

[3] In the case at bar, no issue is tendered involving the interpretation of the contract, and no controversy has yet developed concerning what has been done under it. The only hint of disagreement in the record would involve conduct in repudiation and not a recognition of the contract, but plaintiffs in this case merely seek an account of the proceedings of the trustees. It is the opinion of the court that plaintiffs have this right, and that it arises from the familiar jurisdiction of courts of equity to compel an accounting of trust relations, and should not be stayed by the provision for submission to arbitration of disputes as to matters under or concerning the contract.

[4, 5] We believe the application for the writ of prohibition should be denied for the further reason that the respondent court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and the jurisdiction to determine the question whether the issue involved in the pending suit is referable to arbitration is vested in the trial court by the provisions of sections 1283 and 1284 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court had the right and power to decide this question, and, if it was not satisfied that the issue was referable, to so decide and to proceed thereupon to try the action. If the trial court decided erroneously, it was error committed in the exercise of its jurisdiction, to be reviewed upon appeal from the judgment.

The writ is denied.

JOHNSTON v. LIFFMAN.
Civ. 7238.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

1. Judgment ⇨143(3) — Vacation — Surprise.

Applications for relief from judgment on ground of surprise, inadvertence, and excusable neglect are addressed to trial court's sound discretion.

2. Appeal and error ⇨957(1) — Discretion of court — Default — Vacation.

Order setting aside default will not be disturbed on appeal, in absence of showing of abuse of discretion.

3. Judgment ⇨143(11) — Dismissal — Default — Vacation — Time of trial — Misunderstanding.

Order setting aside judgment dismissing action held not abuse of discretion, where plaintiff showed his failure to appear at hearing was due to telephone message advising of postponement.

Plaintiff's attorneys, in reliance on the telephone message, presumably from the clerk of court, failed to appear at the time originally set, and defendant procured an order dismissing the action for want of prosecution. There was a further showing of merits of plaintiff's case and of injury suffered by the dismissal.

TYLER, P. J.

Appeal from an order vacating an order and judgment dismissing an action for want of prosecution.

Plaintiff, respondent herein, commenced an action on a certain trade acceptance. After the taking of depositions, the case was set for trial on June 24, 1927, and was at that time partially tried. The cause was then continued until June 28, following. Plaintiff failed to appear at this time, and because of such failure the action was dismissed without prejudice. Immediately thereafter, on August 1, 1927, respondent's attorneys served upon the attorney for the appellant a notice of motion to vacate the judgment of dismissal above referred to on the grounds of surprise, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. The notice of motion was based upon certain affidavits. These affidavits showed that the failure of respondent to appear at the time set for the hearing was due to confusion in telephone messages concerning the hearing. The affidavits set forth that one of the attorneys for respondent received a telephone call, presumably from the clerk of the court, on July 27, 1927, informing him that the case would be called the following day, at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. instead of 10 a. m., as originally set, and that, in the event plaintiff was not ready to proceed, to advise the attorneys for the defendant. On the same day the stenographer employed by respondent received a similar communication. It further appeared that respondent desired to file an amendment and supplement to his complaint, and had served a notice of motion that the same be heard at 2 o'clock p. m. on the 28th day of July, 1927, believing that, pursuant to the telephone calls heretofore mentioned, the case would be called at that time. There was also a showing made of the merits of respondent's case, and of injury by the dismissal, justifying the granting of relief. Counter affidavits were filed by the clerk of the court and appellant's attorney. After the court had considered the affidavits, an order was made vacating the dismissal and setting the case for completion of trial. The order was conditioned upon the payment by respondent of the sum of $25 for the benefit of appellant. It is from the order mentioned that this appeal is taken by defendant.

[1-3] Applications for relief in cases of this character are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. In the absence of a showing of abuse in the exercise of such discretion, the order of the lower court setting aside a default will not be disturbed on appeal. Respondent made a sufficient showing for the relief prayed for and also of the merits of his case and of injury by the dismissal to justify the court's order granting him relief.

The law governing this class of cases is so well settled and has been so often declared in the decisions of our appellate courts that no further comment is necessary. Rogers v. Schneider (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 451.

The order is affirmed.

NORTON, Justice pro tem.

[1, 2] This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and respondent against the defendants for the recovery of the balance due upon two promissory notes executed by the defendants Castro and indorsed by the defendant Beltzhoover. The defendant Beltzhoover alone appeals from the judgment. Upon the trial she denied that she indorsed the notes, and contended that the indorsement of her name upon the notes was not in her handwriting. She presents two grounds for the reversal of the judgment: Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and irregularity in the proceedings of the court by which she was prevented from having a fair trial. While Mrs. Beltzhoover testified in the most positive manner that she did not indorse the notes for the Castros, the court was not bound by her testimony, and it was for the court to determine how much weight to accord it in view of all the evidence in the case. From the testimony and all the circumstances and evidence in the case the court was amply justified in concluding that she did indorse the notes, and the findings in that regard are fully supported. There is evidence to show, aside from the opinion evidence on the question of whether the indorsement was in her handwriting, that she negotiated the loan from the plaintiff bank for the Castros upon the understanding and agreement that she would indorse the notes for them; that she brought the notes to the bank with her indorsement upon them, and directed that the amount of the notes be credited to the Castro account; that she took a note from the Castros secured by a chattel mortgage upon the property to secure her indorsement which she placed upon the note given the plaintiff and that she admitted having indorsed the notes.

After a careful reading of the record, we are at loss to understand how any other view could be taken of the case than that finally adopted by the trial court.

[3] The second point for reversal is predicated upon what occurred after plaintiff and appellant had rested their case. After counsel for appellant had concluded his argument, the trial judge, in discussing the case from the bench, indicated that he had been examining the questioned signature indorsed on the notes and comparing it with the exemplars in evidence, and had formed the opinion from his own study of the handwriting that it was not appellant's. Upon this candid disclosure by the judge of the opinion formed by him of the genuineness of Mrs. Beltzhoover's indorsement upon the notes arising from his independent examination of them during the course of the trial, the attorney for respondent, after some discussion of the evidence with the judge, suggested that if he was in doubt he could appoint a professional expert. The court finally acted upon the suggestion and stated: "In order to avoid any embarrassment I think the best thing to do since counsel have agreed to it is that I have an expert and I will name the expert without either side knowing about who he is prior to his coming into court and testifying." The case was thereupon continued, and in the interim the trial judge selected a handwriting expert, who appeared and testified when the trial was resumed upon the day to which it had been finally continued. If the proceedings resulting in a continuance of the case and the selection of a professional handwriting expert were in some of its features unique, the appellant made no objection thereto, and it does not appear that she was denied any of her legal rights. The professional handwriting expert was produced in open court, sworn, and examined by the court. The appellant was accorded ample opportunity to test the accuracy of his opinion by cross-examination, and to rebut his testimony by other evidence if he chose to do so.

The court had the right to appoint a handwriting expert if he deemed the occasion required it. Code Civ. Proc. § 1871. And we find no irregularity in the proceeding that deprived appellant of a fair trial.

We have considered the other points raised and are satisfied that they are devoid of any merit.

Judgment affirmed.

CHRIST v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.*
Civ. 7338.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

April 14, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 9, 1930. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 12, 1930.

1. Mandamus §4(1) — Right of appeal — Speedy or adequate remedy.

Right of appeal is not always speedy or adequate remedy sufficient to present issue ance of writ of mandamus (Code Civ. Proc. § 1086).

2. Mandamus §154(7) — Petition — Specific demand — Sufficiency.

Petition for mandamus was not insufficient because of failure to allege specific demand, which if made, would have been futile.

The petition of mandamus was to require the superior court to issue a commission for taking of testimony of witnesses on letters rogatory, and alleged that the respondent refused to take any steps whatever to compel witness to attend taking of deposition conceiving that it was without jurisdiction to grant relief so that formal demand for relief prayed for would have been futile.

3. Mandamus §151(1) — Judge — Vacation of position — Issuance of writ.

Fact that judge to whom writ of mandate was directed had vacated position subsequent to issuance of alternative writ was immaterial.

The proceeding in mandamus was directed to court and not to any individual member or to any particular department thereof.

4. Depositions §27 — Jurisdiction — Letters rogatory from foreign jurisdiction.

Superior court had jurisdiction under statute to order taking deposition on letters rogatory issued out of court of record of foreign jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2021, 2035, 2036a, 2083, 2084).

5. Depositions §39 — Commission to take testimony — Letters from foreign jurisdiction — Action or special proceeding.

Commission to take testimony may issue on letters from foreign jurisdiction showing pendency of either action or special proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2035, 2036a).

6. Evidence §81 — Law of foreign jurisdiction — Presumption — Deposition.

Court, in absence of contrary showing, must presume that law of foreign jurisdiction in respect to deposition is the same as that of state.

7. Mandamus §40 — Issuance of writ — Deposition — Letters rogatory — Court of foreign jurisdiction.

Writ of mandate will issue to require superior court to order taking of deposition pursuant to letters rogatory from court of foreign jurisdiction.

Original proceeding in mandamus by Rodolfo Christ against the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco and the Hon. James G. Conlan, as Presiding Judge thereof, to require the issuance of a commission for taking of testimony of two witnesses on letters rogatory issued out of a court of record of Guatemala.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is an original proceeding in mandamus to require the superior court to issue a commission for the taking of testimony of two witnesses upon letters rogatory issued out of a court of record of Guatemala.

The letters rogatory were presented to respondent court showing that the petitioner represented to the Guatemala court that he was about to commence an action against Adolfo Stahl and the American Finance & Commerce Company, for which it was necessary that the depositions of J. Beaumont and Frank L. Jackson, residing in the city and county of San Francisco, be taken. In the proceeding before the Guatemalan court the general nature of the questions to be asked these witnesses was stated, accompanied by a showing of the materiality of their testimony. This showing having been made to the respondent court, an order that the deposition of Frank L. Jackson be taken was made and a subpoena was issued pursuant to said order. Thereafter a motion was made on behalf of said witness to quash said subpoena upon the grounds that respondent court had no jurisdiction to make the order. This motion was granted, and respondent has since refused to take any other steps to compel attendance of said witness for the taking of his deposition in response to the letters issued by the Guatemalan court.

[1] Preliminarily respondents argue that this is not a proper case for mandamus because the petitioner has another remedy by appeal from the order to quash the subpoena. The remedy by appeal, conceding that there is such, is not always an answer to a petition for mandamus. This writ must be issued when "there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, in the ordinary course of law" (section 1086, Code Civ. Proc.); that the right of appeal is not always a speedy or adequate remedy is well settled. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co. v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 30, 39, 99 P. 359, 17 Ann. Cas. 933.

[2, 3] It is also argued that the petition is insufficient because it fails to allege a specific demand upon the respondent court to issue a new subpoena. Such a demand is excused when it appears that demand, if made, would have been futile. Here the petition alleges that the respondent refuses to take any steps whatever to compel the witness to attend the taking of his deposition and the answer admits this to be true. It thus appears that a formal demand for the relief prayed for would have been futile because the respondent court conceived that it was without jurisdiction to grant this relief. Such a demand was, therefore, unnecessary. 16 Cal. Jur., pp. 771, 772. Further objection is made by way of argument that the writ should not issue because subsequent to the issuance of the alternative writ herein the respondent James G. Conlan vacated the position of presiding judge of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and that another judge of that court has been chosen and is now acting as presiding judge thereof. The point is without merit, because this proceeding is directed to the superior court and not to any individual member or to any particular department thereof.

[4] Upon the merits of the case it is argued that the superior court is without jurisdiction to recognize the letters rogatory or to issue a subpoena for the taking of the deposition because it appears on the face of the petition that there is no action pending in the Guatemalan court. The authority to issue the commission upon letters issued out of a foreign jurisdiction is found in section 2036a, Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides that witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in the same manner and by the same process as may be employed for taking testimony for proceedings pending in this state. Section 2021 of the same Code provides that the testimony of a witness in this state may be taken by deposition in an action any time after the service of summons and in a special proceeding after a question of fact has arisen therein. If this were the only provision for the taking of a deposition of a witness in proceedings pending in this state, the argument of respondent would be sound, but sections 2083 et seq. of the same Code provide a complete method for the taking and perpetuation of the testimony of a witness when no other action is pending. Section 2084 permits the superior court to issue a commission for that purpose upon a petition showing "that the applicant expects to be a party to an action in a court in this state, and, in such case, the names of the persons whom he expects will be adverse parties; or * * * and, The name of the witness to be examined, his place of residence, and a general outline of the facts expected to be proved."

Respondent relies upon section 2035, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "any party to an action or special proceeding in a court or before a judge of a sister state, may obtain the testimony of a witness residing in this state, to be used in such action or proceeding." It is argued that section 2036a must be read in connection with 2035 so that a commission shall not issue upon letters coming from a foreign jurisdiction to a better advantage than upon letters coming from a sister state of the United States, and that under the provisions of section 2035 such a commission cannot issue in any case, except where an action or special proceeding is pending in the sister state. If it were conceded that such should be the proper interpretation of section 2036a, this would not aid the respondent. Under the provisions of section 2035, relating to depositions upon letters coming from a sister state, and under section 2021, relating to proceedings pending in this state, the commission to take a deposition of a witness is authorized whenever an action or a special proceeding is pending. It is true that under section 2021 a commission may not issue in a special proceeding until after a question of fact has arisen, but the term "special proceeding" as used in that section must be interpreted as including all special proceedings other than those to perpetuate testimony which are specially covered by sections 2083 et seq. of the same Code. Thus, when proceedings to perpetuate testimony are instituted under the provisions of the later sections, the deposition is to be issued in the manner therein prescribed, but there is no reason for holding that the term "special proceeding" as used in section 2035 in reference to matters pending in a sister state does not apply to both characters of special proceedings—those referred to in section 2021 and those referred to in sections 2083 et seq. of the Code.

[5] Therefore, if we are to read section 2036a with section 2035, the construction of the latter section must be that a commission to take testimony may issue upon letters from a foreign jurisdiction showing the pendency of either an action or special proceeding as the latter term is used in our Code.

[6] On the record before us we must presume, in the absence of a contrary showing, that the law of Guatemala is the same as that of California. Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 38 P. 89, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118; 5 Cal. Jur. 431. We must, therefore, presume that the proceedings instituted in Guatemala are like the proceedings authorized by sections 2083 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that it is pending until such testimony is completed and the deposition duly filed with the court out of which the commission issued.

[7] We do not deem it necessary to discuss the authorities cited from federal and other jurisdictions, for they are all based upon statutes in nowise similar to the Code sections above noted. The question presented here is simply one of interpretation of these

Code sections in which we are not aided by the citation of any California authorities. We are satisfied from our examination of the Code that the respondent court has full jurisdiction to make the order prayed for, and, such being the case, this writ should issue under the authority of San Francisco Gas & Electric Co. v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 30, 39, 99 P. 359, 17 Ann. Cas. 933.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Action by Joe Rapolla and wife against L. S. Goulart. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

G. L. Aynesworth and James W. Campbell, both of Fresno, for appellants.

Ray W. Hays, of Fresno, and C. W. Haswell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

Plaintiffs are husband and wife. On June 4, 1928, at about 9 o'clock in the evening, Catherine Rapolla was riding in a Ford delivery truck driven by Alfonso Zargossa, north, on Blythe avenue in the county of Fresno, state of California. Blythe avenue intersects North avenue at right angles. Defendant was driving his automobile in an easterly direction on North avenue, and the two cars collided in the intersection seriously injuring Mrs.

Rapolla and damaging defendant's automobile. The plaintiffs brought this action for injuries to Mrs. Rapolla, and defendant, besides denying his negligence and alleging contributory negligence, filed a cross-complaint for damages to his automobile.

It was alleged by plaintiffs that Mrs. Rapolla was riding with Zargossa as his guest. Defendant alleged that Zargossa was driving and operating the Ford truck as the agent of the plaintiffs and was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident.

The trial court found that Zargossa was acting as the agent of the plaintiffs in driving the automobile, and that he was then and there under the control and direction of Mrs. Rapolla. The trial court further found that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the operation of his automobile at the time of the accident, and that Zargossa was also guilty of negligence which directly contributed to, and was the proximate cause of, the accident, and of the damage and injury of the plaintiffs. Upon these findings judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal.

[1, 2] The witnesses in the court below evidently illustrated their testimony with a diagram or map of the scene of the accident and located the relative positions of the cars before and at the time of and after the accident by the use of various signs and marks on this map. It is not reproduced in the record, making it difficult for us to interpret and follow the details of the testimony of some of the witnesses. It is incumbent upon an appellant to produce a record showing error affirmatively, and attorneys should so try their cases, and prepare their records on appeal, that the errors, if any, may be easily recognized by the appellate court.

Plaintiffs complain of certain rulings of the trial court in sustaining objections to questions, the answers to which would tend to show the terms of the contract of employment of Zargossa, and also the conversation between Zargossa and Mrs. Rapolla, which would bear upon the question of whether or not she was his guest on the automobile trip at the time of the accident. The trial court sustained defendant's objections to these questions upon the ground that the evidence sought to be elicited was hearsay, the conversations not having taken place in the presence and hearing of the defendant.

[3, 4] The contract of employment of Zargossa was oral, and evidence tending to prove the terms of this contract must of necessity have been parol. The employment of Zargossa, together with its nature and the scope of his duties, was directly put in issue by the pleadings and was a fact to be determined by the trial court. The terms of a parol contract can only be proved by parol, and this evidence should have been admitted. The same reasoning applies to the conversation between Mrs. Rapolla and Zargossa relating to the automobile trip. Whether or not she was a guest of Zargossa was a fact to be determined by the trial court. The conversation between the two was admissible, as from this conversation, among other things, the trial court would have to draw its conclusion as to whether or not Mrs. Rapolla was a guest in the automobile on this particular occasion. Where a fact, such as the existence of and the construction to be placed upon a parol contract, is an issue in a case such as this, the conversation of the parties in fixing the terms of the contract is admissible, not as an exception to the rule against hearsay evidence, but as the best evidence obtainable upon the question at issue.

The rulings of the court complained of by plaintiffs, which we are considering, occurred principally during the examination of Mrs. Rapolla as a witness. Other witnesses for plaintiffs were allowed to testify concerning these same matters. It appears from the record that about eighteen months prior to the accident in question Zargossa was employed by Joe Rapolla to work on a farm owned by him. Zargossa was paid $60 per month, together with his board and lodging. Joe Rapolla devoted a large part of his time to conducting a meat market. Catherine Rapolla operated another store, and Zargossa took care of the farm. Besides the Ford delivery truck involved in the accident, the plaintiffs owned two other automobiles. Zargossa had driven these automobiles at different times and had assisted Joe Rapolla in the delivery of meats. He had also driven Catherine Rapolla around in the automobile at various times with the knowledge and consent of her husband. Upon these facts the trial court found that at the time of the accident in question Zargossa was acting as the agent of plaintiffs in driving the Ford truck.

[5, 6] This evidence was produced by the plaintiffs. Where the trial court makes an erroneous ruling excluding the evidence of one witness on a given point, but admits testimony of other witnesses produced by the same party on the same point, such evidence not being contradicted, the error is minimized, if not cured, and is not sufficiently prejudicial to require a reversal of the judgment under the facts of this case.

[7] There was evidence before the trial court that Zargossa was using the Ford delivery truck on the night of the accident with the consent of Joe Rapolla. As said in the case of Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., 39 Cal. App. 738, 179 P. 697, 698: "Under the recent case of McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 P. 417, and many authorities in other jurisdictions, proof of ownership of the automobile and its use at the time of the accident, under the permission of such owner, established a prima facie case of responsibility for the resulting injuries as against such owner."

The rule is also stated in Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, vol. 1, § 158 (6th Ed.), as follows: "When the plaintiff has suffered injury from the negligent management of a vehicle, car or carriage, it is sufficient prima facie evidence that the negligence was imputable to the defendant, to show that he was the owner of the thing, without proving affirmatively that the person in charge was the defendant's servant. It lies with the defendant to show that the person in charge was not his servant, leaving him to show if he can, that the property was not under his control at the time, and that the accident was occasioned by the fault of a stranger, an independent contractor, or other person, for whose negligence the owner would not be answerable." McWhirter v. Fuller, supra; Squires v. Riffe (Cal. App.) 287 P. 360.

Thus we have a disputable presumption of law that would attach any contributory negligence of Zargossa to the plaintiffs, or if not to Mrs. Rapolla, at least to her husband.

"Against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a disputable presumption, has no weight; but, where it is undertaken to prove the fact against the presumption, it still remains with the jury to say whether or not the fact has been proven; and, if not satisfied with the proof offered in its support, they are at liberty to accept the evidence of the presumption." Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358, 362.

[8] Until the trial judge found that the evidence in the case successfully overcame this presumption, he was authorized to consider it as evidence and act upon it. The presumption remained before him during the trial, and, he having found in accordance with it, the presumption remains before this court to support his findings. The only evidence offered by the plaintiffs to overcome this presumption was that of Joe Rapolla and Zargossa, which we have heretofore outlined. There is a strong inference from this testimony, if not a direct conclusion, that part of the duties of Zargossa's employment was to drive an automobile for Mrs. Rapolla.

"This court has frequently held that, even though all the facts are admitted or uncontradicted, nevertheless, if it appears that either one of two inferences may fairly and reasonably be deduced from those facts there still remains in the case a question of fact to be determined by the jury (or by the trial judge where the case is tried without a jury), and that the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial judge thereon cannot be set aside by this court on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. Anderson v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 170 Cal. 66, 148 P. 212. In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment. Woodard v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 519, 520, 153 P. 951; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 367, 139 P. 800. 'In reviewing a question of this kind, all the inferences reasonably possible from the evidence favorable to the plaintiff (the prevailing party) must be indulged by this court.' Bandle v. Commercial Bank of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 547, 174 P. 44, 45." Mah See v. North American Accident Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 44, 26 A. L. R. 123; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 7, 239 P. 332.

Under the authority of these decisions we believe the findings of the trial court as to the agency of Zargossa was supported by the evidence.

[9] The plaintiffs were permitted to introduce evidence as to the conversation between Mrs. Rapolla and Zargossa. Mrs. Rapolla desired to visit a relative on the night of the accident. Zargossa was at her residence, and when Mrs. Rapolla said that she was going to visit this relative, Zargossa replied, "I will take you." The two got into the automobile with Lena Cursi and started on the trip. Mrs. Rapolla and Zargossa were both permitted to testify to this conversation. Any error of the trial court in sustaining objections to questions calling for the conversation was cured by the subsequent rulings admitting the evidence from these same witnesses.

[10] The evidence shows that the automobile in which Mrs. Rapolla was riding left the home of her relative on Blythe avenue and proceeded north on this street to the intersection of North avenue at a rate of speed below twenty-five miles per hour. Commencing at a point about three hundred yards west of its intersection with Blythe avenue, North avenue descended gently to the east. An automobile traveling this road was plainly visible for considerable distance before reaching Blythe avenue. Mrs. Rapolla and Zargossa both saw defendant's car descend the grade. Zargossa testified that when he had about reached the south line of North avenue he saw defendant's car a few yards west of the west line of Blythe avenue. Both cars proceeded without stopping to the point of the collision, neither car traveling at a speed of over fifteen miles per hour. Defendant testified that the headlights of plaintiffs' car were not lighted, and that he did not see this automobile until just about the time of the collision. His testimony on this point was corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses. It was denied by several witnesses for plaintiffs. The court, however, had sufficient evidence before it to find that at the time of the accident, which was more than one-half hour after sunset, Mrs. Rapolla was riding in a car without its headlights being illuminated. The operation of an automobile at such time and place without its headlights burning is negligence per se (sections 99, 100, California Vehicle Act [St. 1923, p. 546]).

[11] Plaintiffs ask us to hold that under the facts of this case Mrs. Rapolla was under no legal obligation to warn Zargossa of any danger apparent at or near the intersection, as she was a guest in the automobile and had a right to suppose the driver would exercise due care and caution for the protection of both of them, citing the rule laid down in the case of Central of Georgia R. R. Co. v. Watkins (C. C. A.) 37 F.(2d) 710, to the effect that an invited guest riding in an automobile has no duty to direct the movements of a driver unless the guest has knowledge of a danger unknown, or not obvious, to the driver. Krause v. Rarity (Cal. App.) 285 P. 879. We do not believe that this statement of the law is applicable under the facts of the case we are considering. In the first place, the trial court found that Zargossa was the agent and servant of plaintiffs, which takes the case without the rule. In the second place, the court was justified in concluding that the Ford truck was traveling without headlights at the time of the accident. While it may not be necessary for a guest to warn a driver of a perfectly apparent danger that he could or did observe, still, if it became apparent to the guest that the driver did not observe the danger, it became her duty to take reasonable precautions for her safety and warn him. It would be negligence for one to knowingly ride with a driver who could not see, and equally negligent for one to knowingly ride with a driver who refused to see. It is also equally negligent for one to ride with a driver while knowing that he was obviously violating the law by driving an automobile on the highway at night without lights. As was said in the case of Randolph v. Hunt, supra: "If the owner of an automobile lends his machine to another, and on invitation becomes a passenger therein, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary the owner has the right, and, indeed, it is his duty to prevent, if possible, the driver from operating the machine in a reckless and dangerous manner and in violation of law. He cannot sit idly by and refrain from remonstrance at least while knowing that the driver is thus endangering the lives of others. If he has the opportunity to restrain the driver, and fails to take advantage of it, he should be held responsible for the consequences. This is the just view, and it is supported by the authorities. The general rule is stated in 28 Cyc. 38, as follows: 'Where an injury is inflicted by the use or operation of a motor vehicle upon the public highway the owner thereof is liable to respond in damages therefor if the vehicle was being operated by such owner or was under his control. * * * In all cases where the owner is present he will be responsible for injuries sustained by third persons unless the operator disobeys instructions as the owner is in law in control of the vehicle.'"

[12] Plaintiffs complain of the findings of the trial court that Zargossa was the agent of both of them because the evidence shows that he was hired by Joe Rapolla. Any money recovered by the plaintiffs in this case would be community property, and the negligence of either spouse contributing to the injury would bar the recovery of both. McFadden v. Santa Ana R. R. Co., 87 Cal. 464, 25 P. 681, 11 L. R. A. 252; Dunbar v. San Francisco R. R. Co., 54 Cal. App. 15, 201 P. 330. As the plaintiffs were husband and wife at the time of Zargossa's employment and at the time of the accident, and if, as found by the court, the driving an automobile for Mrs. Rapolla was one of the duties of his employment, it makes no difference whether he was the agent of one or both of the plaintiffs. The negligence of the agent within the scope of his employment is the negligence of the principal, and the contributory negligence of either or both of the plaintiffs would bar their recovery.

The rulings of the trial court complained of by the plaintiffs are not sufficiently prejudicial to require a reversal of the judgment, and the findings and judgment are supported by competent evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

LEDSON v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
Civ. 7223.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
April 22, 1930.

1. Master and servant §417(7).

Upon conflicting medical testimony whether abscessed testicle was caused by injury from truck operated by employee, finding of Industrial Accident Commission was conclusive.

2. Master and servant §417(7).

Findings of Industrial Accident Commission are subject to review only in so far as they have been made without any evidence to support them.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Lowell Ledson, claimant, opposed by Mowat & Edelman, a corporation, employer, and the Pacific Indemnity Company, insurance carrier. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying an award, claimant brings certiorari.

TYLER, P. J.

Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. It is claimed that the evidence does not justify the findings of fact that the disability complained of was not caused by an injury arising out of applicant's employment or that it was not caused by industrial injury.

The facts, briefly stated, show that petitioner was on March 5, 1929, in the employ of respondent Mowat & Edelman, a corporation, and such corporation was insured against workmen's compensation liability with the respondent Pacific Indemnity Company. The injury alleged by petitioner to have been suffered by him consistent in his being struck across the groin by the tailgate of a Ford truck which he was operating in the course of his employment and from which he was about to dump a load of dirt. Petitioner reported to his employer the fact of his injury on the day that it had occurred, but he continued in his work. Two days later he was troubled with sharp pains and was instructed by his employer to go to a hospital for an examination. An examination was had, and the physician who made the same discovered a swelling in his testicles, but concluded that this condition was not due to industrial employment, but rather to an infection. Thereafter his testicles commenced to swell, but petitioner remained in his employment until March 23, 1929, at which time he entered a hospital for treatment. Subsequently an abscess of the right testicle developed, and petitioner underwent an operation, and the diseased testicle was removed.

[1,2] On April 22, 1929, petitioner filed with respondent Industrial Accident Commission his application for adjustment of claim for compensation for injuries sustained in the course of his employment. At the hearing, petitioner testified that his injury was caused by being struck in the right groin and right testicle in the manner hereinabove recited. Upon the question of the cause of the condition from which petitioner was suffer-

TYLER, P. J.

Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Petitioner was employed as a woodsman by respondent Hobart Estate Company at its mills. He was self-insured. He claimed to have suffered a hernia while in the act of prying logs apart, during the course of his ing, the medical testimony was in direct conflict. Evidence was produced by petitioner to the effect that the origin of the abscess was not caused by any sexual disease or chronic condition, but could have been caused from the injury claimed to have been suffered by petitioner, as it could have been produced as a result of the rupture of a blood vessel in the testicle. These physicians, however, admitted on cross-examination that the abscess might have been the result of some foci of infection carried from nearby parts and originating from causes other than traumatic injuries. A physician called by respondents testified that an abscess very rarely resulted from a trauma to the testicle, but rather from a focus of infection in some other part of the body. He further testified that, if the condition had been caused by direct violence to the testicle through a blow or strain, the symptoms would have manifested themselves immediately and been evidenced by discoloration of the tissues, which were absent in the instant case. He was therefore of the opinion that the injury complained of was not industrial in character. The commission adopted this view, and found that the evidence did not establish as a fact that the applicant received an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, nor did it establish as a fact that the disability complained of was caused by an injury arising out of his employment. It was accordingly ordered that applicant take nothing from defendants by reason of the claim asserted in the proceeding. A petition for rehearing was made and denied, and the present proceeding followed. It is here claimed that the evidence does not justify the conclusion of the commission. It is elementary that the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission are subject to review only in so far as they have been made without any evidence whatever in support thereof. The jurisdiction of an appellate court in cases of this character is limited strictly to determining whether there is evidence sufficient to sustain the award. It is not the function of the courts to determine the credibility of the witnesses or the weight to be attached to their testimony. With these subjects we have nothing to do, as the commission is the final arbiter on questions of fact. It may be that a different conclusion could have been reached by the commission, and, had it been so reached, that it would have been fully supported by the evidence. Whatever our views may be upon the subject are of no consequence, as we have no power to disturb the findings of the Commission when supported by evidence. Its conclusion upon a question of fact upon conflicting evidence is final.

The award is affirmed.

employment. Application for adjustment of claim for compensation was filed with the Industrial Accident Commission. A hearing was had, and the commission found that the hernia complained of was not caused or exacerbated by injury arising out of and in the course of employment, and an award was made in favor of the employer. A rehearing was asked for and denied, and the present proceeding followed. At the hearing, petitioner was the sole witness to the facts out of which the injury arose. The only other witness was a physician employed by respondent Hobart Estate Company at its plant.

It is here claimed that the award denying compensation is without any evidence to support it. It is in substance as follows: Petitioner entered the employ of respondent Hobart Estate Company on or about the 5th day of May, 1929. His work consisted in hauling and cutting logs. On the third day of his employment he attempted to pry certain logs apart with a large pole. While thus engaged he experienced a pain in his groin which felt like some one sticking him with a needle. He lowered his trousers to make an examination, but saw nothing and proceeded with his work. A few days later he reported the matter to a fellow employee. About a week later he was transferred to a different camp, at which time he informed the superintendent of his trouble and expressed a desire to see the doctor employed by the company. On his way to the new camp he consulted this physician and informed him of his condition. The physician made a cursory examination and discovered a slight inguinal hernia about the size of the end of his thumb. He informed petitioner that he would perform an operation for the sum of $100. The applicant, being destitute of funds, did not avail himself of this offer. At the hearing the physician testified that while it was his duty to look after industrial injuries suffered by employees of the company without charge to them, he justified his demand upon petitioner on the ground that he was not certain that the hernia was of recent origin, and when asked for his reason in so concluding he testified that it was on account of applicant's delay in reporting his injury. He admitted that he was informed that the applicant had received an injury some three days after he entered the employ of the company, and had suffered some pain for about ten days. He also admitted that the applicant did not know he had received a hernia. He further testified that he could not say, from the examination he had made, whether the hernia was a new or an old one. This, in substance, is the entire evidence in the case.

[1-6] It is, of course, elementary that the jurisdiction of an appellate court in cases of this character is limited strictly to determining whether there is evidence to sustain the award. Where the findings of the commission are supported by evidence, though conflicting, we have no power to disturb them. Here, however, there is no conflict and a careful reading of the record shows that relief was denied upon the sole ground that petitioner having delayed reporting his injury to his employer for the short period above stated, it was impossible to determine at what time he developed the hernia. The facts do not sustain this conclusion. While it is true that the burden is upon the applicant to establish the fact of injury, still, where the injury is proven, and the employer contends that it is not a new one, but is the result of a former accident, the burden is upon him to prove his contentions. Delay of a few days, as here, in reporting the accident, does not establish nonexistence of a new injury. A workman, as most frequently happens, is unfamiliar with the development of injuries of this character and certain symptoms mean little or nothing to him unless they are objective and definitely pronounced. In such a situation the employer is bound by the surrounding facts and circumstances of the case, and where the applicant testifies in relation thereto and his story of how the accident happened is reasonable and not disputed, and such testimony conclusively shows an injury adequately accounted for, it is not overcome by the fact that it might, by some possibility, have resulted from some other cause not shown to exist. While awards cannot be based upon mere guess or conjecture, here there was proof that the origin of the hernia was recent, and when suffered was accompanied by pain; that it was immediately preceded by accidental strain; that it did not previously exist, and the rupture and strain were in close relation. This evidence, without more, is sufficient to compel a finding that the suffered hernia was proximately caused by the accident as testified to. In denying the applicant award, the commission departed from its former ruling in a case involving identical facts. In Jorgensen v. Healy-Tibbitts Const. Co., 2 Cal. Ind. Acc. Com. 56, where it appeared that an employee was engaged in heavy lifting and suddenly felt a sharp pain in his groin, though it was not definitely established whether the hernia was new or of old origin, it was held that such evidence was sufficient to establish a finding that the hernia was proximately caused by accident arising out of the employment. So here, the undisputed facts are sufficient to make a reasonable man conclude in the applicant's favor upon the vital points, and is adequate to prove his case. It was therefore binding upon the commission, and the latter could not, upon mere conjecture or guesswork, deny compensation. The law favors the payment of compensation. The statute upon which the claim is based was designed to protect, in proper cases, a workman against economic insecurity, and mere conjecture on the part of the commission should not deprive him of this benefit.

For the reasons given the award is vacated and set aside.

Plaintiff by pleading count for money had and received waived deceit and affirmed original contract by terms of which no liability existed, and hence precluded right to attachment.

By the contract which plaintiff affirmed by pleading count for money had and received, defendant transferred all his interest in partnership to plaintiff, who assumed all the obligations of the partnership, but by the terms of the agreement defendant did not bind himself to repay to plaintiff the amount of partnership expenditures.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Iron & Metal Company against Nathan Abraham and others. From an order discharging an attachment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Louis E. Goodman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bianchi & Hyman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order made discharging an attachment. On the hearing of the motion the parties introduced in evidence the plaintiff's verified complaint, its affidavit for an attachment, its undertaking, plaintiff's verified amended complaint, defendants' notice of motion to discharge, defendants' affidavit, and the affidavit of L. H. Silberman, the vice president of the plaintiff.

From the foregoing papers the following facts appear: Prior to November 1, 1926, N. Abraham was the owner of a store and doing business under the name of N. Abraham & Co. On that date Lou H. Silberman and Harry Silberman, as the agents of plaintiff, and N. Abraham formed a partnership and thereafter conducted the business of the store under the name of N. Abraham Mercantile Company. As for the contribution of the new partner or partners, the plaintiff paid into the funds of the copartnership $60,093.31. The new firm continued to transact business until the 1st day of December, 1927. At that time it was in financial embarrassment and the defendant proposed to give or take. By agreement of the parties, the defendant transferred to the plaintiff all of his interest and the plaintiff assumed all of the obligations of the partnership, but by the terms of the dissolution agreement no sum of money was stipulated as payable from either party to the other. The plaintiff's complaint is in two counts. The first count specifically pleads a cause of action as for deceit. The second count pleads a cause of action as for moneys had and received. It was stipulated at the trial that both counts are but different methods of pleading one transaction. It nowhere appears that the plaintiff rescinded the partnership contract, offered to rescind it, nor, even at this time, offers to place the defendant in statu quo.

[1] The foregoing facts show that the plaintiff's grievance is a tort and under our statute it was not entitled to an attachment. Code Civ. Proc. § 537; Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 509, 166 P. 1. Moreover, searching the entire record, nothing appears showing any contract under which the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff " * * * upon a contract express or implied, for the direct payment of money. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 537; Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 662, 185 P. 976; Sturtevant v. K. Hovden Co., 60 Cal. App. 696, 698, 214 P. 244; Cal. Packing Corp. v. Kato, 45 Cal. App. 491, 493, 188 P. 57.

[2-4] The plaintiff points to the count as for money had and received, asserts that count sounds in contract, and therefore claims that in any event it was entitled to take out a writ of attachment. In making this claim it is assuming that the court is passing on a demurrer, whereas the proceeding before the court is a motion to dissolve an attachment. The question is not what the plaintiff has pleaded, but what in truth and in fact is its grievance. The count for moneys had and received was evidence on the issue before the court, but no more conclusive than any other item of evidence before the court. The plaintiff's complaint on the hearing of the motion before the court stood as an affidavit. Jacobs, Malcolm & Burt v. Railway Co., 71 Cal. App. 42, 44, 234 P. 328. That is, the hearing on the motion before the court was similar to a hearing on a motion to dissolve an injunction. That the plaintiff's verified pleading stands as an affidavit on a motion to dissolve an injunction is made clear by the authorities. Falkinburg v. Lucy, 35 Cal. 52, 60, 61, 95 Am. Dec. 76; Hefflon v. Bowers, 72 Cal. 270-272 13 P. 690; Hiller v. Collins, 63 Cal. 235, 237; Christopher v. Condodge, 128 Cal. 581, 585, 61 P. 174. Moreover, by pleading the count in assumpsit the plaintiff waived the tort and affirmed the original contract. But by the terms of that contract the defendant never bound himself to repay to the plaintiff the amount of its expenditures. Bechtel v. Chase, 156 Cal. 707, 711, 712, 106 P. 81. Therefore it was not entitled to a writ of attachment. We think that the trial court was clearly right in making the order dissolving the attachment.

The order is affirmed.

There can be but one action brought and one recovery had by heir for damages for wrongful death (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 377 heir may sue for death of one caused by wrongful act of another, but all heirs entitled to recover must join in one action.

2. Death §18(1) — Action — Heirs — Loss.

Recovery for wrongful death cannot be had on account of heir who has not suffered loss (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

That recovery by minor for wrongful death of mother might indirectly benefit contributorily negligent father would not preclude recovery by minor (Code Civ. Proc. § 377).

Action by Allen B. Bowen and June Charlotte Bowen, a minor, by her guardian ad litem, Allen B. Bowen, against Simon Kizirian and another. From a judgment for June Charlotte Bowen, the named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

B. W. Gearhart and Lindsay & Gearhart, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Gallagher & Jertberg, of Fresno, for respondent.

BARNARD, J.

This action arose out of a collision between two automobiles, one driven by Allen B. Bowen, in which his wife, Hazel E. Bowen, was a passenger, and the other driven by one of the defendants, who was accompanied at the time by the other defendant, who was the owner of the car. As a result of the accident, Hazel E. Bowen was almost instantly killed.

This action was brought under the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure by Allen B. Bowen, both individually, and as guardian ad litem of June Charlotte Bowen, an infant of the age of twenty-one months, the daughter of Allen B. Bowen and his deceased wife. The case was tried without a jury, and the court found that the collision was the result of negligence on the part of the defendant Simon Kizirian, coupled with the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, Allen B. Bowen. Recovery was therefore denied to Bowen in his individual capacity, but the court awarded damages to the minor plaintiff in the sum of $1,000. The court found that the said minor was free from any negligence proximately contributing to or causing the death of the deceased; that the deceased was free from negligence proximately causing or contributing to the accident and her resultant death; that the negligence and carelessness of the appellant, Simon Kizirian, directly and proximately caused the death of the deceased; that the negligence of the plaintiff Allen B. Bowen proximately contributed to the death of the deceased; and that the respondent minor, by reason of the death of the deceased proximately caused by the negligence of appellant, was damaged in the sum of $1,000. The defendant Simon Kizirian has appealed upon the judgment roll alone, and the sole question presented is whether, under the provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the contributory negligence of the plaintiff Allen B. Bowen bars recovery by the respondent minor for the damages sustained by her.

While there is a conflict in the decisions of the highest courts of other states upon the question now before us, this divergence in opinion is in part due to differences in statutes in the respective states. In Earley v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 176 Cal. 79, 167 P. 513, L. R. A. 1918A, 997, the court said:

"It would not be without interest, but at the same time it is wholly unnecessary to follow these learned counsel in their analyses of the varying statutes and the decisions of the courts upon them. For when the last word shall have been said in such a consideration, the paramount fact will still remain that rights under our section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure are to be defined not by what other courts have said touching their own statutes, but from the meaning and intent of our own law derived from a reading of it."

While this language was used in connection with the interpretation of this section of the Code in a respect other than that now before us, it is equally applicable to the present problem.

[1] It is the contention of the appellant that since the recovery in such an action as this is for a single gross amount in an inseparable cause of action, in which all the heirs must join, it must follow that the contributory negligence of one of the heirs will bar a recovery on the part of any other heir. It is settled that there can be but one action brought and one recovery had for such damages as were sought in this action. Daubert v. Western Meat Co., 139 Cal. 480, 69 P. 297, 73 P. 244, 96 Am. St. Rep. 154. The judgment itself must be for a single lump sum, but it does not follow that each heir shall share equally in the amount recovered. It is well settled that the proceeds of such an action are not to be distributed in the manner provided by the laws of succession, but such proceeds are to be shared by the heirs upon the basis of the pecuniary loss of each. Estate of Riccomi, 185 Cal. 458, 197 P. 97, 98, 14 A. L. R. 509. In the case just cited the court said:

"How perfectly absurd it would appear to be to hold that where the whole amount of a recovery is given solely on account of the pecuniary injury to the surviving wife, one-half thereof must go to a surviving father or mother or brother or sister of decedent who has suffered no pecuniary injury whatever."

[2] Nor can there be any recovery on account of any heir who has not suffered loss. Burk v. Arcata & Mad River R. R. Co., 125 Cal. 364, 57 P. 1065, 73 Am. St. Rep. 52; Estate of Riccomi, supra. While the verdict should be for a single lump sum, it has been held proper to look to the jurors' answer to special interrogatories, in order to determine how they arrived at the total. Grieffey v. Pacific Railway Co., 58 Cal. App. 509, 209 P. 45. It is the purpose of the statute to provide a single cause of action for all the heirs, and, while the statute does not provide for a distribution of the proceeds among those entitled thereto, it has been held that even a verdict for separate damages to each of two heirs would not be reversed. Robinson v. Western States Gas Co., 184 Cal. 401, 194 P. 39, 43. In that case the court said:

"The defendant has no interest in the division which the plaintiffs may make among themselves, or which may be made for them, of the damages recovered. The statute contemplates a single recovery for the benefit of the family of the deceased, or those of his heirs who are dependent upon him for support. Whether it is divided among them after recovery or not, or how it is divided, are matters of no concern to the defendant. If the damages are not excessive, as is in effect admitted by the failure to object on that account, the defendant has no reason to complain, or at least his reason is not sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment, because of this defect in the form of the judgment."

[3] It is established that the failure of one of the plaintiffs to prove loss will not defeat recovery by another of the plaintiffs whose pecuniary loss has been proved. And this, notwithstanding the fact that under the statute, as interpreted by our courts, only one action may be brought and only one judgment recovered. So far as the interpretation of this statute is concerned, no reason appears why the rule should be any different where the evidence discloses that one of the parties is not entitled to recover, not on account of a failure to prove pecuniary loss, but because of the intervention of another rule, such as contributory negligence. In Estate of Ricconi, supra, it is said it would be absurd to hold that because two heirs must join in one action, the one proving damage must share the proceeds with the one suffering no injury. It would seem equally absurd to hold that an innocent party cannot recover because another party, with whom he is required by law to be joined as plaintiff, is not innocent. We find nothing in the fact that all of the heirs must join in the action, and that there must be but one recovery that would prevent a recovery by this plaintiff, because of any contributory negligence on the part of her co-plaintiff.

[4-6] Neither is it necessary to so hold, on the theory that a recovery on the part of the child might indirectly benefit the father, and thus permit him to recover in spite of his own wrong. No such reason applies as in the case where a husband is suing for the death of a minor child, in which case it has been held that, since the wife represents the community, her negligence is the negligence of the husband, and will prevent a recovery on the part of the community. Keena v. United Railroads of S. F., 57 Cal. App. 124, 207 P. 35. In the instant case, the child is in no way connected with any negligence on the part of the father, and such negligence is not to be imputed to her. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 179 P. 203, 205, 15 A. L. R. 401. This last case quotes Beach on Contributory Negligence, as follows:

"The rule of imputed negligence, as applied to persons non sui juris, is an anomaly. The English law on this point presents an extraordinary illustration. On the one hand, it is held that the negligence of the person having charge of a child is the negligence of the child, and imputable to it, when the child comes into a court of justice and asks damages for an injury negligently inflicted upon it by the defendant. But, per contra, when a donkey is carelessly run down in the highway, where he is negligently exposed, the defendant is liable and though oysters are negligently placed in a river bed, it is an injury redressible at law in damages for a vessel negligently to disturb them. It appears, therefore, that the child, were he an ass or an oyster, would secure a protection which is denied him as a human being of tender years in such jurisdictions as enforce the English or the New York rule in this respect."

The court then holds as follows:

"Following in the wake of the preponderating weight of authority, we may well and wisely, although somewhat tardily, declare that the rule of imputed negligence as applied to actions by children in their own right no longer prevails, if it ever did prevail, in this jurisdiction."

To sustain the contentions of the appellant would, in effect, change this rule and make the negligence of a father imputable to the child, in cases brought under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in variance with the general rule established in this state. We think it is possible to so interpret this section as to make it harmonize with other well-established principles of law. This is especially true, since the damages suffered by a child, arising from the death of its mother, are entirely separate and distinct from those of a husband occasioned by the loss of his wife. Valente v. Sierra Railway Co., 158 Cal. 412, 111 P. 95. Not only is this true, but the damages suffered by the child include not only those suffered during minority, but those arising after arrival at majority, during the probable duration of the life of the mother. Valente v. Sierra Railway Co., supra. Every presumption is in favor of the judgment, and, if it were necessary, it would have to be presumed that the damages awarded herein were those found by the court as reasonably certain to arise after the minor here in question attains her majority. But, irrespective of this, and if the damages awarded be assumed to cover the period before majority, as well as after, the father has no such interest in the amount awarded as would bar recovery on the part of the minor. Until the minor reaches majority the amount recovered will be in the control of the court in the guardianship proceedings, and the father cannot profit thereby. Under the law he is not even relieved from his duty to support the child, regardless of whether or not the child receives this award. While it was necessary for this suit to be filed by a guardian ad litem, and it happens that the father acted as such, the recovery is in his representative capacity only, and he is in no degree interested therein.

A further consideration is that any statute should be so interpreted, when possible, as to give effect to all parts thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 1858. The statute here in question closes with these words: "In every action under this and the preceding section, such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case, may be just." While it may be justice to deny compensation to one whose own negligence has contributed to his injury, to refuse recovery to one who is both innocent and too young to be otherwise, would hardly seem to come under that head. To so hold would require not only a strict interpretation of this statute, but a disregard of its final provision, and the reading into the section of elements not put there by the Legislature.

Although used in connection with a different statute, we think the following language from a Minnesota case applies to the facts here:

"We see no principle of law on which it can be said that the negligence of one beneficiary can prejudice other beneficiaries. There is no partnership or community of interest between them; one is in no sense the agent or representative of the others. His negligence should not be imputed to them and it should detract nothing from them. * * * His negligence is not a bar to their right." Kokesh v. Price, 136 Minn. 304, 161 N. W. 715, 717, 23 A. L. R. 643.

The theory of contributory negligence is often a harsh one, preventing a recovery even though the negligence is but slight in comparison. We feel there is nothing in the theory requiring its extension to the extreme of denying a recovery to an innocent minor, under the circumstances in this case. Nor is this required by the Code section here involved. The purpose of the statute is, of course, to require that one action only be brought, but in our opinion it no more makes the right of recovery of one plaintiff dependent upon the freedom of a coplaintiff from any legal disability, than upon the ability of a coplaintiff to prove that he has suffered a pecuniary loss. Although the trial court in its findings separated the damages of the two plaintiffs and allowed recovery only to one not in fault, the resultant judgment was for a lump sum, was for the total of the amount shown by the evidence to be properly allowable to both, and is not in conflict with the provisions of this section.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Action by the Hammond Lumber Company against W. S. Weeks, J. Pludow, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur Goodrick, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

The respondents were awarded judgment in an action of appellant against themselves and others, and this is an appeal therefrom.

One W. S. Weeks contracted with respondents for the erection of a house and garage upon their property in the county of Los Angeles, and purchased from the appellant lumber company certain sash, doors, hardware, and materials for use in said structures. Respondents made and executed to Weeks a deed of trust in the sum of $1,250 as security for the payment of any amount for which he might become indebted through such purchases, and the same was delivered to, and held by, appellant until completion of the work. Respondent J. Pludow, being informed that his account had been satisfied, and that one S. C. Briggs had purchased the deed of trust, was desirous of verifying this report and, to quote his testimony, he "called up Hammond Lumber Company on the telephone and told them I was Pludow, the owner of that house, and I wanted to know, because I am going to make another payment to this contractor, if they are paid. They couldn't answer me right away on the 'phone. They told me they would connect me with the trust department, which they did. A girl answered the 'phone then and she asked me what I wanted, and I explained to her that I wanted to know as far as their bills are concerned, because I wanted to make another payment to Weeks. They held me on the 'phone for fifteen minutes, and then they came back and said, 'as far as we are concerned, we are all paid up; you can go ahead and pay Weeks whatever is necessary.'"

Prior to this conversation, Briggs accompanied Weeks to appellant's offices, informed a bookkeeper that he was purchasing the deed of trust, and was advised that the balance due on the Pludow job was $825, which he paid; he had agreed to pay $1,050 for the security, and Weeks was therefore at the same time given a check for $225, whereupon appellant released it to the purchaser. Respondent, believing that appellant's claim had been paid in full, also delivered to Weeks a check for the remainder concededly earned by the latter.

Thereafter the lumber company filed a lien against the property in question for the sum of $208.64, and subsequently instituted the present suit for its foreclosure. Upon the trial it was strenuously asserted by appellant's witnesses that no member of its office force had received a telephone inquiry such as that to which respondent testified, or had given to any person the information stated. It appears that one Sherman, appellant's accountant, had visited the property and reported to his employer as to the completion of the work and the amount remaining due it, but it was testified that at the time of the settlement with Briggs and Weeks this report had not reached the proper department so as to be entered in the account, and that as a matter of fact the books did not at the time of such settlement show its true status. A Miss Quirk testified that she had full charge of appellant's trust or securities department, and that any inquiry as to the Weeks account would have come directly to her, but that she had received no call regarding the same; that under no circumstances would she have taken the responsibility of determining or giving information as to its condition, and that she did not do so; both this witness and Sherman swore that Sherman was the only one who possessed or could have given the required data, and he positively testified that he received no inquiry and gave no report to Mr. Pludow at that time; that Briggs had merely paid the amount then on the books, leaving unsatisfied a hardwood floor estimate, the material for which had not been installed. Further, he swore: "When Mr. Weeks stated he had a buyer for the trust deed and had the man with him and he wanted to know how much he owed us up to that time, I went back to the bookkeeping department and showed him the ledger balance at that time. But on the job card, which I took out of the file when he came into the office, I observed down at the bottom that there was a hardwood floor that was to be put in on the job"; and that Weeks had said: "I will take care of that out of more money that I have coming from Pludow, coming from the contract, before the lien rights run by"; that the flooring was delivered on the same date as the conversation here recited. It also appears that thereafter, upon inquiry of the owner as to appellant's reason for filing its lien, Sherman informed him that they regretted the annoyance, but that Weeks had double-crossed them.

From the foregoing it appears that, while Briggs paid the account as it then appeared, a subsequent amount representing additional material was thereafter added thereto, and that, although respondent may have been informed by some unknown person that his account had been adjusted in full, such was not the fact, and he made no personal request of the proper parties or at appellant's office for a statement. We think this evidence wholly insufficient to establish the fact of payment as to the balance claimed, and that authorities relied upon by respondents do not support their plea of estoppel upon the part of appellant to assert it. Eastman v. Means, 75 Cal. App. 537, 242 P. 1089, involved conversations between the appellant therein and several witnesses who testified, and which as corroborated were received in evidence. The court, however, there merely held this proof sufficient prima facie as to the identity of the appellant. Likewise, in Smith v. Hollander, 85 Cal. App. 535, 259 P. 958, it was said that the circumstances warranted admission in evidence of the conversation. No authority is cited, nor has a careful search disclosed one, tending to approve a rule that one may upon no evidence other than a telephonic conversation with an unidentified party, and uncorroborated as to believed identity, legally sustain grounds for estoppel or release from liability.

[1, 2] That a release from any indebtedness was intended by appellant, or even asserted by respondents, is not urged. Estoppel is not favored, and it is incumbent upon one who advances it to prove its dominant essentials, leaving nothing to surmise or questionable inference. Lorenz v. Rousseau, 85 Cal. App. 1, 258 P. 690; General Motors Accept. Corp. v. Gandy, 200 Cal. 234, 253 P. 137.

[3] While doubt may exist as to the competency of a telephonic conversation, its admissibility may under the circumstances of a particular case be justified. Mayr v. Goldschmidt, 63 Cal. App. 381, 218 P. 621. However, evidence as to a conversation over the telephone is in the main governed by rules applicable to ordinary oral statements. Testimony of one that he talked with another whom he did not see is, standing alone, but a conclusion, and, when denied, it falls far short of being sufficient to hold the person assumed responsible under an alleged agreement to forego substantial rights. Planters' C. O. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 126 Ga. 621, 55 S. E. 495, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1180; Stewart v. Fisher, 18 Ga. App. 519, 89 S. E. 1052; Barber v. City Drug Store, 173 Iowa, 651, 155 N. W. 992; Lord Elec. Co. v. Morrill, 173 Mass. 304, 59 N. E. 807; Mankes v. Fish- man, 163 App. Div. 789, 149 N. Y. S. 228; Williamson-Halsell-Frasier Co. v. King, 58 Okl. 120, 158 P. 1142.

[4] The argument upholding the judgment of the trial court on the theory of estoppel in favor of respondents has no support except in this alleged conversation on the telephone. Since there was no other conversation between the parties on the subject, applying the rule as above stated, that contention is eliminated. We think the evidence in this case was insufficient to bring respondents within the bounds of settled rules entitling them to relief.

The judgment is reversed.

Action by Nathan Gursky against Jacob Rosenberg. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Dozier & Kimball, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Tobin & Tobin and Charles R. Collins, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit.

The action was commenced on December 14, 1926, to recover the sum of $4,889.50 with interest thereon from April 13, 1926, on which date the plaintiff paid the amount to the San Francisco Bank, a corporation.

According to the complaint the plaintiff and Nathan Bronstein with their wives on November 9, 1920, executed to the bank their note for $8,000, payable one year after date, with interest, and secured the same by a trust deed of certain real property owned by them. The note provided that "in case any change is made in the title to all or any part of the property described in the deed of trust securing this note the whole of said principal sum shall forthwith become due and payable at the election of the holder of the note." It was alleged that on August 4, 1921, the above-named owners of the property conveyed by grant deed to Sadie S. Gunzberger; that as part of the consideration the grantee agreed to pay the above note, the deed providing that the same was made "subject to deed of trust in the sum of $8,000"; that on November 10, 1921, Sadie S. Gunzberger and her husband executed a grant deed, conveying the same property to defendant Jacob Rosenberg, who, as part of the consideration therefor, agreed to pay the above note, and that the deed contained the following provision: "subject to incumbrances in the sum of $8,000." That on November 29, 1922, the defendant by grant deed conveyed the property to Edward Blonquist and his wife, who as a part of the consideration agreed to indorse the note; that on January 26, 1923, the defendant with Blonquist and his wife and Blanch and William Flynn, to whom the Blonquists had conveyed the property, "in order to have the said * * * San Francisco Bank permit said note to run and not demand its immediate payment, did endorse jointly and severally the said promissory note although the same was wholly due, owing and unpaid and had passed its maturity * * * did write their respective names on the back of said promissory note, * * *" and further caused to be written on the back thereof and over their signatures the words, "For value received I hereby waive demand and notice of demand, protest and notice of protest and nonpayment"; that on April 9, 1926, the note being due and unpaid, the property was sold by the trustee in the manner provided by the trust deed, and after applying the proceeds there remained a balance of the note unpaid, namely, $4,889.50, which the plaintiff on April 13, 1926, following its demand, paid to the bank.

The defendant denied that he or Mrs. Rosenberg assumed or agreed to pay the note, and further denied that his signature was placed on the back of the instrument for the purpose of obtaining an extension of the time for payment.

[1] At the trial the note with the indorsements thereon was placed in evidence, but other than by the production of the deeds mentioned there was no attempt to prove and no evidence that Mrs. Gunzberger or the defendant, as part of the consideration for the conveyance to them or either of them, agreed to assume or pay the debt secured by the trust deed; and the rule is well settled that such an agreement is not established by the recital in the deed that the conveyance "is subject to" a mortgage or other encumbrance upon the property. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Society v. Dickinson, 167 Cal. 616, 140 P. 265; Andrews v. Robertson, 177 Cal. 434, 170 P. 1129.

After the plaintiff rested his case the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that no proof of such assumption had been made; whereupon the plaintiff, as stated by his counsel, sought to show "that at the time that defendant * * * endorsed the note it was upon the agreement and for the consideration that the bank was to allow the note to run indefinitely," further stating that his whole argument would be based thereon; and in this connection it was stipulated that plaintiff and his counsel if sworn would testify that the defendant stated to them "that he bought the property after the note was due, * * * that the bank would call the loan, and he did not want the loan called, and he endorsed the note in order to let it run." In addition an officer of the bank testified in substance that after the transfer of the property to the defendant the latter indorsed the note at the request of the bank in the manner alleged. The witness could not remember the conversation had with the defendant at the time the indorsement was made, but stated that it was the bank's custom to require indorsements from grantees whenever a change was made in the title of the property mortgaged or deeded in trust to secure its loans, and that this course was followed in the present case. The witness further testified that as far as he could recollect no promise was made by the defendant or his coindorsers other than that which was legally implied from their indorsements. As he stated, "We simply took a straight endorsement and their waiver of protest," and further that the bank gave no promise to extend the time of payment for a definite period. The defendant was also called as a witness for the plaintiff pursuant to section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and admitted his indorsement, but denied the same was made pursuant to an agreement with the bank.

[2-5] Defendant contends that in the absence of a definite extension of time for the payment of the debt his indorsement was not binding. But, however this may be, it is clear that in any event his obligation was but that of a guarantor (Crooks v. Tully, 50 Cal. 254; First Nat. Bank v. Babcock, 94 Cal. 96, 29 P. 415, 28 Am. St. Rep. 94; Rogers v. Schulenburg, 111 Cal. 281, 43 P. 899; 19 Cal. Jur., Negotiable Instruments, § 68, p. 880); and subrogation is allowed only in favor of one who under some duty or compulsion, legal or moral, pays the debt of another, and not in favor of him who pays a debt in performance of his own covenant (37 Cyc., Subrogation, p. 374). Here the defendant so far as shown made no promise and assumed no obligation to the plaintiff, and there was no privity of contract between them. Consequently, payment by the plaintiff of the balance of the note was in performance of his own obligation, which gave him no right of subrogation to the rights of the bank against the defendant. March v. Barnett, 121 Cal. 419, 53 P. 933, 66 Am. St. Rep. 44; Sacramento Bank v. Pacific Bank, 124 Cal. 147, 56 P. 787, 45 L. R. A. 863, 71 Am. St. Rep. 36; Rogers v. Meyers, 68 Ill. 92; Jones on Mortgages (8th Ed.) § 1119.

The motion for a nonsuit was not renewed after the making of the stipulation mentioned and the bank official had testified. The plaintiff contends that the motion was insufficient to support the order granting the nonsuit.

[6] The record shows sufficiently that the court and counsel assumed that a motion in form based upon all the testimony was made, and they proceeded accordingly. Moreover, where it appears that the plaintiff has totally failed to make out a case which would support a finding in his favor, and the defect is incurable, as was true here, the granting of a nonsuit based upon the insufficiency of the evidence without a formal motion, while irregular, is without prejudice. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 P. 807; Fontana v. Pacific Can Co., 129 Cal. 51, 61 P. 580; Warner v. Warner, 144 Cal. 615, 78 P. 24; Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 257, 104 P. 6.

The record discloses no evidence which would support a judgment for the plaintiff, and the judgment appealed from is accordingly affirmed.

Stanley Moffatt, of South Gate, for petitioner.

Edward O. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

HOUSER, J.

On an application presented to the respondent commission for adjustment of compensation for an industrial injury sustained by petitioner herein, and which admittedly "occurred in the course and arising out of his employment," the commission found that the injury consisted of "aggravation into a disabling condition of a pre-existing right indirect inguinal hernia," for which the applicant had been adequately compensated "by the furnishing of a surgical operation for the radical cure of said hernia"; and thereupon ordered that the applicant "take nothing further."

[1] Petitioner contends that, with the exception of that part of the finding to the effect that the injury to him occurred "in the course of and arising out of his employment," the said finding was unsupported by any evidence relating thereto. However, as from the record herein it appears that each of the several parts of said finding was based upon the contents of certain reports, documents, publications, etc., which by the terms of section 19(c) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831, 849, as variously amended) the Commission was entitled to receive and consider in evidence, the contention of petitioner in that regard cannot be sustained.

[2, 3] The principal complaint of petitioner is directed to the situation that, although by the finding of the commission the injury sustained by petitioner "occurred in the course of and arising out of his employment," for the reason, as stated in the award, that the applicant had been furnished "a surgical operation for the radical cure of said hernia," the compensation already awarded to him was considered adequate.

By the terms of subsection (3) of section 3 and subsection (a) of section 9 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, compensation to an injured employee, includes surgical and hospital treatment. It is therefore manifest that the applicant received some compensation. 27 Cal. Jur. 526; citing Union Iron Works v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 33, 210 P. 410.

Subsection (4) of section 3 of the act provides that: "The term 'injury,' as used in this act, shall include any injury or disease arising out of the employment. In case of aggravation of any disease existing prior to such injury, compensation shall be allowed only for such proportion of the disability due to the aggravation of such prior disease as may reasonably be attributed to the injury."

BIGE v. STATE INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 7048.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

April 14, 1930.

1. Master and servant ⇨405(1) — Workmen's compensation — Evidence — Sufficiency — Reports — Documents — Publications.

In compensation case, finding based on contents of reports, documents, and publications was supported by evidence (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 19(c).

2. Master and servant ⇨385(16) — Workmen's compensation — Surgical operation.

Employee receiving surgical operation for hernia received some compensation (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, §§ 3(3), 9(a).

3. Master and servant ⇨376(2) — Workmen's compensation — Serious disease — Aggravation — Hernia.

Injury consisting of aggravation into disabling condition of pre-existing hernia was "aggravation of a disease existing prior to * * * injury" (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 3(4).

Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 3(4), St. 1917, p. 833, provides that, in case of aggravation of disease existing prior to injury, compensation shall be allowed only for such proportion of disability due to aggravation of such prior disease as may reasonably be attributed to injury.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Adlai E. Bige, opposed by E. A. Morrison, Inc., and the State Compensation Insurance Fund. An order adverse to claimant was entered by the Industrial Accident Commission, and claimant brings certiorari. Affirmed.

In that connection, the question presented to this court for its determination is whether an injury which consisted "of an aggravation into a disabling condition of a pre-existing * * * hernia" represented an injury which was an "aggravation of a disease existing prior to such injury." From a consideration of the subsection of the act to which attention has been directed, together with the text and the authorities cited in 18 Corpus Juris, page 1139, it would seem clear that the word "disease," as used in said subsection of the statute, was broad enough in its meaning and significance to include a physical condition such as is shown to have existed with reference to the petitioner herein at the time the injury was sustained by him. It therefore follows that, since within the terms of the statute the applicant was awarded "compensation" for an injury which resulted from aggravation of a pre-existing hernia, the award made to petitioner by the commission should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

WISSBURG v. LOCKWOOD.

Civ. 44.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District.
California.

April 22, 1930.

Appeal and error ☞719(6).

Alleged insufficiency of evidence to support trial court's findings held not reviewable, where bill of exceptions failed to assign such error (Code Civ. Proc. § 648).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. J. Luttrell, Judge.

Action by A. L. Wissburg against Emma Dewey Lockwood. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Wm. K. Brown and Edward J. Kelly, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Adam Thompson, Renwick Thompson, and Gordon Thompson, all of San Diego, for respondent.

OWEN, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff instituted suit against the defendant for the sum of $4,750 for services performed as an attorney at law. Two causes of action were contained in the complaint: First, that the agreed price of said services was $5,000, and that $250 had been paid; second, that the services were reasonably worth the sum of $5,000, and that $250 had been paid.

The defendant's answer denied the allegations of both counts of the complaint, and set up affirmatively and by way of cross-complaint an allegation of damage to her in the sum of $25,000, by reason of the plaintiff's failure to carry out, and his violation of, an agreement wherein plaintiff, as her attorney, was authorized to effect a settlement of certain claims and demands defendant held against a third person.

The trial court awarded the plaintiff the sum of $3,230 after deducting all sums paid, as the reasonable value of plaintiff's services, and found against the defendant on all of the allegations of her cross-complaint.

The transcript on appeal contains 708 pages all but 33 pages of which are called a bill of exceptions. There is no attempt anywhere in this voluminous bill of exceptions to set forth any specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. While we have examined the record and find substantial evidence to justify the decision of the trial court, we are confronted with the fact that the requirements of section 648 of the Code of Civil Procedure were ignored in the preparation of the bill of exceptions, and the decision of this court must rest on the latter ground.

"The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings cannot be considered on appeal from a judgment where the bill of exceptions relied on contains no specifications of insufficiency of evidence." Hare & Walden, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

PRESTON, J.

Plaintiff, her mother and brother, on March 28, 1899, conveyed to the city of Los Angeles for street purposes a strip of land across lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 in block E of Fort Hill tract as per official map, with the object of promoting the construction thereunder of what is known as Broadway tunnel in said city. The validity of the following provisions of said deed furnishes the sole issue upon this appeal: "1. That no right or franchise for a street railroad over the said right of way be given by party of the second part, and that the same shall not be used for street railway purposes; and also 2. It is expressly understood and provided that upon the breach of any of the above conditions this deed shall be null and void, and the parties of the first part shall have the right to enter upon the premises conveyed and to hold and own the same as fully as if this conveyance had not been made."

This deed was duly recorded on April 18, 1899, and thereafter the projected tunnel was constructed and became a portion of Broadway street leading from Temple street through said tunnel to Sunset boulevard. On October 6, 1925, defendant railway corporation applied to the city for a franchise to construct tracks on said street leading to and through said tunnel, which franchise was duly granted on January 22, 1926. Thereafter said corporation built a roadway and constructed double tracks thereon for the purpose of operating its street railway cars in said tunnel and under said land described in said deed. Thereafter, and on February 25, 1926, plaintiff, having succeeded to the remaining estate in said lots, served notice upon the city declaring the forfeiture of all rights held and purported to be held by it under and by virtue of said deed, and declaring said conveyance to have become null and void because of said violation of the conditions thereof hereinabove set forth. This notice was followed on March 17, 1926, by the present suit in the form of an ordinary action to quiet title, with the usual prayer that it be declared that defendants have no estate or interest in said property, and that they be enjoined from asserting any interest therein. Defendants filed separate answers, traversing the allegations of the amended complaint. The cause was tried upon a written stipulation of facts, substantially as hereinabove set forth. The court held said provisions void; judgment passed for defendants; and plaintiff has appealed.

We thus have before us solely the question of the right of plaintiff and appellant to equitable relief under the provisions of said deed.

Appellant bases her claim for a reversal of the judgment on the well-understood doctrine that contracts of a city or state, when exercising other than governmental functions and within its charter powers, are construed by the same rules that govern the contracts of private parties. This principle is expressed in Brown v. Town of Sebastopol, 153 Cal. 704, 709, 96 P. 363, 365, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 178, as follows: "But it is a well-settled principle, applicable alike to the states and the United States, that whenever a government descends from the plains of sovereignty and contracts with parties, such government is regarded as a private person itself, and is bound accordingly. A state in its contracts with individuals must be judged and must abide by the same rules which govern individuals in similar cases, and when such a contract comes before a court, the rights and obligations of the contracting parties will be adjudged upon the same principles as if both contracting parties were private persons." See, to the same effect, Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 979, vol. 3; 18 Cal. Jur. p. 1000, § 272.

[1] But this doctrine has no application to a situation where property is conveyed outright for street purposes with a condition imposed to the effect that it may not on penalty of forfeiture be used for certain well-known street purposes, for example, for street railway traffic. The control of the streets of the city is a purely governmental process, involving the exercise of legislative authority under the police and other powers conferred by law. It is too obvious for extended argument that one individual who has conveyed his property for a governmental purpose may not, on penalty of forfeiture, sit in judgment over the exercise of that governmental function. If a certain governmental use does the remaining property of the dedicator a special injury, provided against in the document of dedication, the doors of the law court alone, if any, are open to him. Equitable relief such as here sought cannot for a moment be applied. The control of the streets and the proper location and regulation of street railways thereon are the chief concerns of a city. No individual can by contract reserve the right to control the use of a street when once the dedication for that purpose is made.

The doctrine is everywhere to the effect that such conditions in the dedication are repugnant to the grant, and therefore void, leaving the grant in full and unrestricted operation. The principle announced in section 1441 of the Civil Code seems applicable here, to wit: "A condition in a contract, the fulfillment of which is impossible or unlawful, within the meaning of the article on the object of contracts, or which is repugnant to the nature of the interest created by the contract is void."

In Finch v. Riverside, etc., Co., 87 Cal. 597, 598, 25 P. 765, it is said: "The dedication of a street to public use authorizes any ordinary use for street purposes; and the use of a street in a city or town for the tracks of a street-car company is of this class, and is therefore authorized."

Elliott on Roads and Streets (4th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 186, § 163, uses this language: "A condition or limitation which would render the dedication ineffectual can not be annexed; thus, a man can not reserve possession to himself, nor reserve a right to do anything in the way (street) which will destroy its character as a public way."

Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) vol. 3, pp. 1697-1698, § 1075, disposes of the question as follows: "And the conditions imposed must always be consistent with the purpose to which the lands are dedicated, and with the control thereof by the proper public authorities. Thus, the proprietor cannot confer upon a county or extraneous corporation the control of streets in a city, and deprive the proper municipal corporation of the control given to it by law. If an invalid condition is annexed to the dedication, it has been held that the condition only is void, and that the grant or dedication is not effected thereby."

[2] A few further citations may here be given which exemplify the distinction between contracts which merely involve the proprietary or business functions of the municipality and those which attempt to curtail or prohibit its legislative or administrative authority. The former being valid, the latter are uniformly invalid. In 44 Corpus Juris, pp. 73, 74, § 2129, it is said: "Since it (the city) cannot surrender its governmental or legislative functions, a municipality cannot make contracts which will embarrass or control its legislative powers and duties, or which amount to an abrogation of its governmental function or of its police power. * * *"

The case of State ex rel. Townsend v. Board of Park Commissioners, 100 Minn. 150, 110 N. W. 1121, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1045, expresses the doctrine in these words: "It is also elementary that a municipality, acting through its legislative body, has no power to enter into contracts which curtail or prohibit an exercise of its legislative or administrative authority over streets, highways, or public grounds, whenever the public good demands that it should act." Said case specifies the kind of cases in which the city will be bound by its contracts by use of the following language: "Contracts involving proprietary or business functions are upheld. * * *" In an extended note to this case, the annotator states the doctrine as follows: "The authorities are well settled upon the proposition that a municipality cannot, by contract or otherwise, lawfully divest itself of the free exercise by it of its legislative functions. Applying this principle to the question under consideration, it is clear that it cannot, in receiving land either by dedication or by contract, make any agreements with the dedicator or grantor in reference to the property so acquired which will thereby divest or embarrass it in the exercise of its legislative powers."

The judgment is affirmed.

In re BUTTON'S ESTATE.
S. F. 13342.

Supreme Court of California.
April 18, 1930.

1. Wills ⇨133.

Words, "Love from 'Muddy,'" near end of letter propounded as will from deceased to former husband to whom she was known by that name, was valid signature (Civ. Code, § 1277).

Although Civ. Code, § 1277, requires holographic will to be signed by testator, it makes no requirement that testator must use his legal or true name.

2. Wills ⇨133.

That signature, "Love from 'Muddy,'" appeared on margin instead of end of letter propounded as will, did not render letter invalid as will.

The text of the letter occupied the entire page, and deceased had written the signature in question on the margin of the last page, thereby plainly indicating an intention to close the letter with her signature.

3. Wills ⇨130.

That only 24 words of 700-word letter were claimed to constitute will did not invalidate letter as testamentary disposition.

The deceased, shortly before her suicide, had written the letter in controversy to her former husband, and the only words referring to property which were claimed to constitute a testamentary disposition consisted of a single sentence as follows: "You can have the house on 26th ave. and all the things of value so you won't be out any money on burying me."

4. Wills ⇨130.

That "will" was not mentioned in 700-word letter did not disprove writer's intention to make testamentary disposition.

5. Wills ⇨72.

To constitute "will," intention must appear that writer by document itself intended to make disposition of property effective only after death.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Will (Testament)," see Words and Phrases.]

6. Wills ⇨77.

Gift of property by letter shortly before suicide held intended to take effect only after death, as regards letter's validity as will.

The reference in the letter to deceased's property, claimed to effect a testamentary disposition, followed immediately after a request that her body be cremated, and the whole letter indicated that she had then formed the intention of taking her life, and arranging her affairs after death.

7. Wills ⇨130.

That words, "You can have the house * * * and all the things of value," were in letter, not formal will, did not invalidate testamentary disposition.

8. Wills ⇨130.

That letter to writer's former husband, willing him her property, contained affectionate expressions toward their children, did not nullify gift to husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Application by Ralph James Button for the probate of a letter offered as the will of Grace Edna Button, deceased. From an order denying probate, the proponent appeals. A guardian ad litem was appointed to represent Ralph James Button, Jr., and another, minor children, as contestants on the appeal.

CURTIS, J.

This is an appeal from an order denying probate of a document in the form of a letter claimed by the proponent to be the last will and testament of Grace Edna Button, deceased. The letter in question was unquestionably entirely written and dated by the deceased Grace Edna Button during her lifetime. It was found in the same room in which her dead body was discovered after the deceased had presumably taken her own life. It was dated, "San Francisco, Calif. August 25—1928," and was addressed to "Dear, dear Daddy." The letter consisted of four pages written on both sides of two leaves of paper. On the left margin of the last page were written the words, "Love from 'Muddy.'" It is conceded that the letter addressed to "Dear, dear Daddy" was written and addressed to the proponent, who at one time had been the husband of the deceased, but a final decree of divorce had been granted to the parties on April 4, 1928. There were living at the date of the death of said deceased two children of said parties who had been born during said marriage, one Ralph James Button, Jr., who was then fourteen years of age, and the other, Robert Henry Button, who was eight years old. The letter was evidently written in contemplation of death, and its contents show an unmistakable purpose on the part of the decedent to take her own life, which purpose was successfully accomplished shortly after, and on the day, the letter was written. The letter contains expressions of deep affection of the writer for her former husband and her two sons. In it she reproaches herself, and expresses deep regret that she had failed to respond to her domestic responsibilities and thus to bring happiness to the family circle. She implores her former husband to care for, protect, and train their two boys, that the latter may "grow up strong men for Uncle Sam." A few excerpts from this letter will indicate the feelings of the deceased toward her former husband and her two children: "I can only think of you, you, you, and I am ruining our boys' lives." "Keep your loving arms around them (the boys) and protect them as I know you will and always have." "I wish I could meet you in heaven just to be near you and the children." "I'd like to go down that 'long long trail' with you and our dear boys." In the body of the letter and toward the end of the second of its four pages is found the following paragraph: "I'm wearing you out dear and when I am gone you can just breathe one long sigh of contentment. I'd like to be cremated. You can have the house on 26th ave. and all the things of value so you won't be out any money on burying me."

This provision the proponent contends is testamentary in character and that by it the deceased intended to and did devise to him the house situated on Twenty-Sixth avenue in the city of San Francisco, together with other articles of value belonging to her. No one appeared in the trial court to contest the petition of proponent, but said court nevertheless denied said petition. After the taking of this appeal the trial court appointed a guardian ad litem to represent said minors on the hearing of this appeal, and said guardian has appeared herein and filed a brief in reply and in opposition to the brief of the proponent and appellant.

[1] It is first contended by said guardian that the letter, which the proponent claims is the last will of the decedent, does not conform to the demands of section 1277 of the Civil Code, in that it is not signed as required by the terms of said section. This section of the Code defines an olographic will, and among other requirements of the section is the provision that it must be signed by the testator. We have already called attention to the fact that the letter was not signed at the end or at the close thereof, but that on the left margin of the last page of the letter the words "Love from 'Muddy'" were written. It is not disputed but that these words were written by the deceased herself. The evidence further shows without conflict that the deceased was affectionately known by the proponent and by her children as "Muddy" and that they called her by that name. While the section of the Code just referred to requires that an olographic will must be signed by the testator, it makes no requirement that in signing it the testator must use his legal or true name. In Kimmel's Estate, 278 Pa. 435, 123 A. 405, 31 A. L. R. 678, it was held that the signature "Father" to an olographic will in the form of a letter was sufficient, and that the instrument so signed was the valid will of the deceased. In Wells v. Lewis, 190 Ky. 626, 228 S. W. 3, a letter signed "Ant nanie" was admitted to probate as the last will and testament of Nannie Rogers. We might also refer to the following cases embodying similar rulings: Barnes v. Horne (Tex. Civ. App.) 233 S. W. 859; Knox's Estate, 131 Pa. 220, 18 A. 1021, 6 L. R. A. 353, 17 Am. St. Rep. 798, and Cartwright v. Cartwright, 158 Ark. 278, 250 S. W. 11. The cases of Kimmel's Estate, supra, and Wells v. Lewis, supra, are cited with approval by this court in the case of Estate of Henderson, 196 Cal. 623, 635, 238 P. 938, 942, holding that: "The subscription to the second paragraph, 'Your loving mother,' if a material consideration here, is a sufficient signature." We think from the facts in this case, as the same are construed and understood in the light of the foregoing authorities, that the signing of the name "Muddy" to the letter in question by the decedent was a sufficient signature to meet the requirements of section 1277 of the Civil Code.

[2] The guardian ad litem makes a further objection to the signature of the deceased, and contends that, as it was written not at the end or close of the letter, but on the margin of the last page thereof, it was not written for the purpose or with the intent that it should there serve as a "token of execution" or as a signature to said letter. The decisions of this court and those of other jurisdictions so far as they have been called to our attention negative this claim on the part of the guardian. Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 421, 163 P. 358, L. R. A. 1917D, 629, Ann. Cas.

The rule enunciated by these decisions is correctly stated in the Estate of Henderson, supra, at page 635 of 196 Cal., 238 P. 938, 942, in the following words: "Where a will has been signed by the testator, it is sufficient even though the signature is not in the place on the instrument where usually such a writing is signed, viz., at the end of the document. Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, L. R. A. 1917D, 778, 163 P. 669. Of course, this statement is subject to the qualification that the signature of the testator, if not subscribed to the will—that is, if it is not at the end of the instrument, the usual place for the signature in such cases—then it must so appear from the document itself that the signature was thus placed 'with the intent that it should there serve as a token of execution' as to afford 'a positive and satisfactory inference' to that effect." The court further says in the case just quoted from, and following the quotation set out above, "That the instant case fully exemplifies the test thus stated is a proposition too obvious to require further consideration." We feel that these words may be fittingly applied to the facts in the present action. That the deceased wrote the word "Muddy" on the margin of the last page of the letter for the purpose of finishing and closing the letter with her signature seems so apparent to us that it would be a waste of words to present any argument to support this statement. The photostatic copy of the letter attached to the transcript on appeal before us shows that the deceased in writing the letter had used the entire last page of the paper for the written portion of the letter, and that the only unused portion of the page was a narrow space along the left margin of this page. On this she wrote, "Love from 'Muddy.'" No other conclusion can be reached from these facts than that the deceased by writing her name on the margin of the last page of the letter intended thereby to sign the letter as effectually as if she had signed the same at the end or close thereof.

[3, 4] The further contention is made by the guardian ad litem that the letter of the decedent is not testamentary in character, and therefore cannot serve the purpose of the last will of the deceased. In this connection the guardian ad litem calls attention to the fact that the letter contains over seven hundred words and but twenty-four of them are claimed to constitute a will; that nowhere in the whole letter does the writer mention the word "will"; and that nowhere outside of said twenty-four words is there to be found any language indicating in the faintest degree that the writer intended to make a will by the terms of which she was disinheriting her two sons. That the writer of the letter devoted by far the greater portion thereof to matters other than that of disposing of her property cannot, we think, have any bearing upon the question as to whether or not that portion of her letter which does deal with her property constitutes a testamentary disposition of said property. The letter was undoubtedly intended by the decedent to be a farewell letter to the man who had formerly been her husband. It would have been indeed strange, in view of the circumstances under which the letter was written, had the decedent simply mentioned her property and designated the person or persons whom she desired to have the same upon her death. The fact that she referred to many personal and family matters with which she was deeply concerned in the same letter in which she stated that the proponent could have the house and other things of value belonging to her would not in any way render this disposition of her property ineffectual, nor would it in any manner change the character of such disposition. That she did not mention the word "will" in any part of her letter is neither conclusive nor even persuasive that she did not intend to make a testamentary disposition of her property. "No particular words are necessary to show a testamentary intent. It must appear only that the maker intended by it to dispose of property after his death." Mitchell v. Donohue, 100 Cal. 202, 208, 34 P. 614, 615, 38 Am. St. Rep. 279; Estate of Spitzer, 196 Cal. 301, 237 P. 739. That she did not refer to her property nor indicate any intention to dispose of it in a manner which would result in disinheriting her two boys except in the twenty-four word paragraph above quoted presents no good or legal reason why this paragraph of her letter should not be given effect and construed according to its clear intent. If in one part of her letter she has expressed an intent to make a testamentary disposition of her property, it is a matter of little or no consequence that she did not in other portions of her letter make reference to such intent. This is especially true when there is nothing in her whole letter which in the slightest degree conflicts with or casts doubt upon her intention as expressed in the above-mentioned paragraph.

[5] On the other hand, the proponent contends that the letter clearly shows an intention on the part of the deceased to make a testamentary disposition of her property. In order for a document to be the last will and testament of a deceased person, it must, in addition to meeting all other legal requirements, clearly show that the decedent intended it to take effect only after his death, and it must satisfactorily appear therefrom that the decedent intended by the very paper itself to make a disposition of his property in favor of the party claiming thereunder. Estate of Meade, 118 Cal. 428, 50 P. 541, 62 Am. St. Rep. 244; Major's Estate, 89 Cal. App. 238, 264 P. 542; Estate of Beffa, 54 Cal. App. 186, 188, 201 P. 616; Estate of Spitzer, 196 Cal. 301, 307, 237 P. 739, 742. The latter two of the foregoing cases express the rule as follows: "It is undoubtedly the general rule enunciated by the leading case of Habergham v. Vincent, 2 Ves. Jr. 231, and oft repeated, that the true test of the character of an instrument is not the testator's realization that it is a will, but his intention to create a revocable disposition of his property to accrue and take effect only upon his death and passing no present interest."

[6] We are of the opinion that the document in question, the letter written by the deceased, and particularly that paragraph thereof quoted above, meets the test prescribed by the rule announced in the foregoing cited cases. That she intended that it should take effect only after her death is manifest. The purported disposition of her property follows a request that her body be cremated. She undoubtedly had then formed the intent to take her life, and the whole letter shows unmistakable evidence that it was written with the avowed purpose of arranging her affairs after death. Having intended that the letter, or at least that portion thereof which deals with her property, should take effect only after her death, the only remaining question is whether the decedent in any part of said letter has made, or intended to make, a disposition of that portion of her property referred to in her said letter.

[7] The fact that the words, which the proponent claims to be a testamentary disposition of her property, were contained in a letter and were not set forth in a formally prepared will, does not detract from their testamentary character. The books are full of cases holding that letters under proper circumstances may be testamentary in character, and accordingly they have been proved and judicially determined to be testamentary dispositions of the property of the testator. A partial list of such cases will be found in the note to Estate of Kelleher, Deceased, 54 A. L. R. 913, 926.

"You can have the house * * * and all things of value" are words of gift as direct and certain as if the testatrix had said, "I give you the house and all things of value." They perhaps might not have been used by a trained lawyer had he been called upon to draw the decedent's will, but to a layman they have practically the same legal significance as if the word "gift" had been used. The contents of the letter show that she felt that she had been a burden to her former husband and that she exceedingly regretted that fact. She was asking a further favor of him that he might attend to the final disposition of her body after her death by means of cremation, and that this last request of hers might not be an additional burden upon him, she gave him the house and other articles of value, "so you won't be out any money in burying me." The record does not disclose the value of the house and other property mentioned in her letter, but evidently she considered that they were of sufficient value to meet the expense of her funeral. If it be assumed that the value of the property given the proponent exceeded, even to a considerable extent, the expense of cremating the body of the deceased, that fact could not be held to change the plain meaning of the words, or defeat the disposition which she had thereby made of her property. It may well be that she gave the property to her former husband, not only to reimburse him for the expense incident to the final disposition of her body, but also to provide a home for her boys, whose custody and care she had committed to the proponent, their father.

[8] The argument is made that as the letter is filled with expressions of love for her two sons that it is not reasonable to suppose that she would disinherit them in favor of her divorced husband. If this were all that the letter contained, there might be some force to the argument. But the letter further shows, not only that the decedent had a deep and abiding affection for her former husband, but that she relied exclusively upon him to care for her two boys when she was gone. It also shows that she had every confidence in the proponent that he would act as a true father to her children, for after requesting him to "keep your loving arms around them and protect them," she added, "I know you will and always have." What would be more natural for the mother under these circumstances than to give to the man, the father of her children, for whom she had such a deep affection, and into whose care she had so confidently intrusted the future welfare of her sons, the little property that she possessed that he might be the better able to carry out the trust imposed in him? It is not necessary, however, for us to resort to further argument as to the intent of the decedent. We are satisfied that the plain terms of the letter, written under the circumstances shown, can leave no doubt, but that the decedent intended to give, and did give to the proponent the property mentioned in the letter, and that this gift having been made with the intent that it should take effect upon her death is clearly a testamentary disposition of the property of the deceased in favor of the proponent.

This disposes of all points of any merit raised on the appeal. The judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter an order admitting to probate the letter in question as the last will and testament of Grace Edna Button, deceased.

CALIFORNIA PACIFIC TITLE & TRUST CO. v. BOYLE.

S. F. 13777.

Supreme Court of California.

April 25, 1930.

1. Municipal corporations ☞864(3).

City and county of San Francisco, with purpose of acquiring large tract, total cost to exceed revenue of one year, could yearly purchase land in small parcels without violation of Constitution and charter (Const. art. 11, § 18).

Under Const. art. 11, § 18, city may not incur indebtedness or liability exceeding in any year income and revenue provided for such year, and, under charter of city and county of San Francisco, city and county are required to submit proposition of bonded indebtedness, where cost of land sought to be acquired exceeds income and revenue provided for city and county for any one year.

2. Municipal corporations ☞863(1).

Wisdom of entering into contract whereby city yearly acquires small parcel of land desired held within discretion of municipality and not reviewable by court.

In Bank.

Application by the California Pacific Title & Trust Company for writ of mandate to be directed to Thomas F. Boyle, as Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco, to compel the auditing and approval of a demand in payment of the purchase price of certain property for park purposes.

Writ granted.

James P. Sweeney and Henry E. Monroe, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Frank L. Fenton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Walter A. Dold, Chief Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, amici curiæ, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

In June of 1926 the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco duly passed and approved a resolution reciting that public interest and necessity require the acquisition by the city and county of San Francisco, a municipal corporation of certain lands, therein described by metes and bounds, amounting to approximately 550 acres. The resolution further recited that the said property is suitable, adaptable, necessary, and required for the public use of the city and county of San Francisco as and for a public park; that it is necessary that a fee-simple title be taken for such use, and the city attorney was ordered to commence proceedings in eminent domain against the owner of the described lands. The lands described in this resolution embrace, more or less, the area that is popularly known as McLaren Park in the Mission District of San Francisco, and the total value of said lands is probably in excess of $2,000,000.

This resolution, it is admitted by all concerned in this proceeding, was never acted upon by the city attorney and no proceedings in eminent domain were ever brought, or any other proceedings taken pursuant thereto. The board of supervisors, however, did not entirely abandon the project to acquire a park in that section of the city and county. Each year, commencing with the fiscal year 1926-1927, the board of supervisors has appropriated various sums of money for the acquisition of various separate parcels of land in the general area in question. The apparent purpose of the board of supervisors was, and probably still is, to acquire during each year various parcels of the land in the general area, and after a number of years have elapsed, and all of the land in the general area has been acquired, to create a large park. The sum of $100,000 was appropriated and set aside for the purchase of such lands in the budget for the fiscal year 1926-1927; the sum of $150,000 in the budget for the fiscal year 1927-1928; the sum of $150,000 in the budget for the fiscal year 1928-1929 and the sum of $150,000 in the budget for the present fiscal year of 1929-1930.

On November 26, 1928, a proposition was submitted to the voters at a general election to incur a bonded indebtedness for $2,000,000 for the acquisition and improvement of the entire tract in question. This proposition was defeated.

Despite this defeat of the project to buy all the lands at once, the board of supervisors included in the 1928-1929 budget and in the 1929-1930 budget an appropriation entitled "Purchase of lands for public purposes in Mission District, $150,000." The board of supervisors regularly adopted a resolution, and the same was approved by the mayor, permitting such expenditures. On September 24, 1928, the clerk of the board drew a warrant on respondent herein, Thomas F. Boyle, auditor, in the sum of $125,553 in favor of petitioner, said sum to be payment in full for certain parcels of land in the general area of McLaren Park. Respondent Boyle refused to audit and approve the warrant, and still continues to refuse to audit and approve the warrant. Petitioner therefore requests a peremptory writ of mandate commanding respondent to audit and approve the demand.

In his answer and return to the petition, respondent sets forth the facts above enumerated and contends that the park project will take many years to complete and that the total cost will exceed the income and revenue of said city and county for each fiscal year. Respondent also contends that the board of supervisors is attempting to purchase property on the installment plan, and that, under the authority of certain cases to be hereinafter discussed, all expenditures for the above purposes are without authority and violate certain provisions of the California Constitution and the city and county charter, Article 11, § 18, of the state Constitution provides, in part: "No county, city, town, township, board of education, or school district, shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose, nor unless before or at the time of incurring such indebtedness provision shall be made for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also provision to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof on or before maturity, which shall not exceed forty years from the time of contracting the same."

Article XVI, section 29, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco provides in part:

"When the supervisors shall determine that the public interest requires the acquisition of any land or lands or the construction or acquisition of any permanent building or buildings, improvement or improvements, the cost of which, in addition to the other expenses of the city and county will exceed the income and revenue provided for the city and county for any one year, they must by ordinance submit a proposition or propositions to incur a bonded indebtedness for such purpose or purposes to the electors of the city and county at a special election to be held for that purpose only."

[1] The main question presented to us by this proceeding is: Can a city and county, with the apparent purpose of acquiring a large tract of land, the total cost of which would exceed the income and revenue of any one year, purchase land for public use in small parcels in the general area yearly, or does such a procedure violate the sections of the Constitution and charter above enumerated?

These sections have been a fruitful source of litigation. From an early date it has been held that so-called "contingent" installment contracts do not violate the constitutional provision quoted supra, nor do they violate city charters containing provisions similar to the one under consideration here. A leading case on the subject is McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 P. 358, 359, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191. In that case the city of Fresno entered into a contract with McBean by which he agreed to take care and dispose of the sewage of the city for a period of five years for the sum of $4,900 per annum. For three years both parties to the contract fulfilled its conditions. The fourth year the city refused payment upon the ground that the contract was void, because it violated the state Constitution and the charter of Fresno. The court thus discusses the purport and intent of the constitutional provision under consideration: "In the constitutional provision under consideration, the framers had in mind the great and ever-growing evil to which the municipalities of the state were subjected by the creation of a debt in one year, which debt was not, and was not expected to be, paid out of the revenues of that year, but was carried on into succeeding years, increasing like a rolling snowball as it went, until the burden of it became almost unbearable upon the taxpayers. It was to prevent this abuse that the constitutional provision was enacted. * * * Each year's income and revenue must pay each year's indebtedness and liability, and no indebtedness or liability incurred in one year shall be paid out of the income or revenue of any future year. The taxpayers of municipalities are thus protected against the improvident creation of inordinate debts, which may be charged against them and their property in ever-increasing volume from year to year." The court then points out that all creditors deal with a municipality with knowledge of this limitation of power and with knowledge of the fact that, if the yearly revenue is not sufficient, the creditor cannot recover against the city because the security or assets to which he may look for payment have been exhausted. It was held that the contract under consideration did not violate the provisions mentioned above; the theory of the ruling is stated as follows:

"When it is come to consider the contractual relations between the city and appellant, it is at once seen that the city cannot be liable in any one year for more than four thousand nine hundred dollars, an amount far within the revenue derived to the sewer fund; and, further, that it cannot become liable for this amount at all until faithful service rendered by the contractor each year. * * * We base our views upon the conviction that, at the time of entering into the contract, no debt or liability is created for the aggregate amount of the installments to be paid under the contract, but that the sole debt or liability created is that which arises from year to year in separate amounts as the work is performed."

After a full review of the authorities it was held that the contract was valid, operative, and binding upon the city.

In Smilie v. Fresno County, 112 Cal. 311, 44 P. 556, the county had entered into an installment contract for the building of a courthouse, payments to be made as work was completed, out of the revenues of two succeeding years. The revenue of neither year singly was sufficient to bear the total cost, but the payments falling due each year were within the income limit of that year. Upon the authority of the McBean Case, supra, it was held that, since each year's revenue was adequate to pay each year's indebtedness, the contract was not violative of the Constitution or charter.

Another leading case on the point is Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 76 P. 958, 960. There the city of Sacramento entered into two contracts for the purpose of having installed a certain telegraph system for the use of the police and fire departments. Payments were to be made monthly covering a period of five years. Monthly payments were for the rent of the instruments for that month, the city being given the privilege of purchasing the system for a stipulated sum, the amount paid as rentals to be applied on the purchase price. It was contended that the contracts were void for the reason that the total rental for the five-year period exceeded any one year's income. The court held otherwise, stating:

"It was evidently the intention of the framers of the Constitution to make the income and revenue of each year pay the indebtedness and liabilities incurred during such year, and that the revenues and income of a subsequent year should not be applied to pay liabilities of a past fiscal year. In this case the contracts were made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. It is evident that they did not create any liability at the time they were executed, except a contingent future liability. The language of the stipulation is that there were no funds at the time said alleged contracts were made and amended. At the time they were made, as amended, there was nothing due upon them, and there could not be, in the nature of things, any rent due until after the * * * fiscal year—July 1, 1900. * * * The monthly rental under both contracts was $690. This amount would not become due until the appellant had performed his contracts and put the systems contemplated by the contracts in operation. The amounts to become due on completion of the contracts by appellant might never become a liability upon the city. A sum payable upon a contingency is not a debt, nor does it become a debt until the contingency happens. * * * There may be ample funds to pay the rental when it accrues, as provided in the contracts, if it ever should accrue."

From these cases, and others that might be cited, it appears that, before it will be held that a contract is violative of the constitutional or charter provisions under consideration, it must appear that, at the time the contract was entered into, the city became obligated to pay in that year more than its income for that year, and that an installment contract dependent upon services or materials to be furnished in the future does not violate the provisions mentioned, if the services or material furnished in any one year, for which a charge can be made, do not exceed the income and revenue for that year. In the case under discussion, it seems clear to us that the city and county of San Francisco has not exceeded its income or revenue for any one year by the purchase of individual parcels of land for a public purpose for a sum within the income and revenue of that year, even though it is the intent to ultimately acquire a large tract, the purchase price of which, in toto, would exceed the yearly income or revenue for any one year.

The above cases would be conclusive on the point were it not for a series of fairly recent cases which have, to an extent, limited the doctrine there enunciated. Three of these cases are sufficient to illustrate the nature of this limitation. They are Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 201 P. 925, 928; City and County of San Francisco v. Boyle, 195 Cal. 426, 233 P. 965, 969; and Mahoney v. City and County of San Francisco, 201 Cal. 248, 257 P. 49.

In the Carmichael Case, supra, certain parties deeded to the city of Sacramento certain lands for park purposes, subject to certain conditions subsequent to the effect that the city must expend $5,000 in the improvement of the park, the total cost of such improvements to be about $50,000. Failure to expend the above sum was to result in a forfeiture of the city's interest. The project would materially benefit other lands of the grantors in the vicinity. It was held that, in effect, this was an attempt to purchase the property on the installment plan. The court pointed out that, although the city could not be compelled to spend the $5,000 each year, if they did not, the entire interest of the city would be forfeited. The grantors had completely fulfilled their part of the contract on the date of the conveyance. The city must either expend the money from its future revenues to complete the work, or lose the property, together with all moneys already expended. The court therefore held that a debt was created at the time the contract was entered into for all sums subsequently to be paid, and, therefore, the constitutional provision was violated.

The court thus distinguishes the McBean Case and the others cited, supra: "Here [the Carmichael Case] the full liability to the grantors was created upon the acceptance of the deed; the entire consideration therefor having been furnished. The cases cited [McBean Case, etc.] involved contracts for the furnishing to a city in the future of service, materials, etc., and it is held that no indebtedness or liability within the meaning of the constitutional provision is incurred until the furnishing of the service, materials, etc., the consideration for the payment to be made. The distinction is clear, and is recognized by many decisions. It is concisely stated in Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co., 172 U. S. 1, 20, 19 S. Ct. 77, 43 L. Ed. 341, as follows: 'In the one case the indebtedness is not created until the consideration has been furnished; in the other * * * the debt is created at once, the time of payment being only postponed.'"

In City and County of San Francisco v. Boyle, supra, the following situation was presented: The city and an exposition company entered into an agreement which the parties denominated a lease. By the terms of this agreement, the exposition company, as lessor, agreed to erect, on certain lands designated, an exposition building at a total cost of $1,200,000. The agreement further provided that the exposition company leased this building to the city for a period of seventeen years subject to certain conditions, one of which was the payment of the sum of $100,000 to the exposition company by the city. It was the appropriation of that $100,000 that was under consideration by the court. The agreement had certain other provisions necessary to an understanding of the case. A payment of $185,000 yearly by the city was to be made to the exposition company, and this payment was to be made yearly even though the building were not completed. The city agreed that, during the term of the agreement, it would include in each of its annual budgets such amount as was required by the lease. The city was given an option to purchase the property, the above payments to be applied on the purchase price. Also, all sums received by the city as rentals for the building were to go to the exposition company during the lease period and were to be applied upon the purchase price if the option to purchase was exercised by the city.

The court interpreted this agreement and held it was not a lease, even though so denominated, and held it was, in effect, an installment contract for the purchase of the land and building. The court said: "It also quite clearly appears that the so-called option on the part of the municipality to purchase the said property becomes in effect an increasing compulsion upon it to consummate such purchase, since not to do so would result in the irrevocable loss to the municipality, not only of the primary and succeeding annual payments, which it is bound to make under this agreement, but also of the entire usufruct of the property during the period of its occupation."

The court then, following the Carmichael Case, supra, held that the agreement violated the constitutional provision.

Somewhat the same problem was presented for consideration in Mahoney v. City and County of San Francisco, supra (the so-called Spring Valley Case), where an alleged lease was under consideration. Under the terms of this "lease" large and undetermined sums had to be spent by the city in improvement and upkeep of the property. This "lease" likewise contained an option to purchase and a forfeiture clause.

The court properly found that the agreements were in fact not leases, but were, in effect, agreements to purchase the land on the installment plan. The court held that the doctrine of the Boyle and the Carmichael Cases, supra, was controlling, and that, therefore, the lease was void. At page 263 of 201 Cal., 257 P. 49, 56, the court used the following language:

"We do not understand that the force and effect of the constitutional restrictions may be avoided—however beneficial such an avoidance may appear to be to the municipality by permitting it to carry forward its plans—that expenditures may be incurred for improvements and for other public uses for which the municipality is liable, and which, though not definitely fixed or even estimated, will inevitably exceed the income and revenue provided for the fiscal year in which the contract is entered into, or any future year, because, perchance, the question of the ability of the municipality to meet its obligations is left in a state of doubt or uncertainty occasioned by the phraseology of the contract, or upon the theory that the possible occurrence of an event which in all probability will not happen may happen, or the possible failure of a condition which must from the logic of the situation be performed will not be performed. If this be the rule of construction, the restriction provisions of the Constitution and charter would become practically nullities, and there would be no opportunity for the taxpayers to be heard as to the incurring of indebtedness or liability that would become a charge upon the future income or revenue of municipal and public corporations."

The court at some length discusses the McBean and other cases cited supra, and distinguishes them substantially as was done in the Carmichael Case.

We have no hesitancy in holding that the doctrine of the Carmichael, Boyle, and Spring Valley Cases, supra, has no application to the state of facts here presented. In all three of the cases cited there was a direct or indirect obligation on the city to pay the total purchase price at the time the contract was entered into, even though the payments were to be made over a period of years. In the case at bar, each year the city purchases certain parcels of land, paying the full purchase price thereof. There is no obligation to buy any other land. The city owns the land purchased, absolutely, and has the complete usufruct thereof. No objection could be made to such a purchase, if it were not for the fact that it appears to be the intention of the city to purchase an entire tract over a period of years. Each year the city gets the full consideration for that year's expenditures. In the event they do not purchase the additional land, the amount invested in the other parcels is not lost, for the city retains the land which it has purchased. The distinguishing characteristic between the two lines of authority already considered is very concisely stated by the United States Supreme Court in Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co., 172 U. S. 1, 19 S. Ct. 77, 85, 43 L. Ed. 341, as follows: "In the one case the indebtedness is not created until the consideration has been furnished; in the other, the debt is created at once, the time of payment being only postponed."

[2] Respondent makes much of the fact that the voters defeated a bond project to purchase the entire tract at an election for that purpose. Respondent contends that this conclusively shows that the proposed park, in the opinion of the voters, was not necessary. It could, with equal logic, be contended that the voters were not in favor of a bond issue for the purchase of the park, but were in favor of the purchase of the site in the manner then being followed, that is, by yearly purchases out of revenue. In any event, we are not called upon to decide this point. The wisdom or political expediency of entering into such contracts has been left to the discretion of the municipality and may not be reviewed by the courts.

It is not necessary to pass upon the other questions presented by respondent. This proceeding is for a writ of mandate in reference to the payment of $125,550, duly appropriated and designated. What may or may not have happened in prior years, with reference to exceeding the budget allowance, is not now before us for decision.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue herein as prayed.

Rehearing Granted May 29, 1930.

1. Usury ⇐126.

Generally, plea of usury is personal to borrower.

2. Usury ⇐132.

Generally, plea of usury does not exist in favor of creditor claiming usury in transaction of his debtor with another creditor.

3. Usury ⇐132.

Grantors taking second deed of trust, by conduct held to have waived right to relief on plea of usury between grantee and lender taking first trust deed (Usury Act).

The conduct of grantors which constituted waiver of right to relief on plea of usury, under Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), consisted in taking a junior lien with knowledge of prior lien and with knowledge of alleged usury having waited more than period of limitations before instituting suit claiming usury, in foreclosing security with knowledge of facts and purchasing equity of redemption without a hint of usury, and, after senior claim had become due, in securing reduction in rate of interest thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by E. I. Ames and another against the Occidental Life Insurance Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

E. Neal Ames, of Los Angeles, and Farnsworth, Burke & Maddox, of Visalia, for appellants.

Hurt & Howard and William A. Farner, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J.

Plaintiffs and appellants on July 1, 1924, exchanged real property with one Greenhaw and wife. Plaintiffs' property was clear. The Greenhaw property was incumbered. Plaintiffs, however, agreed that the Greenhaws might place a first deed of trust upon the property they were buying for $15,000, which was done. Plaintiffs took a second deed of trust on the property for $4,750, the balance due them on the exchange. The Greenhaws, so it is alleged, were to do certain things with the money so secured on the first deed of trust, in which respondent Title Company was named as trustee, respondent insurance company being the lender. The Greenhaws made one or two payments on account of interest, then defaulted, and later went through bankruptcy. Plaintiffs paid the interest called for on the loan for a time; later they secured a reduction in the rate of interest.

On the due date of the obligation, to wit, July 11, 1927, they entered into a new arrangement with respondent lender whereby a new period of forbearance was created to run for three years and the rate of interest was decreased, since which time plaintiffs have assumed the validity of the transaction and have impliedly, if not expressly, assumed payment of the obligation, having paid the interest according to said new arrangement, but having paid nothing as yet on the principal. Said extension will expire on July 11, 1930; hence this cause has been hurried to decision anent the approach of said day.

On January 28, 1929, plaintiffs brought the present action for legal and equitable relief, having for its object the purging of the transaction between the lender and the Greenhaws of its alleged usurious taint; also the recovery of all interest paid by them (plaintiffs) and praying that the amount be trebled. Prayer is also made for all equitable relief permitted in such case according to plaintiffs' interpretation of the so-called Usury Act (Stats. 1919, p. lxxxiii). Respondents demurred generally and specially to the complaint. The demurrers were sustained by the court below without leave to amend. Judgment passed for defendants, from which plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal.

The claim of usury in the transaction resulting in the first deed of trust is based upon the following allegations: The note was for $15,000, with interest at 7½ per cent. per annum, which shows nothing objectionable on its face, but it is averred that in getting this loan respondent insurance company, to hide a usurious demand or bonus of some $4,500, in addition to the interest named in the note, required the borrowers to purchase an outside lot owned by it for $5,000, when in truth and in fact said lot was worth but $500. The lot appears as parcel No. 2 in the above-mentioned deeds of trust. It is further alleged that the Greenhaws knew that they were being charged a usurious rate of interest by this transaction, but plaintiffs, although they knew of the purchase of the lot, did not know, at the time of the taking of their deed of trust, the price at which it was held in the transaction.

Presumably at least, however, it must here be stated plaintiffs did know of the true facts soon thereafter, and continued to have such knowledge for more than four years next prior to the beginning of this action. Plaintiffs, of course, also knew them at the time they paid the several items of interest and at the time they entered into said new arrangement with respondent lender for an extension of time and reduction of interest. Not only is this true, but in 1926 plaintiffs foreclosed their second deed of trust and became the purchasers of the property at the sale thereunder and were, at the time they instituted this action, the holders of the equitable title thereto, subject only to the said deed of trust held by respondent lender.

The question presented on the appeal is: May the plaintiffs, in the face of the foregoing facts, be heard to urge the existence and presence of usury in the transaction between the Greenhaws on the one hand and respondent insurance company on the other?

[1, 2] Plaintiffs assert that they recognize the general rule that the plea of usury is personal to the borrower. Matthews v. Ormerd, 140 Cal. 578, 74 P. 136; Esposti v. Rivers Bros. (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 423; 27 R. C. L., p. 281, § 83. They admit also that as a rule the plea does not exist in favor of a creditor claiming usury in a transaction of his debtor with another creditor. 27 R. C. L., supra. But they allege that their claim comes within at least two exceptions to the above rule: First, that of junior incumbrancers; and, second, that of creditors complaining against an insolvent debtor. Respondents reply alleging laches, the three and four-year statutes of limitation, absence of right on the part of plaintiffs to assert the plea of usury, and, finally, the waiver of any such right, if in fact it theretofore existed. They also could make the claim that plaintiffs have not offered to do equity by tendering the principal or any other amount due respondents under the original transaction.

[3] For the purposes of disposition of this cause, we prefer to rest our conclusion upon the proposition that by their conduct plaintiffs waived any right to relief to any extent upon the plea of usury. This arises from a consideration in the aggregate of the facts. With knowledge of a prior lien of $15,000, they accepted a junior claim for $4,750. With knowledge of the alleged usury they waited more than the period of limitation before instituting suit. With knowledge of the facts, in 1926, some three years prior to suit, they foreclosed their security and purchased the equity of redemption at their own sale without a hint of usury in the first lien. With such knowledge, they also procured, after the debt fell due, a new term of forbearance for a period of three years, and impliedly, if not expressly, agreed to pay the debt, thereby securing a reduction in the rate of interest, and since that time they have paid according to said new arrangement the accruing interest charges. Now to grant at this time either the legal or equitable relief prayed for to plaintiffs is to allow them to play fast and loose concerning the previous usurious transaction, while holding the respondent lender to its contract, made to its detriment, upon the faith of plaintiffs' acknowledgment of the debt as genuine. The principle is akin to the rule governing waiver of fraud, where with knowledge thereof a party accepts favors from the perpetrator or commits other acts respecting the subject-matter inconsistent with his present claim of fraud.

The questions of the right of a junior incumbrancer or lien claimant to purge the senior transaction of its usury or the right of one creditor to claim the benefit of the Usury Act in a transaction between the debtor and another creditor, where the debtor is insolvent, we prefer to leave until an occasion arises where they are fairly involved.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOFFMAN v. DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, DIVISION OF INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS AND SAFETY, et al. ★

S. F. 13510.

Supreme Court of California.

April 24, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 22, 1930.

1. Master and servant ☞387—Employer could not be held guilty of serious and willful misconduct for violating orders of Department of Industrial Relations, where there was no evidence he knew of orders (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6, as amended).

Building contractor, whose employee was injured, could not be held guilty of serious and willful misconduct, making him liable for penalty under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6 (St. 1917, p. 834, as amended by St. 1919, p. 912, and by St. 1923, p. 375), for violating certain safety orders issued by Department of Industrial Relations, where there was no evidence that he ever saw or heard of such orders.

2. Master and servant ☞115(3)—Where two stories of building are erected, statute requiring temporary floors to protect workmen requires that temporary floors be laid (St. 1921, p. 452).

Where two stories of building have been erected, it then becomes necessary, under St.

1921, p. 452, requiring temporary floors to protect workmen, to lay temporary floors.

3. Master and servant ⇨115(3)—Space which need not be covered with temporary floors to protect workmen constructing building is space for elevator shaft or similar space; "space required for the proper construction" (St. 1921, p. 452, § 1 (b)).

Phrase "except such space as may reasonably be required for the proper construction of such building," in St. 1921, p. 452, § 1 (b), requiring temporary floors to protect workmen constructing building applies to elevator shaft or similar space which is ordinarily kept clear and used from basement to roof as passageway for hoisting and lowering of materials.

4. Master and servant ⇨115(3)—Building contractor could not justify his violation of statute requiring temporary floors to protect workmen by showing ignorance of law (St. 1921, p. 452).

Building contractor could not justify his violation of St. 1921, p. 452, requiring temporary floors to protect workmen, by showing that he did not know existence of law.

5. Evidence ⇨65—Employer was presumed to know law requiring temporary floors to protect workmen constructing building (St. 1921, p. 452).

Employer was presumed to know law under St. 1921, p. 452, requiring temporary floors to protect workmen constructing building.

6. Master and servant ⇨405 (6)—Evidence justified finding building contractor's acts violating statute requiring temporary floors to protect workmen constituted serious and willful misconduct, making him liable for penalty (St. 1921, p. 452, § 1 (b); Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6, as amended, and § 31 (b)).

Evidence justified finding of Department of Industrial Relations that acts of building contractor, whose employee was injured when floor on which he was standing gave way, which floor violated St. 1921, p. 452, § 1 (b), requiring temporary floors to protect workmen by covering span exceeding thirteen feet with boards two inches thick not supported by intermediate brace and not laid tightly together, constituted serious and willful misconduct, making him liable for penalty under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6, St. 1917, p. 834, as amended by St. 1919, p. 912, and by St. 1923, p. 375, and section 31 (b) (St. 1917, p. 860).

RICHARDS, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Paul Broschinsky, claimant, for injuries, opposed by Leo Hoffman, employer.

The Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, awarded compensation, and the employer applies for certiorari to review the award.

Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 284 P. 451.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal, herewith adopted, see 276 P. 1060.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner and Edward O. Allen, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Herbert C. Kaufman, of San Francisco, for beneficiary.

F. W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, for Paul Broschinsky.

WASTE, C. J.

The above cause was transferred to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, in order that further consideration might be given to the contention of the petitioner that the Industrial Accident Commission acted in excess of its jurisdiction in finding that the employer was guilty of "serious and willful misconduct," and in imposing the additional 50 per cent. compensation permitted by the Workmen's Compensation Act in such cases. Such further consideration convinces us that the award was proper, and that the decision of the District Court of Appeal correctly disposes of that question. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal, written by Mr. Justice Sturtevant, and concurred in by the late Mr. Presiding Justice Koford and by Mr. Justice Nourse, is therefore adopted as the opinion of this court in the cause:

This is a proceeding brought to review an award heretofore made by the respondents in a proceeding brought before the respondents by Paul Broschinsky in an endeavor to obtain the compensation payable to him as an employee because of injuries sustained by him in an accident which befell him when, in the course of his employment, the floor on which he was standing gave way and he fell to the ground below. Through an abundance of precaution, he named as defendants Leo Hoffman and his insurance carrier, the Metropolitan Casualty Company, and he also named Charles S. Hoffman and Ludwig W. Fleigner, doing business as Golden Gate Iron Works, and their insurance carrier, the State Compensation Insurance Fund. This multiplicity of defendants arose because of the debatable question whether Leo Hoffman was but the agent of Golden Gate Iron Works and the latter was, in truth and in fact, applicant's employer, or whether Leo Hoffman was an independent contractor and the applicant was his employee. The respondents adopted the latter theory, and dismissed all defendants except Leo Hoffman and his carrier.

The case then proceeded against the remaining defendants. That Leo Hoffman, as employer, and Metropolitan Casualty Company, as his carrier, were liable to the applicant, was not disputed. But the respondents held that the employer was guilty of "serious and willful misconduct," and that the compensation payable should be increased 50 per cent. It also held that the employer's carrier was liable for the sums based on section 9 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 886, as amended by St. 1919, p. 913, and St. 1925, p. 640), but that the penalty of 50 per cent. added under section 6 of said act (St. 1917, p. 834, as amended St. 1919, p. 912, and St. 1923, p. 375) should be borne solely by the employer. They made this segregation of liability in conformity with the statute. Sections 6 and 31b (St. 1917, p. 860). The employer has filed in this court his petition praying to have annulled that portion of the award so made against him, claiming that he was not guilty of "serious and willful misconduct," and, as he carried insurance, the burden should rest on his carrier and that he should have been dismissed. The accident occurred while the applicant was acting as helper in the erection of a steel-frame apartment house at Palo Alto, Cal. The Golden Gate Iron Works had the contract to furnish the material and erect the frame. Leo Hoffman had the contract to do the erecting for the Golden Gate Iron Works. The building being erected was one consisting of five stories and a roof. It had no excavation under it, but commenced at the ground level. Immediately before the accident happened the work had progressed to a point where the first and second stories had been erected, a temporary plank floor had been laid over the beams, and columns for the third story had been assembled on the temporary floor and the workmen were engaged in distributing those columns in piles for the purpose of putting the columns in place. In some places the span between the beams was over 13 feet. At the particular place where the accident occurred the span from center to center was 15 feet 2 inches. Through a mutual arrangement between Leo Hoffman and the general contractor, the wooden floor joists, consisting of pine boards 16 feet long, 12 inches wide and 2 inches thick, were delivered on the job by trucks, and Leo Hoffman had the privilege of hoisting the planks and distributing them on any floor and using them as temporary flooring. In accordance with this arrangement, his employees had, the day before the accident, hoisted and distributed the planking, and in this manner had constructed the temporary floor. Neither at the span where the accident occurred nor in any other span, so far as the record discloses, was an intermediate beam or other device used to support the temporary flooring. The employer testified that to insert an intermediate beam of wood might necessitate the use of a saw, but that there was no saw on the job, and he had never seen a saw on an erecting job. As to whether the planks were laid close together there was much dispute. In this regard the evidence is clear to the effect that the columns projected somewhat above the beams of the floor, and bolts projected from the columns and beams in places. Because of these two facts, no floor was laid from one column to the opposite column on any given string of columns, and the planking alongside of the columns was distant, according to the evidence, from 1½ inches to 3 inches, thus leaving a space of possibly 16 inches instead of 12 inches in the event that a plank should break.

Paul Broschinsky went to work on the day of the accident. During that day the men were engaged in distributing the columns for the third story. At about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, while so engaged, Paul Broschinsky and another fellow laborer, J. Jensen, both happened to step on the same plank at the same time. As they did so the plank broke. Jensen succeeded in catching hold of a support and did not fall to the ground. However, Paul Broschinsky was not so fortunate, and he fell to the ground, suffering the injuries which are the subject-matter of this claim. An examination of the broken plank disclosed that it was a piece of timber sawed from immediately adjacent to a knot, and the board so produced was apparently clear on one side, but it had the rings of a knot on the other side. This board had been placed on the temporary floor knot side down. Evidence was introduced that from time to time the respondents had issued certain safety orders, and that those orders had been posted on some of the buildings which were being erected by Golden Gate Iron Works. There is no evidence that this petitioner, Leo Hoffman, was engaged on any one of said buildings, nor that he ever saw or heard of the orders or the contents thereof. There is no claim that any one of the orders was posted on the building on which this accident arose. There was evidence that on a date three or four months prior to the accident, while erecting another building, one of the agents of the respondents had occasion to bring to the attention of Leo Hoffman that he was violating chapter 334 of the Statutes of 1921, p. 452; that is, the particular statute other provisions of which are involved in this application.

[1] The petitioner claims that it may not be said that he was guilty of "serious and willful misconduct" because he violated certain safety orders issued by the respondents. That claim, we think, is well founded. As we have shown above, there is no evidence that he ever saw or heard of such orders. He did not willfully violate an order which, so far as the record shows, he had never seen nor heard of.

[2, 3] As to chapter 334, Statutes 1921, p. 452, the petitioner claims he did not violate any of its provisions. This claim is based on the fact that no column of the third story had been erected at the time of the accident, and therefore the duty to lay temporary floors had not arisen. This point involves a construction of the statute. It is not necessary to quote the entire statute. It is not claimed that the statute applies to a building of one or two stories. It is not claimed that the statute applies to a higher building at any instant of time before the second story has been erected. But after that instant it then becomes necessary to lay a temporary floor. This is so for two reasons: The clear purport of the statute is to create a device, not for the absolute prevention of accidents, but for lessening the injury to the human body that may fall, and lessening the effect of falling missiles which may fall and hit a human body. The statute by its terms seeks to limit those falls to two stories. Two stories having been erected, it then becomes necessary to lay temporary floors. The floors having been laid, the next act is to assemble on that floor the columns to be incorporated into the next story. Although no one of those columns has been erected, the matter of arranging for the erection of them and for the assembling of them creates a potential danger which the statute is aimed to protect against just as effectively as against acts done in the actual erection of one or more of them. There is only one exception as to the zone which need be covered with a temporary floor—"except such space as may reasonably be required for the proper construction of such building." Section 1, subd. (b), c. 334, Stats. 1921, p. 452. That expression, we understand, applies to the elevator shaft or similar space which is ordinarily kept clear and used, from the basement to the roof, as a passageway for hoisting and lowering of materials. But such space, so excepted, is not involved in this case.

From the facts which we have hereinabove enumerated, we think it is clear that there was evidence that the building on which the accident occurred, and the stage to which the erection had progressed, came within the provisions of chapter 334, Statutes 1921, p. 452; and we also think it is clear that there was evidence that this petitioner had violated the provisions of said act by covering a span exceeding 13 feet with boards which were only 2 inches thick, and which were not supported by an intermediate brace, and which were not laid tightly together. Chapter 334, Stats. 1921, § 1, subd. (b).

[4] In the next place, he claims that he was not guilty of "serious and wilful misconduct" even though he violated the provisions of chapter 334 of the Statutes of 1921, p. 452. He rests that claim on several different contentions. He claims that he did not know of the contents, and that nobody called the contents of said statute to his attention. However, as we have shown, the contents of the statute were called to his attention. Furthermore, "in neither a criminal nor civil cause, in any circumstances, can one justify his act by the naked showing that he did not know of the existence of the law." 10 Cal. Jur. 760, § 72.

[5, 6] He then asserts that, even though he violated the statute, that mere violation of the statute is not "serious and wilful misconduct." He quotes from Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, page 421, 185 P. 510, 512, as follows: "'Wilful misconduct' means something different from and more than negligence, however gross. The term 'serious and wilful misconduct' is described by the supreme court of Massachusetts as being something 'much more than mere negligence, or even gross or culpable negligence,' and as involving 'conduct of a quasi criminal nature, the intentional doing of something either with the knowledge that it is likely to result in serious injury, or with a wanton and reckless disregard of its possible consequences.' (In re Burns, 218 Mass. 8 [Ann. Cas. 1916A, 787, 105 N. E. 601].) The mere failure to perform a statutory duty is not, alone, wilful misconduct. It amounts only to simple negligence. To constitute 'wilful misconduct' there must be actual knowledge, or that which in the law is esteemed to be the equivalent of actual knowledge, of the peril to be apprehended from the failure to act, coupled with a conscious failure to act to the end of averting injury." He also cites and quotes from E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 180, 188, 189, 193 P. 105, 108 (16 A. L. R. 611) as follows: "'Serious misconduct' of an employer must, therefore, be taken to mean conduct which the employer either knew, or ought to have known, if he had turned his mind to the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize the safety of his employees. * * * Next, as to whether such serious misconduct was 'wilful.' It has frequently been said that wilful misconduct involves the knowledge of the person that the thing which he is doing is wrong. [Citing cases.] Conceding that knowledge is required, it seems to us that in order to prove the requisite knowledge, it is not necessary for the evidence to show positively that the person was notified of the unsafe condition of his premises, but that it is sufficient if it appears that the circumstances surrounding the act of commission or omission are such as 'evince a reckless disregard for the safety of others and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of.' "

With the rule of law as stated by the petitioner, we fully agree. However, we think that the facts of this case bring it within, rather than exclude it from, the rule quoted. It will be conceded that the violation of one statute may be far more serious than the violation of another statute, and that the violation of the same statute under one set of facts may not be serious, whereas under a different set of facts it will be quite serious indeed. When, as here, men are at work at high elevations standing on narrow beams or temporary floors, if an accident happens, the possibilities of danger are many, and the probability is strong that, if injury occurs, it will be deplorable. It is therefore plain that the violation of the provisions of chapter 334, Statutes 1921, under the facts of this case, could be said to be "serious misconduct." The employer was presumed to know the law. 10 Cal. Jur. 760. Moreover, there was some evidence that he actually did know it. There was evidence that some of the spans were more than 13 feet, and over which the law required that the temporary floors be laid; that under those long spans it was necessary to insert an intermediate brace; that, to lay the boards tightly together between the columns as well as over the rest of the floor, the planks must be cut to set in between columns; and that they must be supported from below so as to fill the gaps and avoid the protruding nuts and bolts; and that to do these things the employer knew that the crew needed, but that it did not have and never had had, a saw. As the crew had no saw, the employer knew that it could not lay the temporary floors in compliance with the law, and that any failure to do so was fraught with danger to the life and limb of every member of the crew. These facts the petitioner did not attempt to deny, but he attempted to justify his noncompliance with the terms of the statute by making a showing as to what others did and a showing of the inconvenience of a full compliance. In view of these facts, we have no hesitancy in saying that there was evidence before the respondents from which they had the right to say that, in the instant case, there was on the part of the petitioner "the intentional doing of something either with the knowledge that it is likely to result in serious injury or with a wanton and reckless disregard of its probable consequences." In re Burns' Case, 218 Mass. 8, 105 N. E. 601, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 787. It follows that the finding that the acts of the employer constituted "serious and wilful misconduct" was not in excess of jurisdiction.

The award is affirmed.

We concur: PRESTON, J.; SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.; SHENK, J.

RICHARDS, J.

I dissent.

The facts of this case are fairly stated in the majority opinion herein, with the exception that there should be added thereto and emphasized the facts that the undisputed evidence before the commission disclosed that the defect and consequent weakness of the particular piece of planking which broke under the combined weight of the petitioner's employees was not known either to himself or to them, and that this was due to the circumstances that such defect was only and not easily observable upon the underside of said piece of planking, and that, so far as the upper side thereof disclosed, it was apparently as sound as the other pieces of plank which composed such temporary flooring. The further fact should be noted that the petitioner herein did not personally direct the laying of such flooring, nor personally participate therein, and that whatever "serious and wilful misconduct" is to be attributed to him by reason thereof was, in so far as the evidence herein disclosed, the "serious and wilful misconduct," if any, of his employees. His only non-compliance with the provisions of the act of 1921, upon the basis of which the respondents herein can sustain the charge of serious and willful misconduct on the part of the petitioner, consisted in the fact that he caused or permitted such flooring to be laid over portions of the space to be covered thereby wherein the distance between the beams which were to support said flooring was in excess of thirteen feet without an intermediate beam sufficient to support such temporary flooring where the span was in excess of thirteen feet. It may not be questioned that the omission of the petitioner to support this particular part of said flooring with an intermediate beam would have been such an act of negligence upon his part as would have amply sufficed to sustain the finding of the Commission with respect to a compensatory award, but whether or not such omission would in and of itself be sufficient to justify a finding that the petitioner was thereby guilty of such serious and wilful misconduct as would support the added award of the penalty complained of is the question to be decided. This court has had occasion in certain earlier cases to discuss and define the meaning of the phrase "serious and wilful misconduct" as the same is used in the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act here under review. In the case of E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 180, 188, 193 P. 105, 108, 16 A. L. R. 611, this court in undertaking to define these terms adopted the view expressed by Bevin in his treatise on "Workmen's Compensation" at pages 394 et seq., to the effect that "to constitute 'serious misconduct,' it is probable that the Legislature intended to signify conduct that an average workman in being guilty of either would know, or ought to know, if he turned his mind to consider the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize his own and his fellow workman's safety.' In our opinion [says this court], the serious misconduct of an employer under our statute may be similarly defined. There should be no difference in principle between the degree of care required of an employer and that exacted from an employee. 'Serious misconduct' of an employer must therefore be taken to mean conduct which the employer either knew, or ought to have known, if he had turned his mind to the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize the safety of his employees." The court in that case, having found that the employer in providing places and conditions of the employment which were patently unsafe was guilty of "serious misconduct," proceeded to discuss the question as to whether such serious misconduct was "wilful," and in so doing the court said: "It has frequently been said that willful misconduct involves the knowledge of the person that the thing which he is doing is wrong. [Citing cases.] Conceding that knowledge is required, it seems to us that in order to prove the requisite knowledge, it is not necessary for the evidence to show positively that the person was notified of the unsafe condition of his premises, but that it is sufficient if it appears that the circumstances surrounding the act of commission or omission are such as 'evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of.'" In Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, 421, 185 P. 510, 512, it is said: "'Willful misconduct' means something different from and more than negligence, however gross. The term 'serious and willful misconduct' is described by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts as being something 'much more than mere negligence, or even gross or culpable negligence,' and as involving 'conduct of a quasi criminal nature, the intentional doing of something either with the knowledge that it is likely to result in serious injury or with a wanton and reckless disregard of its probable consequences.' In re Burns, 218 Mass. 8, 105 N. E. 601, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 787. The mere failure to perform a statutory duty is not, alone, willful misconduct. It amounts only to simple negligence. To constitute 'willful misconduct' there must be actual knowledge, or that which in the law is esteemed to be the equivalent of actual knowledge, of the peril to be apprehended from the failure to act, coupled with a conscious failure to act to the end of averting injury. Smith v. Central, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Ala. 407, 51 So. 792." In denying a rehearing in the above case this court reserved its opinion on the question as to "whether every failure to comply with a requirement of the Industrial Accident Commission or the statute is necessarily gross negligence or wilful misconduct. On these questions we reserve expression of opinion." Upon a maturer consideration of this question, I am satisfied that the foregoing quotation from the case of Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., supra, furnishes a correct interpretation of the meaning to be given to the terms "serious and wilful misconduct," as the same are used in the Workmen's Compensation Law. The question as to whether the acts or omissions of the employer in violation of the requirements of the Workmen's Compensation Act constitute serious and willful misconduct depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. In that connection it may be stated as a sound principle to be applied to penal provisions of the nature here under review that such provisions are to be strictly construed and are not to be given application so as to impose penalties upon employers who are otherwise subject to the compensatory remedies provided for in the Workmen's Compensation Act, without a clear showing before the commission of such acts and conduct on the employer's part as evince not only actual knowledge of the law, but such an intentional disobedience thereof as would amount to a reckless disregard of the safety of his employees. I am unable to find in the facts of this particular case such a sufficient showing of willful and intentional disregard of the safety of his employees as would suffice to justify the findings and conclusion of the commission that the petitioner was guilty of such serious and willful misconduct as to bring him within the penalty prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act and imposed upon him in this particular case. The award of the Commission, in so far as it undertakes to impose such penalty, should therefore, have been annulled.

Civ. 4061.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

April 28, 1930.

Appeal and error ⇨102.

Order sustaining demurrer to complaint held not appealable (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963).

Such an order can be considered on appeal only if judgment is entered and appeal is taken from the judgment under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by T. L. Milburn against Frank D. Kennedy and another. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

Raymond F. Body, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. L. Carlisle, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff instituted this action to recover the sum of $3,230 alleged to be due from the defendants as broker's commissions. The defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint was sustained, without leave to amend. From the order sustaining the defendants' demurrer, the plaintiff has taken this appeal. The notice of appeal is in the following words, omitting the title:

"You, and each of you, will please take notice that the plaintiff, T. L. Milburn, hereby appeals from the order made on the 24th day of March, 1927, sustaining the defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's complaint without leave to plaintiff to amend his said complaint." No judgment appears to have been entered in favor of the defendants following the entry of the order just referred to.

A reference to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure shows that no appeal lies from an order sustaining a demurrer. Had a judgment been entered and appealed from, then under the provisions of section 956, Code of Civil Procedure, the order of the court sustaining the defendants' demurrer could have been considered.

The plaintiff having attempted an appeal from a nonappealable order, it follows that this court has no jurisdiction, and the merits of the case as argued by counsel need not be considered.

The appeal is dismissed.

James M. Gammon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NORTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of defendant after an order sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend. The demurrer was upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The complaint discloses that the gist of plaintiff's cause of action arises out of a state of facts which, succinctly stated, is as follows: That plaintiff and appellant is a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing window shades, awnings, and linoleums in Los Angeles county; that the California Window Shades Company was a corporation located in the same county and engaged prior to the sale thereof to plaintiff in a similar business as that of plaintiff; that prior to the incorporation of the California Window Shade Company the business in which it was engaged was conducted by the defendant and two other individuals as a copartnership; that the California Window Shade Company sold its business and the good will thereof to the plaintiff and appellant and agreed in the contract of sale that it would not engage in the same business in the county of Los Angeles as long as plaintiff was engaged in said business.

The plaintiff further alleged in his complaint that the partnership referred to herein incorporated the California Window Shade Company and transferred their business to it merely for the purpose of more conveniently handling it, and "that while it was in form a corporation, yet in truth and in fact it was a copartnership." The issued capital stock was issued to the three copartners in equal shares and they constituted the board of directors of the corporation.

The complaint seems to proceed upon the theory that the copartnership continued to exist after the formation of the corporation and that the sale of the good will and the business formerly conducted by the partnership by the California Window Shade Company was in fact a sale of the partnership interest. However, there are no facts alleged supporting such an inference. From the facts alleged it appears that after the corporation was formed, the copartnership was absorbed by it and its business carried on and conducted by it; that its stock was issued and officers elected, the defendant being the president and Van Stigt, one of the copartners, secretary thereof; that the contract of sale of the business and good will purchased by plaintiff was executed by it and that plaintiff dealt with it as a corporation.

The defendant was not a party to the contract of the selling corporation with the plaintiff. He signed the contract of sale in his representative capacity only as president of the California Window Shade Company, and that contract did not, by its terms or otherwise, purport to bind defendant not to engage in business again in competition with plaintiff nor to bind any person except the selling corporation.

[1] It is well settled in this state that a stockholder has no vendible interest in the good will of the business of the corporation and cannot transfer such good will, and if he attempts to enter into such an agreement it is void as being not within the statutory exception, and therefore in restraint of trade. Merchants' Ad-Sign Co. v. Sterling, 124 Cal. 429, 57 P. 468, 46 L. R. A. 142, 71 Am. St. Rep. 94. However, appellant seeks to avoid this established rule and alleges that the corporation form was in this case a mere convenience through which the stockholders thereof conducted a copartnership business, asserting that equity will, in such case, where necessary to circumvent fraud, protect the rights of third persons, disregard the corporate entity and deal with it as identical with its stockholders. In a proper case a court of equity will, as maintained by appellant, sweep aside the corporate fiction in order to forestall fraud and accomplish justice, but the facts pleaded by appellant in his complaint present no such case and would not justify such a view, and the facts pleaded show that there exists no basis for the assumption that the copartnership relation was continued after the formation of the selling corporation and that appellant dealt with the vendor as a copartnership, and, as stated before, the contract was with the corporation only and purported to bind it alone. The defendant signed it in his capacity as president of the corporation and it did not bind him personally. Lynch v. McDonald, 155 Cal. 704, 102 P. 918.

[2] Contracts in restraint of trade are not favored in law beyond the extent to which they are authorized by statute and then the scope is not to be extended by a construction which imports into them a meaning which cannot be found in the language of the con-

[3, 4] In this case the court cannot read into the contract an agreement that defendant should not engage in a similar business to that which the selling corporation sold to plaintiff, for there is no language in the contract permitting such a construction and it does not appear from the contract that it was so contemplated. The legitimate aim and object of the contract as disclosed by its language has not been defeated or violated by the defendant engaging in a similar business as plaintiff, and the court will not disregard the corporate entity as suggested by plaintiff to accomplish a purpose which the agreement does not show to have been within the intention of the parties. It appears from the facts pleaded that the complaint cannot be amended to state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 6986.

1. Master and servant ⇨301(3).

Person paying special police officer is not responsible for officer's acts while carrying out official duties.

2. Evidence ⇨83(2).

In action against employer for wrongful act of special police officer, it was presumed officer's acts were performed in line of public duty.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨189(3).

Special patrol officer who collected and paid salary to special policeman held not liable for injuries negligently inflicted by policeman while acting in line of public duties.

The special policeman was appointed by the police commissioners of San Francisco under San Francisco Charter, art. 8, c. 3, § 1, which gives the board power at its discretion to appoint, and at pleasure to remove, special police officers, and makes it the duty of every patrol special to see that peace is kept and to prevent violation of the law. While patrolling his beat, the officer attempted to make an arrest for disturbing the peace, and in doing so fired shot which struck plaintiff, who was an innocent bystander.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages for injuries inflicted upon him by the defendant Cesena, a special police officer. The cause was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict for $15,000 in favor of plaintiff. Defendant Pompa appeals upon typewritten transcripts.

At the request of one Tony Pompa, the defendant Cesena was appointed a special police officer by the police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco on November 13, 1923, and was assigned to beat No. 97. Prior to his appointment, Cesena was examined and recommended to the police commissioners by Capt. Layne, a captain in the regular police force assigned to the special duty of the supervision of patrol specials of the city and county. On December 10, 1923, the defendant Peter Pompa was appointed a patrol special. These special officers received their entire compensation from the property owners of the territory which they patrolled, but in this instance the defendant Pompa assumed the burden of collecting from the property owners, and from these collections paid to Cesena a regular monthly salary of $125.

On the evening of October 31, 1925, while patrolling the beat assigned to him, Cesena attempted to place under arrest one Semenza on a charge of disturbing the peace. Semenza resisted arrest, a fight ensued, during which Cesena drew his gun and shot at Semenza. Semenza ran, and Cesena took two other shots at him, one of which struck the plaintiff, who was an innocent bystander, causing the injuries which are the subject of the complaint.

[1] On this appeal respondent's whole case rests upon the doctrine of respondeat superior. If the full relation of master and servant existed between Cesena and appellant at the time of the occurrence, then the appellant would be liable to the respondent for the injuries sustained by him, because it is conceded that in attempting to make an arrest for a mere misdemeanor Cesena was not authorized to shoot at the offender, and his act in so doing was therefore negligent. The precise relation of the parties is this: Both the appellant and Cesena were employees of the property owners for the special purpose of protecting their property, and both were quasi public officials charged with the duty of maintaining law and order under the rules of the board of police commissioners.

The question of the liability for the wrongful acts of those who occupy this dual relationship of special police officers commissioned by public officials has brought about a wide difference of opinion in the authorities. One line of cases holds that there can be no recovery against one who has procured the appointment of such a police officer and who pays him for his services, while the other line holds directly contrary. There seems to be, however, an agreement of the authorities that such officers are deemed to be prima facie public officers for whose wrongful acts the "employer" is not responsible, unless it is shown that the latter has directed the acts causing the injury or has personally co-operated therein. 18 R. C. L., p. 786.

The rule in this state is given in Redgate v. Southern Pacific Co., 24 Cal. App. 573, 581, 141 P. 1191, 1194, where it is said: "It has been frequently held, under statutes similar to the above quoted, that special officers appointed thereunder derive all their powers from the appointment made by the civil authorities, here by the Governor of the state. The authority to make arrests, with which plaintiff was clothed, was in terms given by the statute and in no sense can be said to arise from the relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, existing between the special officer and the company at whose application he was commissioned; and the fact that he is 'to serve at the expense of such company' does not affect his status as that of a police officer. The rule of respondeat superior has no application where there is no evidence tending to show that the company was instrumental in causing the arrest or subsequent prosecution. The foregoing views are fully supported by the following cases, cited by appellant: Adler v. White City Construction Co., 147 Ill. App. 20; Samuel v. Wanamaker, 107 App. Div. 433, 95 N. Y. S. 270; Hershey v. O'Neill (C. C.) 36 F. 168, under the New York statute; Wells v. Washington Market Co., 19 App. D. C. [8

Mackey] 385; Tolchester Beach Imp. Co. [of Kent County] v. Steinmeier, 72 Md. 313, 8 L. R. A. 846, 20 A. 188." The same principle is carried through the cases relating to the responsibility of a public officer, such as officers of the regular police force, for the acts or omissions of subordinate members of the same force. Thus in Michel v. Smith, 188 Cal. 199, 201, 205 P. 113, 114, the Supreme Court, in holding that a sergeant of police was not responsible for the negligence of a member of his squad, said: "A public officer is not responsible for the acts or omissions of subordinates properly employed by or under him, if such subordinates are not in his private service, but are themselves servants of the government, unless he has directed such acts to be done, or has personally co-operated therein. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 382; Story on Agency, 319; Robertson v. Sichel, 127 U. S. 507-515, 32 L. Ed. 203, 8 S. Ct. 1286. See, also, note to 12 Ann. Cas. 184."

In passing it is interesting to note that the court drew the distinction between "employments" of this nature and the relation of a sheriff or constable to his deputies, saying: "The deputy is not the agent or servant of the sheriff but is his representative, and the sheriff is liable for his acts as if they had been done by himself." And so it was held that neither the chief of the police department nor the sergeant who had direct control over the patrolman who committed the acts complained of was responsible in damages for these acts, "unless it can be shown that he has directed such acts or personally co-operated therein." Page 203 of 188 Cal., 205 P. 113, 115.

In harmony with the rule of the Redgate Case we find the text in 39 C. J. p. 1273, § 1461, which reads: "Unless it is otherwise provided by statute, a private person or corporation is not responsible for the acts of a special police officer, appointed by public authority, but employed and paid by the private person or corporation, when the act complained of was performed in carrying out his duty as a public officer." In support of the text many cases are cited, and then the writer follows with a statement of the contrary rule, to which he cites an equal number of cases. Thus the California rule is followed in Healey v. Lothrop, 171 Mass. 263, 50 N. E. 540; Buman v. Michigan Central R. Co., 168 Mich. 651, 134 N. W. 972, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 107; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Kelly (C. C. A.) 177 F. 189, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 481; New York, etc., R. Co. v. Fieback, 87 Ohio St. 254, 100 N. E. 889, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1164.

The application of the foregoing rule to the case at hand seems plain. The status of special police officers appointed by the police commissioners is fixed by the San Francisco Charter, article 8, chapter 3, section 1, which provides that the board of police commissioners shall have power "4. At its discretion, upon the petition of any person, firm or corporation, to appoint, and at pleasure to remove, special police officers. Such officers shall be subject to all the rules and regulations of the board." The rules and regulations of the police department relating to special police officers were received in evidence. They divide such special officers into two classes—those appointed to regular beats were designated as "patrol specials," all others were known as "special officers." The defendant Cesena came under the designation of patrol special, and as such was subject to rule 4, which reads in part that it shall be the duty of every patrol special to see that the peace is kept, and to prevent violation of the law "they shall make arrests when the occasion requires and must see that their prisoners are at once taken to the nearest police station or jail." Rule 6 provides that in cases of emergency all such officers shall be subject to be called upon by the board to perform such duties as may be assigned to them by the proper police authorities.

[2, 3] It is apparent from these provisions of the charter and of the rules of the board of police commissioners that the defendant Cesena was a public officer, appointed by public authority, and that the appellant herein had no power either to employ or to discharge him, and had no power to control or to direct him in the performance of his duties as such patrol officer. Such being the case, the defendants were entitled to the instruction which they requested, reading: "I instruct you that special police officers, publicly commissioned, are deemed prima facie public officers, for whose wrongful acts the employer is not liable," because, when it appeared that Cesena was a public officer, his codefendant was entitled to the presumption that the acts done by Cesena were in the line of his public duty, and the burden was then upon the respondent to rebut this presumption. This principle is stated in 39 C. J. p. 1356: "Where an officer is commissioned at the request of a corporation to guard its property and is paid by it, acts done by him will be presumed to have been performed in his capacity as officer in the absence of evidence to show the contrary." In support of the text are Roll v. Springfield Consol. R. Co., 225 Ill. App. 411; New York R. R. Co. v. Fieback, 87 Ohio St. 254, 100 N. E. 889, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1164. The prejudice suffered by the appellant in the refusal to give the foregoing instruction was emphasized by the modification of the first instruction requested by the appellant. In this instruction the appellant requested, and the court instructed the jury, in the language of rule 4 of the board of police commissioners, that it was the duty of the patrol special to see that the peace was kept and to prevent violation of the law; to make themselves familiar with the provisions of the Penal Code, the rules of the board of police commissioners and the orders of the board of supervisors and the board of health; to make arrests when occasion arises, and see that the prisoners are taken to the nearest police station or jail. The court, however, struck from the requested instruction the following language: "I instruct you if you find that defendant Cesena committed the acts referred to in plaintiff's complaint while complying with either one or more of the mandates of the above rules, then his acts were those of a police officer and no liability, therefore, can attach to defendant Pompa and your verdict must be in defendant Pompa's favor." If we are correct in accepting the Redgate Case as determining the rule in this state, then it necessarily follows that the appellant was not liable for any injuries to respondent arising from the acts of Cesena which were committed while the latter was complying with the rules and regulations of the board of police commissioners, and, as this was unquestionably the theory upon which the appellant defended against that liability, he was entitled to have that theory submitted to the jury under proper instructions.

Bearing in mind the presumption that the acts of the special officer will be presumed to have been performed in his capacity as officer until the presumption is dispelled by evidence, the importance of the rejected instruction is apparent. If, as insisted by the appellant, no competent evidence was offered to dispel this presumption, then the presumption alone was of such weight as evidence as to require a verdict for appellant. If, on the other hand, as insisted by respondent, some evidence was offered for that purpose, then there was merely a conflict in the evidence upon an issue vital to appellant's case upon which he was entitled to an instruction covering the theory upon which he defended.

[4] As the cause must go back for a new trial, we should add that it is not sufficient, as contended by respondent, that the appellant paid the monthly wages to Cesena, or that he gave general directions to Cesena as to the streets which he was to patrol and the general conduct of his duties; these directions being nothing more than directions to follow the rules and regulations of the board of police commissioners. The undisputed evidence here is that before the commission of the acts complained of the appellant informed Cesena that Semenza was looking for him and proposed to fight him; that Cesena asked appellant if he should arrest Semenza, and "Pompa said no." There is no other evidence of any direction on the part of appellant which in any way contributed to the acts complained of. Therefore, whether the shooting occurred while Cesena was engaged in the performance of his duties as a special police officer under public authority or while he was engaged with Semenza in a private quarrel, there is no evidence tending to show either that the appellant directed the acts to be done or that he personally co-operated therein within the principle of Michel v. Smith, supra.

For these reasons, the judgment is reversed.

Rollin L. McNitt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of the defendants after sustaining a demurrer interposed to plaintiff's second amended complaint. The second amended complaint, omitting matters not necessary to mention, alleged that in the month of July, 1922, plaintiff, in an interview with officers of the company, offered to purchase from one Clary all of the business, patronage, and good will of Clary in certain territory wherein said Clary had been delivering water bottled by the defendant; that the defendant, through its officers and agents, advised the plaintiff of a better proposition, to wit, that one C. Floyd Kinne, who was operating in the Hollywood territory of Los Angeles, desired to cease operating, and would sell the good will and business and delivery truck for the sum of $2,500; that on or about the 18th day of August, 1922, the plaintiff agreed with Kinne to purchase from Kinne the customers' good will and patronage of said route and truck of said Kinne for the sum of $2,500; plaintiff thereupon communicated to defendant the information that he and Kinne had reached an agreement, and on August 19, 1922, at the special instance and request of the defendant's officers, the plaintiff repaired to the business establishment of defendant and entered into a contract, a copy of which was annexed to the complaint, marked "Exhibit A," and that at said time the plaintiff paid to Kinne the sum of $2,500; that at said time Kinne was serving approximately 250 customers on the Hollywood route and 165 customers outside, referred to as the "West Adams District." The complaint further sets forth that the plaintiff continued to conduct the business of said route and operate the same and continued to deliver water bottled by the defendant up to and until the 7th day of October, 1925, when the defendant refused to further continue the supplying of the plaintiff with water and further refused to recognize the right of the plaintiff to deliver water over said route. The complaint further alleges that the contract between the defendant and Kinne, entered into on the 27th day of March, 1922, provided that, if at any time within four months thereafter said Kinne desired to withdraw therefrom, the defendant would pay to the plaintiff the sum of $2,500, and that the sum of $2,500

May 1, 1930.

1. Principal and agent ⇨28.

Agreement by agent to distribute bottled water for principal held not to constitute employment from year to year (Civ. Code, § 2012).

The agreement provided that the agent was to have exclusive right to distribute bottled water to customers of principal over certain route in certain territory for period of one year or for such time as the agent should faithfully comply with requirements of agreement. The agent's compensation depended on his skill and ability to build up route.

2. Principal and agent ⇨34.

Where agent purchased route to distribute bottled water for principal, agency held not coupled with interest which principal could not terminate (Civ. Code, § 2356).

3. Principal and agent ⇨33.

Where agent purchased route to distribute principal's bottled water for year, such time would be considered reasonable time for agent to recoup expenditures, as regards principal's right to revoke agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

paid by the plaintiff to Kinne for the route over which said Kinne had theretofore delivered water, and for the truck and equipment, was really paid for the uses and purposes of the defendant. The complaint further alleges that the plaintiff had succeeded in building up the route from 250 customers to 600, so that the gross receipts from the route had been increased from $250 per month to approximately $900 per month, and the net receipts from $125 per month to approximately $300 per month. The complaint further alleges that, by reason of the cancellation of the contract on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $10,500.

The agreement attached to the second amended complaint as Exhibit A, entered into between the plaintiff's assignor and the defendant, contained the following stipulations material to be considered (we quote the language of the agreement): "This agreement made on the 27th day of March, 1922, between the Elysian Springs Water and Bottling Company, hereinafter known as the 'Company,' and Floyd C. Kinne, hereinafter known as the 'distributor.' The Company desires to have their Spring water and carbonated beverages sold and distributed in certain territory hereinafter described. The distributor desires to have the exclusive right to that privilege. In consideration of $1.00, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and other valuable considerations, the Company agrees to give the distributor the exclusive right to sell and distribute Elysian Springs water and carbonated beverages in that certain territory in the City of Los Angeles hereinafter described. The agreement to continue for one year from date, subject to requirements hereinafter enumerated, and to continue in force thereafter so long as the distributor shall faithfully perform the terms of this agreement." The agreement further provided that the distributor should furnish motortrucks of sufficient capacity to promptly deliver and distribute water to the different customers. Provision is then made in the contract as to the prices at which the water shall be delivered to the distributor and the prices to be charged the customers. Statements of account to customers were to be made in the name of the company, and remittances for the same, direct to the company, the company agreeing to keep accurate records of all receipts from distributor's customers, crediting the same to the distributor. The distributor agreed to devote his entire time exclusively to the business of distributing the products of the company. The agreement contained the following paragraph: "The Company agrees, if four months from date the distributor wishes on that date to give up this contract, the Company will, within reasonable time, dispose of the route and return to the distributor the amount he has paid for route and traffic truck, the truck to be turned over in good condition, allowing for reasonable wear." The agreement further provided that the ownership of the route was to remain with the company, as well as all records, lists, etc., pertaining thereto, which were to be made and kept by the distributor.

Whatever rights Kinne had under this contract and the truck or trucks and equipment owned by Kinne, and used by him in the distribution of water, were sold and delivered to the plaintiff in this action. While the second amended complaint does not set out the agreement dated August 19, 1922, entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant relative to the distribution of water, the transcript does contain the same, and it is identical in language in all material particulars with the agreement from which we have been quoting.

It thus appears from the pleadings that the plaintiff had been acting as a distributor for the defendant's products from some time during the month of August, 1922, until about the 7th of October, 1925, a period of about 3 years and 2½ months.

[1, 2] The complaint further alleges that the plaintiff misunderstood to some extent the property he was buying, in that it was the understanding of the plaintiff that he was to become the owner of the route, the customers, etc. There is nothing in the complaint, however, showing that the plaintiff was misled by any statements of the defendant, or that anything was said or done preventing a full or complete understanding, on the part of the plaintiff, of the agreement which was signed, or of the terms and conditions of the agreement between the plaintiff's assignor and the defendant.

The argument of the plaintiff on this appeal appears to be all made upon the theory that the agreement entered into between the parties constituted an employment from year to year, and that the defendant had no right to cancel the agreement or terminate the relationship existing between the plaintiff and defendant during the course of the year, but only at the end thereof. This argument is based upon the provisions of section 2012 of the Civil Code, which reads: "Where, after the expiration of an agreement respecting the wages and the term of service, the parties continue the relation of master and servant, they are presumed to have renewed the agreement for the same wages and term of service." A sufficient answer to this contention is the fact that the contract referred to, or contracts involved herein, do not create the relationship of master and servant, but the relationship of principal and agent. While the plaintiff in this case was to perform certain services, he was in no sense the servant of the defendant; he was the agent of the company for the purpose of distributing its products. The plaintiff was not paid wages in the usual understanding of that term. His compensation depended upon his skill and ability to build up the route, where he had the privilege of distributing the products furnished by the defendant. Arguing also that the plaintiff was an agent of the defendant, it is insisted that it was an agency coupled with an interest, and that as the plaintiff had paid a valuable consideration, the defendant had no right to terminate the relationship. Section 2356 of the Civil Code reads: "Unless the power of an agent is coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency, it is terminated, as to every person having notice thereof, by: 1. Its revocation by the principal; 2. His death; or, 3. His incapacity to contract." While many authorities might be cited, it is only necessary to refer to 2 C. J. 532, § 155, second paragraph, showing that the relationship of principal and agent between the defendant and the plaintiff did not constitute an agency wherein the plaintiff had such an interest in the property or subject of the agency as to bring it within the exception specified in the section of the Code above quoted. The language of the text in 2 Corpus Juris is as follows: "To bring a case within this exception it is necessary: (1) That the power and the interest should be coupled or united in point of time; that they should coexist. Hence the interest must exist in the subject matter of the power, and not merely in that which is produced by an exercise of the power, for if the agent's interest exists only in the proceeds arising from an execution of the power, the power and the interest are not coupled in point of time, since the power, in order to produce the interest, must be exercised, and by its exercise it is extinguished; the interest does not come into being until the power is gone. (2) That the power and the interest should be coupled with reference to their subject matter. They must exist with reference to the same thing. For this reason also it is necessary that the agent's interest should exist in the subject matter of the power, and not merely in that which is produced by an exercise of the power. (3) That the power and the interest should be coupled with reference to the persons in whom they are vested. They must be united in the same person. (4) That the power and the interest should be coupled with reference to their source. They must be derived by the agent from the same person, although it is not necessary that they should be conferred by the same writing if they are conferred contemporaneously as one entire transaction."

A reference to the terms of the contract constituting the agency which we have set forth herein shows that the interest of the agent was in the proceeds arising from the exercise of the power for the privilege conferred. The power or privilege conferred being to act as distributor, and the remuneration or interest which the agent owned or was to receive came from and was a part of the proceeds derived from the distribution of the water products furnished by the company, and constituted, in the language of the section, "the proceeds arising from the exercise of the power." A further reference to the contract shows that the time of continuance specified therein was one year, after which it would be a relationship existing at the will of the parties. The transcript shows that by stipulation, the agreement entered into between the defendant and the plaintiff was to be considered as a part of the plaintiff's second amended complaint; the time of the contract to continue, or the time during which the relationship of principal and agent should continue reads as follows: "The exclusive right to sell and distribute Elysian Springs Water and carbonated beverages in that certain territory hereinafter described, for the period of one year, or such time as the distributor shall faithfully comply with the requirements herein enumerated." This provision can only be read as particularly providing that the relationship shall exist for the period of one year, and thereafter, during the will of the parties. Unless so read, it would be a contract providing for a relationship to exist in perpetuity, something which the law abhors. Echols v. New Orleans, etc., R. R. Co., 52 Miss. 610.

The contract entered into between the parties contains no provision limiting revocation and dissolution of the relationship, save and except the one-year period. Thus the rule set forth in 1 California Jurisprudence, p. 702, § 11, applies. We quote from the text: "It is the general rule that any agency, unless coupled with an interest, is revocable at any time as between the principal and the agent, at the mere pleasure of the principal, in so far as it relates to things concerning which the agency has not been executed. This principle is recognized in section 2356 of the Civil Code." We do not need to quote the whole of the section, but the rule therein stated and the authorities cited show clearly the right of the principal to revoke an agency, unless limited by the terms of the contract creating the agency, which does not exist in this case, as more than the time limit had expired; in fact, three times the period limited had expired before the agency was revoked.

[3] The facts set forth in the plaintiff's complaint show that, if the authorities relative to the revocation of an agency such as existed in this case, which hold that the agent must be given a reasonable time within which to recoup his expenditures, etc., apply, yet a cause of action has not been stated based upon the holding in such cases, because by the terms of the pleading, plaintiff has had such time, and has pleaded facts showing that he has more than recouped his expenses and made a substantial profit. This rule, however, was expressly denied application in the case of Boehm v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 239, 191 P. 5. Having fixed one year for the duration of the contract, it must be held that the contracting parties considered the same a reasonable time, and, in view of the facts which we have just stated relative to the time when the relationship did exist, and the fact that the plaintiff had more than recouped his expenses and realized a profit, the fact that the agency yielded a greater return at the expiration of its existence than at its inception is not a material matter for our consideration.

While other cases might be cited, two cases decided by the Supreme Court are determinative of the questions involved in this action. In the case of Boehm v. Spreckels, supra, and Otten v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 252, 191 P. 11, contracts relative to the distribution of paper and the control and ownership of paper routes, almost identical with the contracts in this case, were involved. In the Spreckels Cases, consideration had been paid for the privilege of distributing papers over the routes involved. The papers were delivered to the distributors at so much per paper, to be sold by the distributor to patrons at the price fixed by Spreckels, or rather, by the Call Publishing Company. The distributors received their compensation out of the proceeds of the distribution and sale of the papers to the customers. The routes belonged to the Call Publishing Company, called "Spreckels" in the opinions in the two cases referred to. Here the circumstances are exactly the same. The bottled products were delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff at a certain price; the plaintiff was to distribute the bottled products over a route belonging to the defendant and to the defendant's customers, delivering the same to them at a certain fixed price named by the company, and out of the proceeds received his compensation. It was held in both of the Spreckels Cases that the contract or relationship of principal and agent was terminable at will, and that no cause of action existed on the part of either plaintiff in the way of damages. We do not need to quote from the language of the cases, a reference to them being all that is necessary.

Appellant seeks to distinguish the Spreckels Cases from the case at bar by making the contention that the agency here was coupled with an interest. We think this attempted distinction is not tenable, and that the case at bar does not present any circumstances preventing the holding of those cases being determinative of the issues here involved. The giving of a consideration for the assignment of the agent's contract, or the assignment of Kinne's contract to the plaintiff, is not such a consideration as would make the agency irrevocable. 2 Cor. Jur. 536. At least, the irrevocability of the agency would exist only for the period of its specified duration, to wit, one year. We think that during that period the agency would not be irrevocable, but, if revoked without cause, liability for damages arising therefrom would only be incurred. Meyer v. Pulitzer Publishing Co., 156 Mo. App. 170, 136 S. W. 5; Staroske v. Pulitzer Publishing Co., 235 Mo. 67, 138 S. W. 36.

Other cases might be cited, but we think the two Spreckels Cases heretofore referred to are decisive.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 4062, 4063.

California.

May 3, 1930.

Rehearing Denied June 2, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 30, 1930.

1. Principal and agent ⇨177(3).

Purchaser of realty is chargeable with knowledge of agent relative to transaction, whereby third person was paying part of purchase price (Civ. Code, §§ 2332, 3519).

2. Specific performance ⇨64.

Specific performance of verbal agreement to execute lease may be had, where landlord is estopped to invoke statute of frauds.

3. Tenancy in common ⇨12.

Third person paying part of purchase price of realty without agreement as to interest would be entitled to undivided interest proportionate to purchase price paid (Civ. Code, § 853).

4. Trusts ⇨74.

Under agreement between purchaser of realty and third person, purchaser held to hold title to leasehold interest in lands purchased in trust for third person.

At time of purchase of land subject to leasehold interest covering oil developments, purchaser of land in effect expressly agreed through his agent that third party would pay stipulated amount for leasehold interest and purchaser balance for land subject to lease, title to be taken in purchaser's name.

5. Trusts ⇨63½.

Fact that oral agreement was made does not preclude reliance on trust arising by implication of law from acts done pursuant to such agreement.

6. Trusts ⇨63½.

Plea of statute of frauds cannot be set up as bar to relief in cases of resulting trusts.

FINCH, P. J.

The complaint alleges that at all times between July, 1925, and November, 1926, the Crown Oil Company was the owner, subject to a deed of trust, of all the land described in the complaint; that, subject to the same deed of trust, the plaintiff was the owner of an "oil lease upon 40 acres of said property" and an option "for an oil lease upon all of said real property" other than said 40 acres; that prior to any negotiations with the defendant the plaintiff was given judgment against the Crown Oil Company requiring it to execute a lease in accordance with the terms of said option, the judgment setting forth a copy of the lease to be executed; that the judgment had become final and the plaintiff had been put in possession of the property; that steps were being taken to sell the land under the terms of the deed of trust to satisfy the indebtedness secured thereby and the "plaintiff realized that his leasehold interest in all of said property was jeopardized"; that "in order to protect his leasehold rights, said plaintiff began negotiations with the holders of said obligation secured by said trust deed, and endeavored to interest someone to assist him in the purchase of said trust deed or of the said property, and on or about the first day of July, 1926, began negotiations with defendant toward that end; * * * that said defendant by reason of said negotiations became interested in said real property and desired to secure an interest in the same, and so advised plaintiff; that plaintiff thereupon continued negotiations with the holders of the obligation secured by said trust deed, and expended his time and effort and considerable amount of his personal funds in pursuing said negotiations and finally secured the consent of said owners of said obligation to sell all of said property and all of their rights thereunder, for the sum of $100,000."

The foregoing allegations were proved by uncontradicted evidence and the court found them to be true. The allegations of the complaint continue as follows: "That it was thereupon expressly agreed and understood by and between said plaintiff and said defendant that said property should be acquired by the parties hereto and that said defendant would pay on account of said purchase, the sum of $75,000 in cash, and that said plaintiff should provide the remaining sum of $25,000 of the purchase price thereof; that it was then and there expressly understood and agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendant that the interests of the parties in said real property should be held in the following proportions: That defendant should take and have in his name the title to the fee in said real property, and that plaintiff should take and have in his name of and from defendant, a lease of the oil and mineral rights on all of said property for the term, and under the provisions of said leases, which he held upon said property as aforesaid;" that "pursuant to said understanding and agreement" the defendant took an assignment of the trust deed and the moneys secured thereby and paid in cash the sum of $75,000 of the purchase price thereof and the plaintiff gave the assignors his promissory note in the sum of $25,000 in payment of the remainder of the purchase price; that thereafter, "on November 13, 1926, and pursuant to said understanding and agreement, * * * a sale of said real property under said trust deed was had, at which sale, pursuant to said agreement and understanding, said defendant bid in said property, in his own name, and the legal title to said property passed to and became vested in said defendant." The prayer is for a decree adjudging that the plaintiff "is the owner of a leasehold interest in said real property for the time and upon the terms and subject to the provisions as in this complaint set forth, * * * that the defendant convey said leasehold interest to the plaintiff, * * * and for * * * such other relief as shall be proper."

The answer denies the material allegations of the complaint, "but alleges that plaintiff, knowing that defendant had some knowledge of the property in question, importuned him to purchase said property, inasmuch as plaintiff represented that he, plaintiff, was about to lose all interest or estate in the same."

The court found "that defendant did agree to and with plaintiff that he, said defendant, would give and grant to said plaintiff a lease of the oil and mineral rights on all of said property for the term on the terms, and with the provisions as alleged in said complaint; that on the trial of said cause said defendant interposed the defense of the statute of frauds of the state of California to and against said agreement; and the court finds that no note or memorandum of said agreement on the part of defendant was or is in writing subscribed by defendant or by his agent, and that said agreement is for that reason void and unenforceable as against defendant; and that it is not true that defendant holds said or any leasehold interest for plaintiff; but that it is true that plaintiff did contribute and pay of the purchase price of all of said property one-fourth thereof and that defendant now holds an undivided one-fourth interest in and to all of said property in trust for plaintiff."

Judgment was entered in accordance with the findings. The defendant has appealed from the whole of the judgment, and the plaintiff has appealed from the part thereof which adjudges that "plaintiff is not entitled to and is not awarded a lease of the oil and the plaintiff has kept a man employed during the time mentioned "to pump the wells to keep the lease and ship the oil." It appears from the evidence that it has a damaging effect upon a producing oil well to shut it down.

[1, 2] To permit the defendant, under the circumstances stated, to invoke the statute of frauds as a defense would be to make the statute an instrument of fraud. On July 19, 1926, and at all times thereafter, Wellborn knew that the plaintiff was paying one-fourth of the purchase price of the property in reliance upon the defendant's oral agreement to execute the alleged lease. The defendant was chargeable with the knowledge of his agent in relation to the transaction. "As against a principal, both principal and agent are deemed to have notice of whatever either has notice of, and ought, in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, to communicate to the other." Civ. Code, § 2332. "He who can and does not forbid that which is done on his behalf, is deemed to have bidden it." Civ. Code, § 3519. Specific performance of a verbal agreement to execute a lease has been decreed in this state in a case where the landlord was estopped to invoke the statute of frauds. Clark v. Clark, 49 Cal. 586. It is unnecessary, however, to decide whether the facts proved in this case constitute an estoppel.

[3-6] Had the plaintiff paid one-fourth of the purchase price without any agreement or understanding as to the interest, he would thereby acquire in the property, he would have been entitled, under the provisions of section 853 of the Civil Code, to the judgment which was entered herein, but the agreement between the parties was to the effect that the plaintiff was to acquire only a leasehold interest in the property. It may be inferred from the vigor with which this case is prosecuted and defended that such leasehold interest is of considerable value. The effect of the lease, therefore, is to make the land less valuable than it would be if freed from the lease. This probably accounts for the fact that the defendant, after having agreed to continue the lease in force, was unwilling to pay in excess of $75,000 for the property and also for the plaintiff's willingness to pay $25,000 to consummate the transaction. If the parties had expressly agreed that the plaintiff would pay $25,000 for the leasehold interest and the defendant $75,000 for the land subject to the lease, the title to be taken in the defendant's name, then, upon the consummation of the transfer, the defendant would undoubtedly hold title to the leasehold interest in trust for the plaintiff. This is in effect what the parties actually did, and the conclusion follows that the defendant holds title to the leasehold interest in trust for the plaintiff. "It is now a generally accepted rule that a resulting trust may arise in favor of one who furnishes a part of the purchase money for land where the title is taken in another, though there is a diversity of opinion as to whether there must be a distinct understanding that the payment is for a definite interest in the land, or whether the fact of furnishing the money without more will raise a resulting trust. Many courts take the view that the money must have been paid for a specific undivided share, as a half, quarter, etc., or for a particular interest, as a life estate, remainder, etc." 26 R. C. L. 1224; Breitenbucher v. Oppenheim, 160 Cal. 98, 116 P. 55. In this case the payment made by the plaintiff was for a "particular interest," the leasehold interest in the land. "The fact that an oral agreement was made does not preclude the plaintiff from relying on the trust which arises by implication of law from the acts done pursuant to such agreement." 25 Cal. Jur. 179; Breitenbucher v. Oppenheim, supra; Pavlovich v. Pavlovich, 22 Cal. App. 500, 135 P. 303. The plea of the statute of frauds cannot be set up as a bar to relief in cases of resulting trusts. Pavlovich v. Pavlovich, supra.

From what has been said it appears that there is merit in both appeals, and that the entire judgment must be reversed. While there is ample evidence to support a judgment for the plaintiff, the findings are not sufficient to warrant this court in directing the entry of such a judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing

PER CURIAM.

The defendant has filed a petition for a rehearing.

In the opinion heretofore filed it is said: "The payment made by the plaintiff was for a particular interest, the leasehold interest in the land." By the term "leasehold interest" it was not intended to refer to the leasehold interest held by the plaintiff prior to the sale of the land under the trust deed, but to a like interest acquired by the purchase of the land at such sale.

In his petition the defendant quotes from the opinion that "the plaintiff further testified that * * * the defendant agreed to give him a lease in accordance with the terms of the decree in his aforesaid action against the Crown Oil Company," and then says: "We have again read very carefully the entire transcript of the evidence in this case * * * and we have been unable to find any such testimony by the plaintiff." It is not deemed necessary to lengthen this opinion by quoting from the testimony of the plaintiff, but, for the convenience of counsel for the defendant, it may be said that folios 193, 198, 390, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 398, 399, and 416 of the supplement to his opening brief amply support the statement quoted from the opinion.

The case has been discussed on the theory of the enforcement of a resulting trust rather than the specific performance of an oral agreement.

The petition is denied.

Frank Fimbres was convicted under a complaint charging that he was operating an automobile on a public highway, and did then and there run into and damage certain personal property, and failed and refused and neglected to stop to render aid, and he appeals.

Defendant was prosecuted in the recorder's court of Lynwood on a complaint charging that he was operating an automobile on a public highway, and "did then and there run into and damage on the public highway certain personal property, towit, a dog, and did fail and refuse and neglect to stop said motor vehicle to render aid, contrary to section 141-B of the California Vehicle Act." The evidence showed that defendant ran over two dogs, which died of their injuries, that he did not stop, but drove on a distance of seven blocks, and was then stopped by the owner of one of the dogs, to whom he gave his name and address. At the close of the case for the prosecution defendant moved to dismiss upon the ground that the complaint did not state, nor the evidence show, facts constituting any public offense. This motion was denied, and on appeal he assigns the ruling as error.

There is no section 141-B of the California Vehicle Act, but section 141 thereof contains a subdivision (b) which is doubtless intended by the reference in the complaint. It provides that "the driver of any vehicle involved in an accident resulting in damage to property, shall immediately stop such vehicle at the scene of such accident, and shall fulfill the requirements of subdivision (c) and any person failing to stop or to comply with said requirements under such circumstances shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." Subdivision (c) here mentioned reads as follows:

"The driver of any vehicle involved in any accident resulting in injury or death to any person or damage to property shall also give his name, address and the registration number of his vehicle and exhibit his operator's or chauffeur's license to the person struck or the driver or occupants of any vehicle collided with and shall render to any person injured in such accident reasonable assistance, including the carrying of such person to a physician, surgeon or hospital for medical or surgical treatment if it is apparent that such treatment is necessary or such carrying is requested by the injured person."

PEOPLE v. FIMBRES.
Cr. 226.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.
Jan. 16, 1930.

1. Animals ☞1.

Dog is regarded as property.

2. Automobiles ☞336.

Automobile accident in which dog is injured comes within provisions of law requiring driver to stop at scene of accident (California Vehicle Act, § 141, as amended by St. 1929, p. 544).

3. Automobiles ☞351.

Complaint charging defendant with failing to stop after running over dog charged public offense (California Vehicle Act, § 141, as amended by St. 1929, p. 544).

Although the complaint charged defendant with operating an automobile and failing and refusing and neglecting to stop motor vehicle to render aid after running into and damaging a dog, the words "to render aid" should be disregarded as surplusage, and complaint then sufficiently charged failure to stop after accident.

Appeal from Recorder's Court of Lynwood;
Arch G. McLay, City Recorder.

[1, 2] A dog is regarded in this state as property (Roos v. Loeser, 41 Cal. App. 782, 183 P. 204), and hence an accident in which a dog is injured comes within the words of subdivision (b). The same is true of any other domestic animal. In construing subdivisions (b) and (c), it should be noted that by subdivision (a) of the same section the driver of a vehicle involved in an accident resulting in injury to or death of a person is also required to stop and to comply with subdivision (c). This indicates, as does the language of subdivision (c), that the latter is to have a distributive construction by which the requirement of the last clause thereof, relating to rendering aid, is limited to those cases mentioned in subdivision (a) where a person is injured. Manifestly a dog, or other animal, is not a person; consequently the provision of subdivision (c) as to rendering aid cannot be applied to cases where a dog or other animal is injured.

The first clause of subdivision (c) begins by referring to accidents resulting in damage to "property," and this word, if it stood alone, would include dogs, and other animals here also; but this clause must be construed as a whole, and, when we inquire what is to be done by the person involved in such an accident, we find that he is to give his name and address and the registration number of his vehicle and exhibit his operator's license "to the person struck or the driver or occupants of any vehicle collided with." A dog or any other animal, not being a person, cannot qualify as "the person struck." Dogs and other animals are not found driving vehicles on the highways, so we hardly think the Legislature meant to include them in the term "driver of any vehicle"; and, in view of the utter futility of submitting a written document to the inspection of a dog or other animal, the term "occupant" must also be limited to persons. It may be that "every dog has his day"; but, if so, it is only a "dog-day" and does not entitle him to claim the rights of persons. Hence there was no duty resting on defendant under subdivision (c) of section 141.

[3] The question still remains whether subdivision (b) required defendant to stop on striking and injuring the dogs. As already stated, they were property, and the case was thus within the terms of the subdivision. The provision is that in such cases the driver "shall immediately stop * * * and shall fulfill the requirements of subdivision (c)." Here are two separate commands, neither of which is expressly conditioned upon the other; and they are shown not to be so conditioned by the subsequent provision that "any person failing to stop or to comply with said requirements" shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The stopping must, of course, precede the compliance with subdivision (c), and one reason for it, no doubt, is to facilitate such compliance; but we are unable to say that this is the only reason which the Legislature had in mind in requiring a stop. In cases where nothing is to be done under subdivision (c), e. g., those where, as in the case at bar, an animal is struck, or where inanimate property is damaged without a collision of vehicles, a stop by the driver of the car doing the damage may serve a useful purpose. It may perhaps minimize the damage, or enable the owner of the property or other persons who may act in his interest, to learn the identity of the person driving the car, even though the driver is not required to do any affirmative act by way of disclosing his identity. We think, therefore, that the driver of any vehicle involved in an accident resulting in damage to property is required to stop immediately, even though, under the circumstances, he may not be required to do anything further after he has stopped. The complaint here sufficiently charges that defendant failed to stop, and the following words, "to render aid," should be disregarded as surplusage. They do not detract from the force of the statement that defendant failed to stop. But, if there were any uncertainty in the complaint in this respect, it would not be ground for a reversal, in view of the complete proof that defendant made no stop at the time of the accident, and the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

The judgment is affirmed.

BISHOP, J.

The defendant, charged with receiving money under false pretenses, was found guilty and judgment entered imposing a fine of $100, or, in default of its payment, ninety days in jail. Defendant promptly paid the fine, then perfected his appeal. Contending that by this satisfaction of the judgment the questions presented by the appeal became moot, the people move its dismissal.

[1] So far as we are aware, the precise question thus submitted to us has not been considered by any of the appellate courts of this state. The rule is well established in civil actions, however, that the satisfaction of a judgment, unless by way of compromise or with an agreement not to take or pursue an appeal, does not operate to terminate the right to an appeal. Warner Brothers Co. v. Freud (1901) 131 Cal. 639, 63 P. 1017, 82 Am. St. Rep. 400; Levin v. Saroff (1921) 54 Cal. App. 285, 201 P. 961. See note, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 22. Also in the recent case of In Matter of Lincoln (1929 Cal. App.) 283 P. 965, it was held that the questions arising on an appeal from a judgment suspending an attorney from practice for the period of a year did not become so moot with the expiration of the year and the consequent termination of the suspension that the appeal should be dismissed. The Lincoln Case is persuasive beyond its force as a decision in a case bearing close analogy, to ours, for the cases upon which the court relied were all criminal cases.

As they are reviewed and quoted from somewhat at length in the opinion filed in that case, it is unnecessary for us to list them or produce excerpts from them here. They may also be found in a note in 18 A. L. R. 867, from which it appears that they represent the minority view. It appears that in a majority of the cases on the question it is held that the voluntary satisfying of a judgment by the payment of a fine destroys the right to appeal because it leaves the defendant with no legal wrong to be corrected nor legal right to be protected. The same conclusion is reached where the payment is voluntary only in the sense it is in our case; that is, chosen in preference to going to jail. In the minority view, on the other hand, the fact is recognized that a judgment in a criminal case is effective far beyond the dollars or days it may exact in its technical satisfaction. It was this view which the court preferred to take in the Lincoln Case.

[2] We are satisfied that a defendant convicted of a criminal offense and faced with a term in jail, unless he pays a fine, does not by paying the fine waive his rights to appeal. There is no basis in fact for the contention that he waives his appeal, for the thing done bears no inconsistent relation to the thing to be done, so there is not factually an election. Nor is the one step a relinquishment of the right to pursue the other by virtue of any statute or written rule of court. Rather it is a practice adopted by the courts out of necessity, because: "The demands of actual, practical litigation are too pressing to permit the examination or discussion of academic questions," as was quoted in Foster v. Smith (1897) 115 Cal. 611, 47 P. 591, 592. It is a practice which may be departed from, if public interest requires. Piper v. Hawley (1918) 179 Cal. 10, 175 P. 417. If the defendant has a real, though perhaps not a legal, interest in the determination of the questions involved, even though the judgment itself has been satisfied, it seems to us that the press of other business is no justification for dismissing the appeal on hand. It is to substitute fantasy for fact to say the defendant's real interest in the case ceases with the payment of the fine. Is a good name no longer to be chosen rather than riches? Is a question alive so long as the payment of $100 is involved, but moot when only the matter of a besmirched name remains? We prefer to follow those courts, in the minority though they are, where an appeal is considered useful, though it may serve no purpose but to give a man a chance to clear his name. The motion to dismiss is denied.

[3-5] Turning to the merits of the appeal, and selecting, as we must, the evidence most strongly supporting the judgment, we find that the defendant and Earls, the complaining witness, had entered into a contract whereby the defendant was to furnish labor and material to accomplish certain building repairs. While these repairs were going on, the defendant arrived at work late one morning. An explanation was asked by Earls, and in reply the defendant stated he had gone around to the lumber company to obtain a discount by a prompt payment of a lumber bill. The lumber bill which defendant stated he paid, according to the complaining witness, was one on the Earls job. The fact was, and the defendant claims he made no statement to the contrary, the bill paid was on another job entirely, and the lumber on Earls' building had not been paid for when, some ten days later, Earls paid the defendant $100 on account. Were we permitted to weigh the evidence, we would have no hesitation in saying that at best the complaining witness was mistaken in what he understood the defendant to have said. Of course, we cannot weigh the evidence, and we speak of its impression upon us solely because the situation illustrates the wisdom of the requirement of section 1110 of the Penal Code that, on a trial for obtaining money by a pretense consisting of an oral statement, "the defendant cannot be convicted * * * unless the pretense is proven by the testimony of two witnesses, or that of one witness and corroborating circumstances." Earls was the only witness who testified that the defendant made the statement that the material bill he had paid was on the Earls job. It was not enough to produce a second witness who testified that there was a conversation respecting the payment of a bill, but who heard nothing about the Earls bill. See People v. Neetens (1919) 42 Cal. App. 596, 600, 184 P. 27. Now are the circumstances of the case, which we do not here detail, corroborative of the testimony that the defendant made the pretense claimed. Rather they negative the conclusion that he made the statement charged to him.

The judgment is reversed, with directions that a new trial be had in the Superior Court of Los Angeles county.

SHAW, J.

[1, 2] Defendant is charged with a violation of section 6 of the act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 294) regarding payment of wages, which makes it a misdemeanor for an employer, under the conditions and with the intent therein mentioned, to refuse to pay the wages of an employee when due and demanded. The complaining witness, Mrs. Gerrity, was hired by defendant as manager of an apartment house under an agreement by which she was to receive $25 per month and the use of an apartment, and was to pay the bills for her laundry, ice, and milk, and, according to defendant, some other matters, all of which he testified were to be deducted from her wages. When she quit, defendant had a settlement with her, as a result of which he gave her a check for $15.57, on which he later stopped payment. At a hearing before the labor commissioner, some further deductions were made, and the commissioner found that the amount due was $12.57, nonpayment of which is the basis of this prosecution. At the trial, defendant sought to show that this settlement was made under mistake and in ignorance of certain amounts owed him by Mrs. Gerrity on account of rents which she negligently failed to collect and for bills incurred and payable by her, all of which amounted to more than the wages which were alleged to be due her. He made an extensive offer of proof in this respect, which the trial court rejected on the theory that no offset against wages due can be shown under this act and in especial reliance on section 5, which provides a penalty collectible by the employee for failure to pay wages "without abatement or reduction."

In this ruling we think the court erred. The case was not prosecuted under section 5, but under section 6, which does not contain the words "without abatement or reduction." But, even if we assume that section 5 throws some light on the purpose and meaning of section 6, it has been held that the words "without abatement or deduction," in a statute similar to section 5, mean merely "without discount on account of the payment thereof before the time they were payable according to the terms of the contract of employment," that they do not prevent the deduction of damages caused by the employee's breach of contract where he quits prematurely, or of credits to the employer on account of money or property given to the employee in part payment of his wages, and that, if the statute were construed to forbid such deductions, it would be unconstitutional. Leep v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 58 Ark. 407, 25 S. W. 75, 23 L. R. A. 264, 41 Am. St. Rep. 109, 131. There is no material difference between the word "deduction" here considered and the word "reduction" used in our statute.

In Idaho it is held that a statute similar to section 5, but not including the phrase "without abatement or reduction" or equivalent words, does not preclude the right of the employer to interpose any valid counterclaim or defense to the claim of the employee. Olson v. Idora, etc., Co., 28 Idaho, 504, 155 P. 291; Goodell v. Pope-Shenon M. Co., 36 Idaho, 427, 212 P. 342. In Manford v. Menil Singh, 40 Cal. App. 700, 181 P. 844, a former statute similar to section 5 of the act of 1919, but using the word "deduction" instead of "reduction," was under consideration, and the court held that it was to have a reasonable construction, and did not deny the employer any legal defense to the legality of the claim. We think a like rule must be applied to cases arising under section 6, whereby the employer may show in his defense that he has valid offsets or counterclaims to the wages the nonpayment of which is the basis of the charge against him.

Since the ruling of the court below denied the defendant that right, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the municipal court for a new trial, and it is so ordered.

CONNOR v. MINIER et al.

GASTE v. WILLIAMS PLAN CO.

Civ. 105.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

May 2, 1930.

1. Usury ☞16.

Courts, where claim of usury is made, will look through form in which transaction is cast to discover its real substance.

2. Usury ☞53.

Services or expenses in connection with loan for which lender may reimburse himself must be confined to specific service or expense incidental to loan.

3. Usury ☞45.

As respects usury, principal sum loaned will be held to be face amount of loan less interest or commission deducted in advance.

4. Usury ☞117.

Evidence held to establish that loan usurious.

The facts established that borrower, although signing two notes for $300 each, actually received only $270, in addition to which lender paid $1.50 for financial report and issued in borrower's name a certificate of investment which was to be paid for by one note and held as security for payment of other, while, according to terms of note, $300 would be repaid in equal weekly installments extending over a period of 40 weeks, so that, even though the total amount of loan remained unpaid for 40 weeks, interest for such period at 12 per cent. maximum rate was less than $28.50 deducted.

5. Usury ☞111(2).

Allegation that lender was doing business as Industrial Loan Company and not subject to usury law, was affirmative allegation, requiring proof (Industrial Loan Company Act 1917, as amended by St. 1921, p. 729).

6. Usury ☞137.

Recovery of penalty by reason of usury cannot be had unless usurious interest is actually paid (Usury Act, § 3).

7. Usury ⇐137.

Merely signing and delivery of usurious instruments does not constitute "payment of interest" as respects recovery of penalty (Usury Act, § 3).

8. Usury ⇐100(1).

As respects usury, payments on interest-bearing note, in absence of express application by parties, will be applied to principal until repayment of amount actually loaned.

9. Usury ⇐137.

Recovery of penalty by reason of usury can be had only by person actually paying interest (Usury Act, § 3).

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Charles E. Haas, Judge.

Action by C. C. Connor, doing business under the fictitious firm name of the Surety Finance & Adjustment Company, against H. W. SHAW, J.

This is an action on a promissory note for $300, in which the Williams Plan Company, hereinafter called simply the company, is named as payee. The plaintiff is the assignee of the payee for collection merely, and hence stands in its shoes as to all defenses. The defendant Gaste filed an answer alleging as a defense that the loan was usurious, and appeals from a judgment against him for the full amount of the note with interest.

From the record, the following facts appear without dispute: The defendant H. W. Minier, desiring to borrow $300, went to the office of the company a few days before May 15, 1928, and applied for a loan. He was told that he must procure accommodation co-makers as sureties on a note, and was given an application form and a blank note, on which the note in suit was executed. He brought this note back about May 15, 1928, bearing the signatures of himself and wife, of appellant, and of another person, as co-makers. The loan was then made. In connection with the transaction, Minier signed several papers. One of them was an application for the loan, in which he stated that he desired a loan of $300, and agreed if it was made to purchase from the company an investment certificate for that amount, and to hypothecate it as additional security for the loan, and instructed the company to apply the proceeds of the certificate to liquidate the note covering the loan when due. On the same paper with this application were statements of their financial condition signed by appellant and another maker. The note in suit was dated May 4, 1928, and by it the makers above mentioned agreed to pay to the company $300, in forty equal installments, on Tuesday of each week after date, with interest from maturity at 8 per cent. per annum. This note recited that it was given "for the purchase by the maker of an investment certificate of the said company." On May 15, 1928, the company made and signed a paper labeled "investment certificate," which showed that its amount was $300, recited that H. W. Minier was the purchaser thereof and had given a note for the purchase price, describing a note which corresponds to that sued on, except that the date was given as May 15, 1928, and H. W. Minier alone was named as the maker, and then provided that, "when the contract of purchase has been fulfilled and the payments of the aforesaid note made as agreed on or before the dates specified, the Williams Plan Company of Los Angeles will pay to the purchaser or assigns the face value hereof, less any indebtedness owing to said company by said purchaser, and, or, by the co-makers of said note given as the purchase price hereof." This document was retained by the company. Minier alone executed another note labeled "loan note," dated May 15, 1928, by which he agreed to pay to the company, one year after date, $300, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum. This note was physically attached to the investment certificate above mentioned, and stated that said investment certificate was assigned to the company as collateral security therefor. Before making the loan, the company paid $1.50 for a financial report upon the appellant, and, upon receipt of the various papers above mentioned, completed the transaction by giving Minier its check for $270, on May 15, 1928.

[1] When a claim of usury is made, the courts will look through the form in which the transaction is cast to discover its real substance, and if, when that is found, it appears that a borrower has paid, or agreed to pay, more than the lawful rate of interest for a loan, the loan will be held usurious. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Company, 200 Cal. 609-616, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725; Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585-597, 254 P. 946, 62 A. L. R. 1341.

[2] Our usury law fixes 12 per cent. per annum as the maximum rate of interest that may be charged on a loan, and its manifest intent is to forbid absolutely to the lender any profit whatever by way of commission, bonus, or other kind of charge, if in so doing that rate is exceeded. The lender may perform services or incur expenses in connection with the loan for which he may reimburse himself from the loan, but these items must be confined to specific service or expense incidental to the loan, incurred in such a way as to absolutely preclude its being a device through which additional interest or profit on the loan may be exacted. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., supra.

[3, 4] In the present case all the various papers which we have described are manifestly parts of one transaction by which Minier borrowed money from the company, and all must be taken into consideration to determine whether that loan was usurious. On consideration of them all, and of the other facts stated, we have no doubt that it was. Although Minier signed two notes for $300 each, he actually received only $270, in addition to which the company paid $1.50 for a financial report. At the argument before us, it was stated that the deduction of $30 was made up of one year's interest on $300 at 6 per cent., amounting to $18, and $12 for expenses of the loan; but the record does not show what was the reason for this deduction. The lender showed no services or expenses in connection with the loan except the item of $1.50 above mentioned. If $12 was deducted for expenses, the remainder of it must therefore be regarded as a bonus or commission and treated as a part of the interest deducted in advance. When interest or commission is deducted in advance from the amount of a loan, in testing the transaction for usury, the principal sum loaned will be held to be the face amount of the loan less the interest or commission so deducted. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., supra. The total amount loaned in this case, therefore, is $271.50. According to the terms of the note sued on, $300 would be repaid to the company in equal weekly installments extending over a period of 40 weeks. This amount exceeds the actual loan by $28.50. If we assume that the whole of the loan remains unpaid for 40 weeks, the interest on it for that time at 12 per cent., the maximum rate permitted by the usury law, is only $25.06. The interest charged is therefore usurious even on that assumption, but, in fact, by reason of the installment payments, the whole principal would not remain unpaid for 40 weeks, and the interest which could be lawfully charged is therefore less than the amount just stated. If we consider the other note, which calls for the payment of $300 in one year, with interest at 6 per cent., we find that it contains no provision for its payment before maturity, and no interest has been credited upon it, whatever the purpose of the deductions from the loan may have been. It therefore apparently requires the payment of $18 more as interest, which would increase the amount of usury on the loan.

We do not think the charge of usury is evaded by the device of taking two notes from the borrower, each equal to the amount of the loan applied for, and issuing in his name a certificate of investment which is to be paid for by one note and held as security for the payment of the other. At the trial, plaintiff's counsel admitted that these investment certificates were of doubtful value, and we quite agree with him. The only agreement which the company made by the certificate is that, when the so-called purchase note had been paid, it would repay Minier the amount so paid, less any indebtedness owing by him or the other makers to the company. If Minier had paid that note in 40 weeks, as agreed, he would then have been still indebted to the company on his other note, which ran for one year and for payment of which the certificate of indebtedness was held by the company as collateral. He had instructed the company in his application to apply the proceeds of that certificate to liquidate the other note when due, to accomplish which would take the whole of those proceeds. The company would therefore hold the amount it had received for the so-called purchase of the certificate of investment until the loan note was due, some twelve weeks thereafter, and would then apply it all to payment of the loan note. Under such circumstances, the certificate of investment had no real substance, but was a mere device to conceal the usurious character of the transaction by making it appear that the loan was still unpaid long after the time when, if the several instruments were complied with, it would have been paid.

It appears from the evidence that Minier was required to procure a life insurance policy for $1,000 and to deposit it as security for the loan. This was obtained through a broker who was also a director and officer of the company. The company appears to have loaned Minier the amount of the premium on this policy by an arrangement of the same kind as that made with reference to the $300 loan, and it may be that this loan was also usurious, but it is not directly involved in this case. Appellant claims that from this insurance transaction some additional gain accrued to the company on the $300 loan, but, in view of our conclusion that that loan was usurious without any such gain, we have not gone into the matter further than to learn that at least the return to the company on the $300 loan would not be diminished by consideration thereof.

[5] Plaintiff contends that the company was doing business under the Industrial Loan Company Act of 1917, as amended in 1921 (St. 1917, p. 658; St. 1921, p. 729), and that it is therefore not subject to the usury law (St. 1919, p. Lxxxiii). A rehearing of this case was granted that we might give further consideration to this contention. The matter was argued on the first hearing, and we therefore expressed an opinion regarding it. But on the rehearing it appears that a decision on the point will affect other corporations doing business under this act, some of which conduct their operations in quite a different manner from that above described. On further scrutiny of the record before us, we find that it does not require a decision of this point. The company, in its answer to the cross-complaint, alleged that it was authorized and operating under the provisions of the Industrial Loan Company Act, but this was an affirmative allegation, which it was required to prove. If this fact is a defense to the charge of usury, the plaintiff might also have proved it under the statutory replication given him by section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But the record discloses neither proof of this fact nor attempt to prove it.

[6-9] Appellant, in addition to setting up the defense of usury in his answer, filed also a cross-complaint against the company, alleging the payment of usury and seeking to recover the statutory penalty of treble the amount so paid. The fact that the loan is usurious does not, of itself, entitle him to recover on this cross-complaint. Unless usurious interest is actually paid, no recovery of the penalty provided by section 3 of the Usury Act (St. 1919, p. Lxxxiii) can be had. The mere signing and delivery of instruments providing for such interest, while they stamp the loan as usurious, do not constitute a payment of the interest Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., supra; Duke v. Levy (Cal. Sup.) 281 P. 496. The testimony shows that the amount paid on the loan is $125.70, which is less than the principal sum loaned. Minier testified that a part of the amount paid had been applied by the company to interest "as set forth in cross-defendant's exhibit ———." We can find no exhibit so designated, and the only exhibit which we find referring to payments does not apply any part thereof to interest. If any part of the payments was expressly applied by the company on account of interest without directions to the contrary from the payer, a recovery could be had on account thereof; but, unless this appears, the trial court should not on a retrial apply any of the payments to interest. The installment note did not provide for interest before maturity, and, while the loan note bore interest, the interest was not due at the time the payments were made. Under such circumstances, in the absence of an express application by the parties, all payments will be applied to principal until the amount actually loaned has been repaid. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., supra. The evidence does not show who made the payments above mentioned, but it should be noted that section 3 of the Usury Act authorizes a recovery only by the person who has paid the interest. A payment by Minier will not support appellant's cross-complaint. Plaintiff will, on the other hand, if the same facts appear at the new trial, be entitled to recover the unpaid portion of the sum actually loaned to Minier.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the municipal court for a new trial, appellant to recover his costs on appeal.

Action by Hugh F. S. Hooper and others against the Miley Oil Company for damages to real and personal property. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed and remanded.

F. A. Waters, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Henry W. Nisbet, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, P. J.

Plaintiffs brought action for damages in the sum of $825 to real and personal property by reason of alleged negligence on the part of the defendant in drilling an oil well. Complaint was filed on March 11, 1929, alleging damages in the sum of $750, and amended complaint was filed June 21, 1929, alleging damages in the sum of $825. The case was tried September 17, 1929, and leave to file a second amended complaint was granted, which alleged damages in the sum of $825. Defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence on the ground that it appeared from the pleadings that the title to real property was involved in the action and that for such reason the court had no jurisdiction. The objection was sustained, and judgment of dismissal granted on January 20, 1930. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment.

The sole question for determination is whether the municipal court has jurisdiction of actions involving the title to real property.

On November 6, 1928, section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution was amended so as to read in part as follows:

"The superior courts shall have original jurisdiction in all civil cases and proceedings (except as in this article otherwise provided, and except, also cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law to municipal or to justices in other inferior courts). * * *

On the same date, section 13 of article 6 of the Constitution was amended providing that:

"Notwithstanding any provision contained in this article, the legislature may fix by law the jurisdiction of municipal courts and inferior courts in cities having municipal courts which may be established in pursuance of this article, and may fix by law the powers, duties, qualifications and responsibilities of judges thereof.

"Any action heretofore taken by the legislature in fixing exclusive jurisdiction of municipal courts in cases at law is hereby ratified and confirmed."

Prior to the foregoing amendment of section 13 of article 6 of the Constitution, the Legislature had, on May 23, 1925, adopted an act which provided that:

"Each municipal court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to $1000 or less. * * *" St. 1925, p. 648, § 29.

This act was ratified and affirmed by the provision of the amendment of section 13 of article 6 of the Constitution, adopted November 6, 1928.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 13 of article 6 of the Constitution, as amended November 6, 1928, the Legislature on May 25, 1929 adopted an act effective August 14, 1929, amending the act adopted in 1925 and fixing the jurisdiction of municipal courts, in which each municipal court is granted exclusive original jurisdiction of all civil cases as follows:

"Each municipal court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all civil cases and actions, arising within the city or city and county in which such municipal court is established, of the following classes: 1. All cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to two thousand dollars or less. * * *" St. 1929, c. 477, p. 838, § 2.

Section 76 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended in 1929 so as to provide, in part, as follows:

"The superior court shall have original jurisdiction: 1. In all civil cases and proceedings except cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law to municipal or to justices' or other inferior courts. * * *

Formerly the Superior Court had original jurisdiction of all cases at law involving the title or possession of real property under the provisions of the Constitution, article 6, § 5; Code Civ. Proc. § 76. But on the adoption of the amendments to sections 5 and 13 of article 6 of the Constitution, on November 6, 1928, the Superior Court lost such jurisdiction up to $1,000 and since the legislation of 1929, adopted pursuant to the constitutional amendment of 1928, which specifically provided that the Superior Court should have original jurisdiction in all civil cases except cases in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law to municipal or other inferior courts, we conclude that the Superior Court has lost jurisdiction of all actions at law within the statutory limit of $2,000, including actions at law which involve the title or possession of real property, and that such jurisdiction has been granted to the municipal court.

The judgment is reversed, the cause remanded for a new trial in the municipal court; appellants to have their costs on appeal.

PEOPLE v. ARNOLD.

Cr. 37848.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Oct. 19, 1929.

Intoxicating liquors ☞ 143.

Café proprietor allowing his guests to consume intoxicating liquor brought by them on his premises is guilty of maintaining common nuisance (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 US CA § 33]).

Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), adopted by Wright Act (St. Cal. 1921, p. 79), declares any place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of such act a common nuisance, and any person maintaining such nuisance guilty of a misdemeanor.

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; H. Parker Wood, Judge.

Lacy P. Arnold was convicted of maintaining a common nuisance, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan O. Freedman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Tracy C. Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

BISHOP, J.

Section 21, title 2 of the Volstead Law (27 USCA § 33), adopted by our Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), reads in part as follows:

"Any room, house, building * * * or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of this chapter * * * is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and any person who maintains such a common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. * * *"

The main question presented by this appeal is whether or not a proprietor of a café who himself furnishes no liquor to his guests, but who allows them to consume in his premises liquor which they bring, offends under this section.

The evidence is sufficient to compel us, reviewing the matter on appeal, to consider the following as established facts: The defendant was in charge of a place known as Sharkey's Café, which had a dance floor bordered by banquet rooms and booths, with tables on the edge of the floor. On the night charged in the complaint some one hundred and twenty-five guests were in the café, many of them drinking intoxicating liquor, some of them drunk, and there was no table but bore liquor or cracked ice and ginger ale. While the drinking was going on, the defendant was actively engaged as proprietor of the place, being in and out of the kitchen, passing the booths, waiting at the front entrance, and knew that intoxicating liquor was being brought in and consumed by his patrons.

There was no evidence that any liquor was manufactured, sold, or bartered on the premises, or that the defendant kept any on hand or supplied any.

Defendant was convicted by a jury, and sentenced to pay a fine of $1,000. On his appeal, he contended that he was not guilty of maintaining a nuisance because he was not engaged in making any commercial use of intoxicating liquor.

So far as has been called to our attention, there is no decision in this state measuring the language of section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Law by a state of facts such as we have. In the federal courts, however, there are several cases which remove the question from the field of doubt.

In Fritzel v. United States (C. C. A. 7th Circuit, 1927) 17 F.(2d) 965, 966, the question was squarely considered, and the court held that a nuisance was being maintained. The following language in the opinion suffices to illustrate the court's reasoning:

"* * * Any place where liquor is kept in violation of the law—no matter by whom kept—to be a common nuisance. * * *

"In view of the fact that, with certain exceptions * * * mere possession is forbidden, it is well to remember that consumption is impossible without possession by the consumer."

The emphasis shown is that of the court, not ours. The federal Supreme Court declined to review the case.

Other cases reaching the same conclusion are: United States v. Budar (D. C. 1925) 9 F.(2d) 126; Rossi v. United States (C. C. A. 8th Circuit, 1926) 16 F.(2d) 712; United States v. Club Chez Pierre (D. C. 1929) 31 F.(2d) 220; United States v. Butler Hotel Co. (D. C. 1929) 32 F.(2d) 324.

Other contentions made by appellant have been considered by us, but will not be discussed here. We are of the opinion that no error prejudicial to defendant appears, and the judgment following conviction should be affirmed.

The facts disclosed that officer of plaintiff corporation seeking to recover judgment against defendants on their liability as stockholders of another corporation was also officer in such corporation, and was also interested in a third corporation. Plaintiff corporation had a fund from which officer withdrew certain sum which he mingled with moneys of third corporation, and which moneys were used to pay bills for benefit of defendant corporation or deposited in its accounts and withdrawal being used in corporation's interests. Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Charles B. MacCoy, Judge.

Action by the Live Oak Cemetery Association against Victor Adamson and others. From a judgment against defendant Adamson and certain other defendants, they appeal.

BISHOP, J.

[1] Plaintiff obtained judgment against the appealing defendants on their liability as stockholders of the Victor Adamson Productions, Inc. By way of defense appellants lay the ax to two roots of plaintiff's case. How successfully they cut must be determined from an examination of the judgment roll, for there is no objection to the sufficiency of the evidence appearing in the bill of exceptions, and we must assume, therefore, that there is ample evidence to support each finding. Millar v. Millar (1917) 175 Cal. 797, 167 P. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184; Jones v. Wickstrom (1928) 92 Cal. App. 292, 268 P. 449.

First of all, it is insisted that an action for money had and received will not lie in a case where, as here, the money expended was embezzled. To have the problem properly before us we must see the picture portrayed by the findings of fact.

One A. B. Watson was, from October 1, 1927, on through the story, the president of the plaintiff corporation. He was also president of the Victor Adamson Productions, Inc., part of that time, and all of the time an officer in charge of the books and records. Watson had still a third interest, the Foothill Cities Audit Company, under which actitious name he carried on an accounting business. Each of the three concerns named had checking accounts in two banks in Monrovia, and Watson kept all the books.

The plaintiff corporation had a fund set aside for the perpetual care of the graves in its cemetery. From this special fund, between September 23, 1927, and June 25, 1928, Watson drew out by checks the sum of $22,175. This sum he mingled with the moneys of his audit company in his two accounts. The income of his audit company during the years 1927 and 1928, not taking into consideration the embezzled money, was $30,830.61. The expenditures of the audit company, not including those for the Adamson Company about to be mentioned, exceeded $23,000.

Between September and June, Watson drew on his audit company accounts for $29,720.35, and either paid bills for the benefit of the Adamson Company or deposited the moneys in one or the other of its accounts; the withdrawals then being made in the corporation's interests. The figure just given includes the sum of $4,500 which went to pay the individual notes of Watson and two others; the proceeds of the notes having been credited to the Adamson Company account. A little over $5,000 was returned by the Adamson Company to Watson during this time.

Plaintiff's books show that Watson was charged with the sums withdrawn. The books of the Adamson Company show Watson credited with the expenditures he made on its behalf. No one in the Adamson Company except Watson himself knew that plaintiff's money was being used. Indeed, they were told by Watson, and innocently believed, that it was Watson's own funds he was advancing. No money went directly from plaintiff to the Adamson Company nor to its account, and it is not possible to trace any specific withdrawal from plaintiff's fund to where it finally benefited the Adamson Company.

[2, 3] Does this state of facts create a liability on the part of the Adamson Company to the plaintiff? In supporting an affirmative answer, plaintiff advances two theories:

First, it takes the position that from out the transaction the Adamson Company emerges in debt to Watson; Watson holds the debt in trust for the plaintiff; as the beneficiary, the plaintiff may sue directly. The position seems to us untenable in this case. In the first place, the action at bar is one for money had and received, not one predicated on acts establishing a trust for the benefit of the plaintiff. Then, too, the relation suggested between the plaintiff and the Adamson Company is plainly not a legal one, but one to be created by a decree directed by a court with equity jurisdiction. At the time this action was tried, the municipal court had no jurisdiction to decide that Watson should hold his debt in trust for the plaintiff. Article 6, state Constitution, section 11. Furthermore, a judgment so decreeing would not be in any way binding upon Watson, as he is not a party to the action, and would have to be reversed for that reason. See Hutchins v. Security Trust & Savings Bank (Cal. Sup. 1929) 281 P. 1026, 65 A. L. R. 1059, and cases cited, for a discussion of this principle.

[4] Plaintiff's second theory is that the Adamson corporation is liable on an implied contract. This is presented by the pleadings, and is tenable. The principle involved is illustrated by Gray v. Huffaker (1917) 176 Cal. 516, 169 P. 1038, 1039. In this case moneys of Gray intrusted to Mr. Huffaker were by him used to pay off a note executed by Huffaker and his wife, secured by a mortgage on her separate property. This use of Gray's money was made with her knowledge. An action for money had and received resulted in judgment for Gray. The court said:

"Upon these facts the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the money of Gray so appropriated to the use of the defendants. * * * She received a benefit from his money to the same extent as if she herself had received the money and had applied it to pay the mortgage debt. Standish v. Babcock, 52 N. J. Eq. 628, 29 A. 327."

In the case at bar, at least some of plaintiff's moneys was used to meet bills of the Adamson Company. It received a benefit to the same extent as though it had received the money directly and had applied it to its obligations. The question remains: Was this done with its knowledge?

It is plain, from the findings of fact, that the only knowledge that can be said to be the Adamson Company's is that possessed by Watson. Under the circumstances, his knowledge is that of the Adamson Company.

The question presented in the case of McKenney v. Ellsworth (1913) 165 Cal. 326, 132 P. 75, 76, was whether or not the bank, for which plaintiff was receiver, had taken the note being sued on with knowledge that $5,000 had been paid on it. The payee of the note as executed was one Dennis. The statement of the court pertinent to our inquiry follows:

"Dennis was president of the bank, and the only notice to the bank is that which, as respondent asserts, is to be imputed to it by reason of the fact that its president, Dennis, had knowledge of the payment and offset. The familiar rule that a principal is bound by the knowledge of his agent, acquired in the course of the agency, rests upon the presumption that the agent will communicate to the principal the facts learned by him, as it is his duty to do. But, says the appellant, where an agent of a corporation is dealing with the corporation in a transaction in his own behalf, it will not be presumed that he will communicate to his principal facts affecting the transaction. Bank v. Burgwyn, 110 N. C. 267, 14 S. E. 623, 17 L. R. A. 326; McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 246, 72 P. 997. This is no doubt the general rule regarding the imputing to a principal of notice of facts known to an agent who is, in the particular transaction in question, acting in an interest adverse to that of his principal. But the rule is not without exceptions. If the agent is in fact acting for his principal in the transaction, even though he may have an opposing personal interest, 'it is his duty, notwithstanding his interest, to communicate to his company (principal) any facts in his possession, material to the transaction, and the law will therefore presume, in favor of third persons, that he made such communication.' Bank of Pittsburgh v. Whitehead, 36 Am. Dec. 186, note; Le Duc v. Moore, 111 N. C. 516, 15 S. E. 888."

"Usually, this is a conclusive presumption." Offeman v. Robertson-Cole Studios (1926) 80 Cal. App. 1, 12, 251 P. 830, 835.

This case seems to us to be controlling in the situation here. Watson was part of the time the president of the Adamson Company, part of the time its secretary, and at all times an officer and in charge of the books and records of the corporation. These facts of themselves are not determinative, however. But it would seem to be the fact, and on the retrial the matter can be definitely determined, that he was left largely in charge of the fiscal affairs of the company. As such, he, it seems, obtained the money to pay its bills and keep it going. He was then not only loaning money he had converted to his own account to the Adamson Company, but he was intrusted with the duty of securing the funds. He was the company's agent, then, and his knowledge that so much of the money as was actually that of the plaintiff was not his own is knowledge of the company. See, also, First National Bank v. Reed (1926) 198 Cal. 252, 244 P. 368; Los Angeles Investment Co. v. Home Savings Bank (1919) 180 Cal. 601, 606, 182 P. 293, 5 A. L. R. 1193; Williams v. Hasshagen (1913) 166 Cal. 386, 137 P. 9; Offeman v. Robertson-Cole Studios (1926), supra; Southern Trust & Commerce Bank v. San Diego Savings Bank (1922) 60 Cal. App. 215, 212 P. 385.

Nor is it material that Watson was acting under no express authorization, if it be found that he was in fact the agent of the company with respect to getting its bills paid. National Bank of San Mateo v. Whitney (1919) 181 Cal. 202, 183 P. 789, 8 A. L. R. 298, presents a closely analogous case.

Our conclusion, then, is that, if on a retrial of this action it appears that Watson was intrusted with securing funds for the Adamson Company, or paying its bills, his knowledge that the funds he secured or used were those of the plaintiff brings that knowledge home to the Adamson Company.

[5] Under the facts now appearing, however, a judgment in the amount given is without warrant. To begin with, under no theory suggested to us or conjured up by our imagination can the payment of the notes, amounting to $4,500, which "were never the liabilities of the Adamson Co.," be said to be for the benefit of the company, or to create any liability on the company. Unless, on a retrial of this cause, the Adamson Company should be shown to have some legal obligation respecting the notes of Watson, Keefe, and Wilson, the payment of those notes should not be taken into consideration.

[6,7] It would seem, furthermore, that some of the advances made by Watson were from his personal funds (of the audit company), and not from moneys purloined from plaintiff. The following quotation from Elizalde v. Elizalde (1902) 137 Cal. 634, at page 641, 66 P. 369, 70 P. 861, gives the rule to be applied:

"If the trustee, after so mingling the funds, has drawn therefrom from time to time, it will be presumed that the moneys so drawn were from his own portion of the fund, rather than from the moneys held by him in trust. In re Hallett's Estate, 13 Ch. Div. 696; National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. Ed. 693; Lewin, Trusts, *895. So long as the amount in the fund is greater than the amount of the trust fund, it will, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, be presumed to be that held in trust. Whether the moneys are mingled in one account at a bank or are kept together in the strong box of the trustee is immaterial."

Upon a retrial it will be necessary, if plaintiff is to succeed, to show that moneys withdrawn from one or the other of the audit company accounts was not Watson's, tested by the rule just given. Only such expenditures for the Adamson Company's benefit as were made after all of Watson's own funds were exhausted in the account drawn upon can be charged to the Adamson Company and through it to its stockholders.

[8] Another major attack upon the judgment is made and of itself requires a reversal. This has to do with the premise upon which the case is founded, that defendants are stockholders. They are not, and never were, stockholders, they defend, because the stock purported to be issued them was unauthorized.

The irregularity on which they rely is accurately set forth in an amendment to their answer. Nowhere did the trial court find that the several allegations of the amendment were or were not true, but by way of what seems to be a recital of the evidence it is made to appear that the Adamson Company was authorized to issue stock upon these terms:

"(1) Thirty shares for cash, at the rate of $1.00 per share.

"(2) 5,000 shares in part payment for certain items of personal property to be transferred by Victor Adamson, one of the promoters of said Adamson Co., free and clear of all liens and encumbrances of all kinds and descriptions, consisting of various kinds of equipment suitable for the production of motion pictures.

"(3) And after the Adamson Co. shall have received the consideration of for and issued said 5,030 shares of stock, to sell and issue to the public, 24,470 shares of stock at and for a price of $1.00 per share."

As set up in the answer, the permit referred with more definiteness to the personal property to be conveyed than would appear from the permit given in the findings, and the answer with definiteness avers that the property was not conveyed. Nowhere in the findings is there any reference whatever to the issue thus raised by the answer. In the conclusions of law, however, this statement appears:

"V. (a) That the terms of the permit of the Corporation Commissioner with reference to the issue of the Adamson Co. stock were not complied with in that. * * * Victor Adamson did not transfer to Adamson Co. all of the items of personal property which, by the terms of said permit, he was required to transfer as conditions precedent to the issuance of stock to him."

While this is a mixed finding of fact and conclusion of law, it is a finding of fact on the proposition presented by defendants; and it does appear that the Adamson corporation did not receive the consideration for the 5,000 shares of stock it was authorized to issue to Adamson, and that it was the court's conclusion that the giving of the consideration was a condition precedent to the issue of the stock.

But, if this be so, the Adamson Company was without authority to issue any shares to the defendants, for additional shares could be issued only (as stated in the permit) "after the Adamson Co. shall have received the consideration of for (sic.) and issued said 5,030 shares of stock." The conclusion to reach in the premises cannot be in doubt, in view of the authorities.

To begin with, the Corporate Securities Act (Deering, General Laws, Act 3814) provides in section 12 thereof:

"Every security issued by any company, without a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void. * * *

Stock issued where no permit has been granted at all has been declared to be void, and the person to whom the stock was issued was not liable as a stockholder, for, "the corporation having no legal rights against Reno, its creditors could have none." Honn v. Hamer (1927) 81 Cal. App. 276, 253 P. 336, 337. Just as clearly within the characterization of section 12, it seems to us, must be placed stock issued after a permit has been granted, but which finds no authority for its issuance in the permit. Such stock is void, for it is issued without a permit authorizing it.

On yet another principle, it seems to us, the stock issued to defendants before the Adamson Company received the consideration for the 5,000 shares is void. This principle finds expression in Smith v. Bach (1920) 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14, 15, as follows:

"The general rule controlling in cases of this character is that, where a statute prohibits or attaches a penalty to the doing of an act, the act is void, and this, notwithstanding that the statute does not expressly pronounce it so. * * *

Section 13 of the Corporate Securities Act reads in part:

"Every company which shall * * * issue * * * any security * * * in non-conformity with a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same * * * shall be guilty of a public offense * * *."

Accordingly, it is held that a contract to purchase stock, not conforming to the terms of a permit, is void. Gridley v. Tilton (1927) 202 Cal. 748, 262 P. 322; Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co. (1922) 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36; Otten v. Riesener Chocolate Co. (1927) 82 Cal. App. 83, 254 P. 942.

In the Otten Case the court says it is holding the contract for the purchase void, and is not declaring the stock to be void as that question is not involved. Brewis v. Toffelmier (Cal. App. 1929) 275 P. 819, 821, deals with a case much like the Otten so far as the issue of stock is concerned (in each the violation complained of was the failure to exhibit a copy of the permit), and the court makes a distinction between those cases where there is no stock, because there is no permit authorizing its issue, and the case before it. We find in the opinion:

"His stock is not something that does not exist, as in the other case, but is properly issued, even if not properly delivered. * * *

Without pausing to examine the latter statement too critically, we find the stock in our case not properly issued, because issued prior to the event upon which its authorization was conditioned.

The conclusion is ineluctable that, as now appears, the defendants are not stockholders, and judgment should not have gone against them.

The judgment is reversed, appellants to recover their costs on appeal.

I concur: DORAN, Judge pro tem.

McCOMB, Acting P. J. I concur in the result, basing my decision upon the grounds first stated in the opinion.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., and George A. Dockweiler, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

McLUCAS, P. J.

Complaint was filed in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, charging in count 1 thereof that the defendants did willfully and unlawfully erect and construct, and cause and permit to be erected and constructed, within a residence district, a billboard of an area of more than twelve square feet, contrary to Ordinance 38315, section 16, of said city; and in count 2 thereof that the defendants erected and constructed, and caused and permitted to be erected and constructed, a billboard of a surface area of more than twelve square feet, without first having secured a written permit from the board of public works of said city so to do, contrary to section 20 of said ordinance. Defendants were adjudged guilty on both counts, and now appeal from the judgment and from the order of the trial court denying defendants' motion for new trial, and from all orders made subsequent to the judgment.

The grounds of appeal are:

(1) That the ordinance upon which complaint in this cause is based is unconstitutional, in that it seeks to deprive the defendants of the free use of their private property without due process of law, and in that said ordinance places an unreasonable restriction upon the use of private property, and that said ordinance attempts to take private property without due process of law, and that said ordinance is not within the police powers of the city of Los Angeles.

(2) That the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

(3) That the court erred in its rulings upon questions of law occurring at times subsequent to trial.

(4) That the evidence does not support the decision of the court herein.

Ordinance 38315 of the city of Los Angeles, being entitled, "An Ordinance regulating billboards, and advertising signboards," recites in section 1 thereof that:

"For the purpose of regulating the erection, construction and maintenance of billboards and advertising signboards within the City of Los Angeles the territory of the said city shall be divided into districts to be designated and known as (1) Business districts; (2) Semi-Business districts; and (3) Residence districts."

It is provided in section 3 that semibusiness districts shall include all lots fronting on both sides of the same street within any block wherein more than 50 per cent. of the occupied frontage on both sides of said street is occupied by buildings, etc., devoted to, or utilized for, business purposes other than billboards or advertising signboards.

In section 5 it is provided that residence districts shall consist of and include all portions of the city of Los Angeles not included in the business or semibusiness districts.

Section 6 forbids the erection or maintenance of any billboard within the city of Los Angeles of a surface sign space of more than ten feet, six inches in height, with certain exceptions.

Section 7 forbids the erection or maintenance of any billboard, unless all portions of the base line thereof shall be at least twelve inches from the surface of the ground and no portion of such base line more than five feet from the surface of the ground, with certain exceptions.

Section 8 forbids the erection or maintenance in the city of Los Angeles of any billboard, unless the same be safely and securely built.

Section 10 forbids the erection or maintenance within fire district No. 1, of the city of Los Angeles, of any billboard, unless the same shall be constructed entirely of metal or other noncombustible materials.

Section 11 requires that billboards erected or maintained outside of fire district No. 1, of said city, built or constructed of wood or other inflammable materials, shall be at least six feet from any building or other structure constructed of wood or other inflammable materials.

Section 14 provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to cause or permit to be displayed upon any billboard any statement of an obscene, indecent, or immoral nature, etc.

Section 16 provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to erect, or cause to be erected, within any residence district, any billboard or advertising signboard of an area of more than twelve square feet, or within a distance of less than fifteen feet from another billboard.

In section 20 it is provided that it shall be unlawful for any person to erect, or cause to be erected, any billboard or advertising signboard of a surface area of more than twelve square feet, within the city of Los Angeles, without first having secured a written permit from the board of public works so to do.

Appellants contend that said ordinance is unconstitutional, for the reasons stated in their grounds of appeal, as contained in the statement on appeal. Numerous authorities have been cited by appellants in support of their contention, which we believe are to be distinguished from the present case. In Varney & Green v. Williams, 155 Cal. 318, 100 P. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, 132 Am. St. Rep. 88, relied upon by appellants, the plaintiffs brought action to enjoin the defendant municipal authorities from tearing down certain billboards maintained by plaintiffs. The defendants based their contemplated action upon the provisions of an ordinance prohibiting the erection or maintenance of any "advertising billboard within the corporate limits of the town of East San Jose by any person except a person having a fixed place of business, who may erect and maintain on the premises where his said business is carried on, a sign advertising only merchandise for sale by him at said place of business." The court held that, if the billboards constituted a public nuisance, a court of equity would refuse any writ designed to perpetuate their maintenance, regardless of the validity of the ordinance under which defendants assumed to proceed. It was not contended by the respondents that any nuisance in fact existed, unless it resulted from the mere circumstance that structures were maintained contrary to the terms of the ordinance. The court further held that, except for the limited exemption, the effect of the ordinance was to absolutely prohibit the erection or maintenance of billboards for advertising purposes, and that such sweeping prohibition was beyond the power of the town trustees. However, after pointing out that artistic or æsthetic considerations alone will not justify, as an exercise of the police power, a radical restriction of the right of an owner to use his property in an ordinary and beneficial way, the court said at page 321 of 155 Cal., 100 P. 867, 868:

"In most or all of the cases dealing with prohibitions of the right to erect or maintain billboards, it is recognized that the legislature may under the police power prohibit advertisements of indecent or immoral tendencies or signs dangerous to the physical safety of the persons or property of the public. Ordinances limiting the height of billboards have been sustained as having a tendency to protect passers-by from physical injury. City of Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 53 L. R. A. 548, 79 Am. St. Rep. 659, 58 N. E. 673; Gunning System v. City of Buffalo, 75 App. Div. 31, 77 N. Y. S. 987; Whitmier, etc., Co. v. City of Buffalo (C. C.) 118 F. 773; In re Wilshire (C. C.) 103 F. 620."

[1] In Pacific Railways Advertising Company, etc., v. City of Oakland (Cal. App.) 276 P. 629, where the defendants sought to enforce an ordinance prohibiting commercial advertising on the exterior side of street cars, the court held that the ordinance was invalid, in that it attempted to restrict, by absolute prohibition, a legitimate use of private property, instead of regulating the same so that the use may not endanger the public health, morality, and safety. In the case at bar we find no such radical restriction as to the use of private property. Instead of prohibiting billboards, the ordinance here, by its provisions, regulates the same so that their use may not endanger the public health, morality, and safety. Necessarily, such regulations must be reasonable. In the ordinance now before us for consideration, we find that all billboards are regulated as to height, as to distance from the surface of the ground, as to the safe and secure manner in which they shall be built, as to the material of which they shall be constructed, as to the distance of wooden billboards from any building constructed of wood, or other inflammable material, and as to displaying upon any billboard any statement of an obscene, indecent, or immoral nature. Certainly it must be held that all of these regulations are reasonable, and tend to require the use and maintenance of billboards in such manner that they shall not endanger the public health, morality, and safety.

Appellants contend that the billboard in question was erected on their private property, advertised their personal business, and violated none of the foregoing provisions, except that the billboard was erected in a residence district without a permit therefor. The ordinance forbids the erection of any billboard within a residence district, as defined by the ordinance, of an area of more than twelve square feet. Such prohibition of billboards more than twelve square feet in area within a residence district can only be sustained as a proper exercise of the police power, if the provisions of the ordinance reasonably tend to promote the public peace, health, safety, and general welfare. In Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 385, 38 A. L. R. 1479, where the validity of an ordinance creating a strictly private residential district was brought in question, the court said:

"It is scarcely necessary to reiterate here the well-recognized principle that courts are loathe to substitute their judgment as to the necessity for a particular enactment for the legislative judgment as to the need of such enactment with reference to the exercise of the police power. A large discretion is vested in the legislative branch of the government with reference to the exercise of the police power. Mehlos v. Milwaukee, 156 Wis. 591, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1102, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1009, 146 N. W. 882; Carter v. Harper, supra [182 Wis. 148, 196 N. W. 451, 33 A. L. R. 269]. Every intendment is to be indulged by the courts in favor of the validity of its exercise and, unless the measure is clearly oppressive, it will be deemed to be within the purview of that power. It is only when it is palpable that the measure in controversy has no real or substantial relation to the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare that it will be nullified by the courts."

[2] In our opinion, a city ordinance is a valid exercise of the police power, whereby billboards of more than twelve feet in area are prohibited in residence districts, for the reason that such a measure bears a real and substantial relation to the public health, morals, safety, and general welfare. In Thomas Cusack Co. v. City of Chicago et al., 242 U. S. 526, 530, 37 S. Ct. 190, 191, 61 L. Ed. 472, L. R. A. 1918A, 136, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 594, the court said:

"Neglecting the testimony which was excluded by the trial court, there remains sufficient to convincingly show the propriety of putting billboards, as distinguished from buildings and fences, in a class by themselves (St. Louis Gunning Advertising Co. v. St. Louis, 235 Mo. 99, 137 S. W. 929), and to justify the prohibition against their erection in residence districts of a city in the interest of the safety, morality, health and decency of the community."

The foregoing language was quoted with approval in St. Louis Poster Adv. Co. v. City of St. Louis, 249 U. S. 269, 274, 39 S. Ct. 274, 63 L. Ed. 599. In Appeal of Liggett, 291 Pa. 109, 139 A. 619, it was held that a city, in the exercise of the police power, may prohibit the erection of billboards in residential districts.

[3] Conceding, without deciding, that the ordinance involved in this case would be unconstitutional as to owners of property in wholly vacant territory included within the residential district created by said ordinance, appellants are not in position to complain that this ordinance is unconstitutional as to appellants, because the record shows that appellants' property is not such vacant property. Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 233, 118 P. 714.

[4, 5] Appellants also contend that the evidence shows that the immediate district in the vicinity of their property was trending away from residential into business uses, and will continue to do so, and that for such reasons the ordinance is unreasonable and discriminatory as to appellants. We have examined the evidence, and find no merit in this contention. True, there are both business and vacant properties in the vicinity of appellants' property, but where an official body, in its administrative capacity, has acted upon a matter properly before it, the courts will not reverse, except where there is a manifest and flagrant abuse of discretion. Where the city council, after a consideration of all of the facts, concluded that the public welfare would be promoted by constituting the area a residence district, it is the settled rule that a court will not substitute its judgment for that of the legislative body charged with the primary duty and responsibility of determining the question. Zahn v. Board of Public Works, 274 U. S. 325, 328, 47 S. Ct. 594, 71 L. Ed. 1074; Appeal of Liggett, supra; Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra; Ex parte Quong Wo, supra.

[6] Appellants further urge that the ordinance is violative of section 24, article 4, of the Constitution of California, which requires that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. No mention of the penalty is made in the title of the ordinance. But it is now settled that the constitutional provision does not apply to city ordinances. Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 421, 44 P. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527; City ordinances are not required to have a title. Ex parte Young, 154 Cal. 317, 321, 97 P. 822, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 330; In re Johnson, 47 Cal. App. 465, 467, 190 P. 852; Trebilcox v. City of Sacramento, 91 Cal. App. 257, 266 P. 1015.

Finally, appellants contend that the billboard ordinance was in effect repealed by a later zoning ordinance which omitted appellants' property from the strictly residential zone. We see no merit in this contention, since the later ordinance does not purport to regulate the erection and maintenance of billboards.

The judgment and orders are affirmed.

DOUGLAS v. KLOPPER.

Civ. 48.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Jan. 16, 1930.

1. Limitation of actions § 35(1).

Claim for usurious interest paid held not barred by one-year statutes governing actions for treble amount paid and for statutory penalties or forfeitures (Usury Law, § 3; Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 1).

2. Limitation of actions § 49(8).

Action to recover usurious interest paid less than two years before institution thereof held not barred by limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1).

3. Usury § 102(1).

One voluntarily paying usurious interest may maintain common-law action, independent of statutory remedy, to recover amount paid (Usury Law, §§ 2, 3).

Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) § 2, declares contract for usurious interest void as to any agreement to pay interest, while section 3 authorizes recovery of three times interest paid, and makes receipt, but not payment, of usurious interest a misdemeanor.

4. Usury § 102(7).

Only excess of interest paid over legal rate can be recovered in common-law action for usurious interest paid.

5. Usury § 102(7).

Lender, to whom borrower pays usurious interest by agreement, can retain only 7 per cent. simple interest on actual loan (Usury Law, § 1).

Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), § 1, fixes legal interest on loans made without agreement as to interest at 7 per cent., and limits rate that may be agreed on to 12 per cent.

6. Appeal and error § 854(2).

While appellate court will not ordinarily consider errors against respondent, proper judgment will be upheld, though given for erroneous reason.

7. Appeal and error § 854(2).

Plaintiff recovering judgment for usurious interest paid, which Superior Court held excessive by amount exceeding legal rate, may argue on appeal that court below erred in not allowing interest on amount recovered, where addition thereof still leaves amount of judgment less than that appealed from.

8. Usury § 122.

Borrower held entitled to interest on amount of usurious interest recovered from date of making usurious payment (Civ. Code, § 3287).

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Frank G. Swain, Judge.

Action by Edwin S. Douglas against P. S. Klover. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Henry E. Carter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert E. Cogger, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J.

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment on the pleadings entered against him upon the plaintiff's motion.

It appears from the complaint that the defendant loaned to the plaintiff the sum of $5,000, for which plaintiff agreed to pay usurious interest, that, in pursuance of this agreement, the plaintiff paid defendant the sum of $684.42 as interest, and that plaintiff seeks to recover the amount so paid, beginning his action more than one year, and less than two years, after the interest was paid.

Defendant in his answer admitted that the loan was usurious, alleged that plaintiff's action was barred by section 3 of the Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), by subdivision 1 of section 339, and by subdivision 1 of section 340, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and further alleged that the payment of interest was voluntary, and hence could not be recovered.

[1, 2] We do not think plaintiff's claim is barred by any of the statutes of limitation set up in the answer. Section 3 of the Usury Act provides that any one who has paid usurious interest may recover treble the amount so paid, provided his action is brought within one year after payment. Plaintiff did not sue for treble the amount of the interest paid, and has therefore not brought his suit under this statute. Hence the fact that he did not bring his action within one year does not bar him. For the same reason subdivision 1 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which bars in one year actions on a statute for a penalty or forfeiture, does not apply to the case. Doubtless plaintiff's action is within the purview of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and would be barred within two years, but his cause of action did not arise until the interest was paid, which was less than two years before the action was brought.

[3] This brings us to the principal questions argued, which are, whether one who has paid usurious interest may maintain a common-law action independent of the remedy under the statute to recover the amount so paid, and whether the fact that he has paid such interest voluntarily will prevent a recovery in such an action. On these questions the authorities in other states are conflicting. Our present Usury Law, as stated by the Supreme Court in Wallace v. Zinman, 200 Cal. 585, 590, 254 P. 946, 62 A. L. R. 1341, and in Re Washer, 200 Cal. 598, 602, 254 P. 951, was borrowed to a large extent from the Wisconsin law, and, while the copying may not be sufficiently exact to show a legislative intent to import also the construction judicially put upon the Wisconsin law, yet decisions from that state are quite persuasive as to the rule which should be adopted here, and it is there held that a plaintiff may recover under the circumstances shown by the pleadings in this case.

In Wood v. Lake, 13 Wis. 84, 96, a similar question arose. There the defendant had paid interest in excess of the highest rate allowed by law, and pleaded this payment as a counterclaim in an action brought upon his note. The action having been brought after the expiration of time for pursuing the statutory remedy, the court held this counterclaim good, saying: "A remarkable unanimity of opinion upon this question seems to have prevailed among the courts of Great Britain and those of the several states of the Union where laws against usury, properly so called, have existed. It has been universally held, where statutes forbid the taking of excessive interest, and punish a violation of their provisions by the infliction of fines, penalties or forfeitures upon the person who takes it, that the person who pays the same may, independently of the remedies afforded by the statutes, maintain an action for money had and received, as at the common law, to recover back the money so paid. In such cases, both parties are not understood to be in pari delicto, so as to preclude a recovery by either. Upon this subject, Mr. Comyn, in his Law of Usury, page 211, says: 'And with regard to parties becoming participants criminis, the following distinction is laid down, viz.: between the prohibition of statutes made to protect the weak or necessitous from being overreached or oppressed, and the prohibitions of statutes enacted upon general reasons of policy and public expediency; in the latter case, all parties are equally criminal; in the former, the oppressor is alone within the pale of the law.' The penalties of the law are all aimed at the lender and none at the borrower; and it appears to be clearly within the intent and meaning of the legislature, if not their words, that he shall not be permitted to retain or profit by money or property thus unlawfully acquired. The provision of the law of this state (sec. 3, chap. 172, Laws of 1851), by which every person paying a greater sum for the loan or forbearance of money than that allowed by law, might, if his action was brought within one year after such payment, recover back treble the sum so paid, confirms this view. It shows that the legislature did not intend that the receiver should retain the money thus obtained, and that they did not consider both parties equally at fault. Otherwise they would not have permitted the borrower to recover back three times the amount and thus speculate out of the attempted extortions of the lender. But if the borrower chooses, by not bringing his action within one year, to waive his right to a treble recovery, he may do so and still retain the right to maintain an action for money had and received, to recover back the excess actually paid, at any time within the period prescribed by the statute of limitations. For the remedy given by the statute is cumulative and not exclusive, as has frequently been decided in other states where similar statutory remedies have been given."

In Fay v. Lovejoy, 20 Wis. 403, this ruling was repeated and both of these cases were approved in Schriber v. LeClair, 66 Wis. 591, 29 N. W. 570, 589.

In Browning v. Morris, Cowp. 790, 792, 98 Eng. Rep. 1364, an English case decided in 1778, the rule is thus stated: "The distinction has been taken between statutes enacted on general grounds of policy and public expediency in which each party violating the law is in pari delicto and entitled to no assistance from a court of justice, and those laws enacted to protect weak or necessitous men from being overreached, defrauded or oppressed, in which event the injured party may have relief extended to him, and the whole purport and reason, both of the law of usury and of the great mass of decisions under it, indicate that the lender on usury is regarded as the oppressor and the criminal and the borrower as the oppressed and injured."

In Wheaton v. Hibbard, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 290, 11 Am. Dec. 284, the same rule was adopted as in the Wisconsin cases, supra, and the court said: "The law considers the borrower rather as a victim than an aggressor. The statute prohibits usury, in order to protect needy and necessitous persons from the oppression of usurers, who are eager to take advantage of the distresses of others, and who violate the law only to complete their ruin. In such a case, the maxim of potior est conditio defendentis, has never been applied."

In Lee v. Hillman, 74 Wash. 408, 133 P. 583, 585, L. R. A. 1918B, 581, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 759, the court followed the same rule and quoted with approval from Baum v. Thoms, 150 Ind. 378, 50 N. E. 357, 358, 65 Am. St. Rep. 368, the following: "The payment of usurious interest is not a voluntary payment in such sense as to entitle the receiver to retain the amount paid above legal interest, but such payment is regarded as under the constraint of a formal, though illegal, contract, obtained by taking advantage of the necessities of the borrower, and therefore excepted from the ordinary rule that one voluntarily paying money on an illegal claim cannot maintain an action to recover such payment. Wheaton v. Hibbard, supra; Schroeppel v. Corning, 5 Denio (N. Y.) 236; Peterborough Savings Bank v. Hodgdon, 62 N. H. 300; Willie v. Green, 2 N. H. 333; Caughman v. Drafts, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 414; Fay v. Lovejoy, 20 Wis. 403; Wood v. Lake, 13 Wis. 84; First Nat. Bank v. Plankinton, 27 Wis. 177, 9 Am. Rep. 453; Grow v. Albee, 19 Vt. 540; Williams v. Wilder, 37 Vt. 613; Scott v. Leary, 34 Md. 389; Phllanthropic Bldg. Assn. v. McKnight, 35 Pa. 470; Thomas v. Shoemaker, 6 Watts & S. [Pa.] 179-183; note to Zeigler v. Scott, 54 Am. Dec. 400-402; Bexar Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Robinson, 22 Am. St. Rep. 41; note to Davis v. Garr, 55 Am. Dec. 398-400; 2 Ency. Plead. and Prac. pp. 1019, 1020, and note on usury. It follows, therefore, that in the absence of a statute expressly prohibiting it, usurious interest, which has been paid by a debtor may be recovered in a direct action, or in any action brought by the person receiving such usurious interest, on a contract express or implied against such debtor."

In Lee v. Hillman, a satisfactory answer is made to the argument, which is also presented in the case at bar, that at common law there is no limitation on the rate of interest that may be charged on a loan, and that there can be no common-law right to recover a payment which is made illegal by statute. On this point, the court said: "It may be conceded that there is a sense in which there is no such right in the absence of statute, since whatever right the debtor has must necessarily rest primarily upon the statute which makes the exaction of such payment from him unlawful. We think, however, that it does not follow that the debtor who has been thus unlawfully deprived of money or property may not recover such money or property by a common-law remedy, and that of course under our system means by the ordinary civil action which we have substituted for the common-law remedy. While the right here involved rests primarily upon our usury statute, and would not exist in the absence of such statute, we think an ordinary civil action, that being our substitute for the common-law remedy, furnishes a remedy available to the debtor to recover the money or property unlawfully taken from him in payment of usurious interest. We are unable to see that a debtor having money or property thus unlawfully taken from him is in any different situation, so far as his right to have the same restored is concerned, than as if it were taken from him in some other unlawful manner. Nor can we see that his right to restoration is any different because the taking is made unlawful by statute instead of by the common law."

In 39 Cyc. 1030, is the following statement on this subject: "The common-law doctrine which has been adopted by many of the American courts is that the debtor may recover payments made upon a loan in excess of the legal rate of interest. According to this doctrine such payments are not deemed voluntary, nor the debtor to be in pari delicto in making them. Hence, an action lies to recover such usurious excess from the creditor who ought not in equity and good conscience to retain more than his principal and lawful interest thereon. It is held in these states that other remedies given by statute do not suspend the common-law right, but are cumulative merely."

In a note, many cases supporting this statement are cited, some of which we have examined. In a subsequent note, other, but not so many, cases holding to the contrary, are cited.

In 27 R. C. L. 269, the rule is laid down as follows: "By the weight of authority, both

In this country and in England, an action at common law, in the nature of an action for money had and received, will lie for the recovery back of usurious payments in excess of principal and legal interest. And the omission from a later statute of an express provision of an earlier one for the recovery back of excessive payments does not negative the common law right. A payment of usurious interest is regarded as made under the constraint of a formal, though illegal, contract, obtained by taking advantage of the necessities of the borrower, and is, therefore, excepted from the ordinary rule that one voluntarily paying money on an illegal scheme cannot maintain an action to recover such payment. It is to be observed, however, that while the courts which sustain this rule regard the usurer as an oppressor and the debtor as a victim, so that in a sense the payment of usury is regarded as involuntary, no proof of duress or oppression is necessary to sustain the rule, other than that involved in the act itself of taking the money under a usurious contract."

In an extensive note on this subject, appended to the above-cited case of Lee v. Hillman, in L. R. A. 1918B, 585, this statement is made and supported by the citation of numerous authorities: "By the weight of authority, both in this country and in England, an action at common law, in the nature of an action for money had and received, will lie for the recovery back of usurious payments; at least, where the statute in relation to usury declares usurious contracts void in whole or in part."

This same note cites other less numerous cases to the contrary, but many of them can be distinguished from the case at bar by the fact that the statutes against usury under which they were decided did not declare a usurious agreement void or impose any criminal liability on the lender. Some of these statutes, in fact, clearly placed both parties in pari delicto by forfeiting the usurious interest to some public fund.

In the same note, at page 593, we find this statement, which is supported by the authorities cited: "In jurisdictions recognizing the common-law rule which permits recovery back of usurious payments, it is held that such remedy is not abrogated by an express statutory remedy for the recovery back of excessive interest or a penalty within a limited time, the statutory remedy being regarded as cumulative of the remedy at common law."

The questions under consideration here have not been decided in any case arising under our present Usury Law. There are, however, some California decisions which, in appellant's view of the case, are controlling here. Those decisions were made upon the provision formerly contained in the California Constitution which required a mortgage to be assessed for the purpose of taxation to the mortgagee, and provided that every contract by which the debtor is required to pay the tax on the mortgage "shall, as to any interest specified therein, * * * be null and void." Article 13, § 5. The case of Harralson v. Barrett, 99 Cal. 607, 611, 34 P. 342, 343, arose under this provision. In an action to foreclose a mortgage containing such a forbidden clause, the mortgagor claimed that the interest he had paid should be deducted from the amount of principal due, and the court said: "There is a clause in the mortgage for the payment by the mortgagors of the mortgage tax. This clause, being invalid under section 5 of article 13, of the constitution, supra, releases the mortgagors from any obligation to pay the interest stipulated in the note. The provision was inserted in the constitution for the benefit of the borrower, but it is a benefit which he may waive if he sees fit, and, if he voluntarily fulfills his promise to pay interest, it is through a mistake of law on his part, or a waiver of a known right. In either case he is bound by his own act."

This case was followed without further comment in London, etc., Bank v. Bandmann, 120 Cal. 220, 224, 52 P. 583, 65 Am. St. Rep. 179. In Matthews v. Ormerd, 140 Cal. 578, 581, 74 P. 136, 137, the court said, regarding the same constitutional provision: "With respect to the constitutional provision in question, and the rights of parties under it, the principles are clearly applicable which have been judicially applied to the asserted rights of parties under general usury laws. It is in its essential elements a usury law. In Matthews v. Ormerd, 134 Cal. 87, 66 P. 67, 210, it is called by the court 'this provision against usury,' and in Harralson v. Barrett, 99 Cal. 611, 34 P. 342, and London Bank v. Bandmann, 120 Cal. 224, 52 P. 583, 65 Am. St. Rep. 179, the doctrine generally applied to usury laws, namely, that they are for the benefit of the borrower, and that he may waive the privilege, and that if he does so and pays the interest he cannot recover it back, is applied to the constitutional provision in question."

These three cases were cited and followed on the point that voluntary payments cannot be recovered in Leahy v. Warden, 163 Cal. 178, 124 P. 825, another case cited by appellant, which, however, did not relate to this constitutional provision or to any matter of usury or any payment prohibited by law. A general study of the decisions in other states regarding usury indicates that the court was mistaken in its statement above quoted from Matthews v. Ormerd as to the doctrine generally applied to usury laws. The doctrine there stated has been applied in some cases, but the great weight of authority is to the contrary. However, this fact alone would not justify us in refusing to follow that case unless it is distinguishable on other grounds.

The constitutional provision involved in the cases just referred to declared that every contract containing the provision for payment of the tax by the mortgagor should be null and void as to any interest specified therein. To this extent it was substantially like our present Usury Law, which provides that a contract for usurious interest "shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein contained to pay interest." Section 2. But the present Usury Law goes farther, and provides as a penalty that three times the interest paid may be recovered from the lender, and also makes the receipt, but not the payment, of usurious interest punishable criminally as a misdemeanor. We think these differences point the way to the application of a different rule in cases arising under the statute. The provisions contained in the statute, but not found in the constitutional provision, are the same as those relied upon in the Wisconsin cases in support of the ruling that usurious interest paid may be recovered, and many of the other cases adopting the same rule lay stress on one or the other of these provisions as indicating that the borrower is not in pari delicto with the lender.

In Tatterson v. Kehrlein, 88 Cal. App. 34, 49, 263 P. 285, 291, it was held that money paid for stock under a contract which is illegal by reason of noncompliance with the Corporate Securities Act may be recovered. The court referred to the English case of Browning v. Morris, from which we have already quoted, saying: "The penalties prescribed by the Corporate Securities Act being all laid on the seller and none on the buyer, and the statute being for the benefit and protection of buyers, the parties are not in pari delicto, and the buyer may have judgment for the money paid out by him under the illegal contract, and may have the contract, the stock certificates and promissory note given in payment of such stock cancelled. (Citing authorities.) The foundation of the right of the plaintiff to recover in these cases, although a party to the illegal contract, is the rule of the common law declared by Lord Mansfield in Browning v. Morris, 2 Cowp. 790, 98 Eng. Reprint 1364."

The Corporate Securities Act is in all respects pointed out in Browning v. Morris in the same class as the Usury Act, and we think the rule thus declared in Tatterson v. Kehrlein should be applied to both.

[4] For the foregoing reasons, the answer in this case stated no defense, and the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment upon the pleadings. But the judgment entered by the court was for the whole amount paid by the plaintiff as interest. The authorities do not sanction the recovery of so much. In Wisconsin, on whose decisions the plaintiff especially relies, it was held, in Fay v. Lovejoy,

20 Wis. 403, that only the excess of the interest paid over the legal rate can be recovered in a common-law action, the court saying: "All the authorities agree that when interest money has been paid and applied as such with the consent of the borrower, only the illegal excess can be recovered back. The reason is, that equity never favors a forfeiture, and will not, unless bound down by statute, lend its aid to enforce one, but will, as a condition of relief, hold the party to the performance of that which is just and equitable. The payment of the principal sum loaned and lawful interest is always regarded as just and equitable. It is no more than the borrower ought in conscience to pay, nor than, in the absence of the prohibition of the statute, he would be required to pay. If therefore he has paid the interest, a court of equity will not aid him to get it back, within the lawful rate, though the lender had no action to compel its payment. And the rule is the same in an action at law for money had and received, to recover it back; or if the borrower set off the interest money paid against the principal sum in a legal action of the lender to recover that. Money had and received, though legal in form, is in its nature an equitable remedy, and lies only where the defendant has received money which, ex aequo et bono, he ought to refund. The fact, therefore, that the statute forfeits all interest, or provides that no interest shall be recovered, does not give the borrower a right to recover it back, where it has once been paid. Many of the cases in which it is held there can be no such recovery, arose under statutes which forfeit both principal and interest. It was competent for the defendant in this case to waive the forfeiture and pay the interest, and so far as he has done so, the payments, within the rate allowed by law, will not be disturbed. It is only the excess or unlawful interest which can be deducted."

The same doctrine is stated and supported by citations of cases in 27 R. C. L. 270, 39 Cyc. 1031, and the above-cited note in L. R. A. 1918B; the language of this note at page 588 being: "At common law, the rule was limited to the recovery back of the usurious excess, and did not extend to lawful interest, even though, under the statute, the lender could not have recovered such interest. This is assumed, in all, or practically all, of the cases which sustain the rule."

[5] The judgment is therefore excessive. In applying this rule, a question may arise which is not directly answered by any of the cases examined by us, as to whether the legal interest which cannot be recovered is 7 per cent., the amount of interest drawn by a loan made without any agreement as to interest (Civ. Code, § 1914; section 1, Usury Act), or 12 per cent., which is the highest rate of interest that may legally be agreed upon for a loan (section 1, Usury Act). Under our statute, the rate can exceed 7 per cent. only where there is an express written agreement to that effect. Here the only written agreement made upon the subject is void under the statute, and consequently there is in the eyes of the law no agreement as to interest. Defendant's right to retain any part of the interest is based on equitable principles, and we do not see how, under such circumstances, he can have any equity to retain more than the amount of interest which he could recover if there had been no agreement; that is, 7 per cent. simple interest on the actual loan. The principal of the loan in this case was paid by installments at various dates, and hence some computation will be necessary to determine the exact amount of the judgment, which we think can properly be done in the lower court.

[6-8] The respondent also contends that the court erred in not allowing him interest upon the amount of his recovery from the date when he made the payment of interest. It is true he has not appealed from the judgment, and, if we found no other error in it, we could not have taken notice of his contention. But, in view of the necessity of reversing the judgment and remanding the case to the municipal court for further proceedings, we think we should consider this point. While an appellate court will not ordinarily consider errors against respondent, it is equally true that a proper judgment will be upheld although it may have been given for an erroneous reason. The judgment appealed from is simply one in favor of plaintiff for $684.42, and in support of it he may properly advance on appeal any argument which will support a judgment for that amount or less, though it may have been rejected by the trial court. Of course, no effect could be given to such an argument by way of increasing the amount of the recovery, but here it is obvious that, by reason of our ruling that legal interest on the principal must be deducted from the judgment, the addition of interest on the amount recovered will still leave the amount of the judgment less than that from which the appeal was taken. The plaintiff's action is substantially one for money had and received. The amount which he is entitled to recover was paid by him on a definite date, and the defendant's obligation to repay it arose immediately upon the payment. The amount recoverable can be exactly fixed by computation, and hence we think the plaintiff is entitled to interest upon his recovery from the date when he made the usurious payment. Civ. Code, § 3287; Richter v. Union, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 367, 62 P. 39.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the municipal court, with directions to enter a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon the pleadings for the excess of the amount of interest paid by plaintiff over simple interest at 7 per cent. upon the various installments of principal paid by the plaintiff, from the time they were loaned to him until the time he repaid them to defendant, respectively, with interest upon the amount so recovered, at 7 per cent. from May 25, 1926, to date of judgment, appellant to recover his costs of appeal.

Affidavit claiming exemption from attachment and execution on ground earnings were for personal services did not raise conflict in evidence.

4. Exemptions ☞148.

One claiming exemption from execution on ground earnings were for personal services has burden of proof (Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 10).

5. Exemptions ☞122.

Affidavit claiming exemption in language of statute is mere conclusion of law and will not support order denying motion to declare funds subject to attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 10).

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Leonard Wilson, Judge.

Action by the Fay Securities Company against W. H. Jack Bowering and others. From an order denying a motion to declare certain funds subject to attachment and execution, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Harold S. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. G. Moore, of Compton, for respondent.

[1] A writ of attachment against the defendant was levied upon certain money due to him. He claimed that this money was exempt from execution and attachment under subdivision 10 of section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereupon, the plaintiff moved the trial court for an order declaring these funds subject to attachment and execution. After the hearing of this motion, the court made an order denying it and directing the release of the money, from which order the plaintiff appeals. No question has been made as to the right of appeal from this order, and it seems to be in effect an order discharging an attachment, and therefore appealable under section 983 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Risdon Iron Works v. Citizens', etc., Co., 122 Cal. 94, 54 P. 529, 68 Am. St. Rep. 25.

[2] At the hearing of the motion, the defendant testified that he was in the trucking business, owning and operating four trucks and employing three men as drivers, besides himself, and that the money attached was due him as the result of the operation of his four trucks and was income from his trucking business.

The provision of the Code under which the exemption is claimed is that "the earnings of the judgment debtor for his personal services" shall be exempt from execution under certain conditions not here involved. The question before us is whether the money above mentioned is within this exemption. As far as we are advised, this question has not been decided by any of the appellate courts of this state, but there are numerous decisions on similar questions in other states. On account of the varying language of the exemption statutes, many of these decisions are not in point here. In some of the states, the exemption is of "earnings" without qualifying words. Some decisions, based on such a statute, hold that income arising from a business in which capital or assets are employed may be exempt. There are also a few decisions extending this rule to statutes exempting "earnings from personal services," but only in cases where the services of the debtor are the chief factor in the business. The weight of authority in other states appears to be that the terms "personal earnings" and "earnings for personal services," which are treated in many authorities as synonymous, do not include a debtor's income arising from a business involving other elements of gain than his personal services, such as the employment of capital or assets. 25 Corp. Juris 68.

In New York, where the statute exempts "personal earnings," it has been held that the exemption does not include moneys due from customers to one who retails ice and employs two carts and several men (Mulford v. Gibbs, 9 App. Div. 490, 41 N. Y. S. 273), or the income of a saloon keeper from his business (Prince v. Brett, 21 App. Div. 190, 47 N. Y. S. 402), or money due the judgment debtor for milk produced by him on a rented farm, although he appears to have worked the farm in person (The Matter of Wyman, 76 App. Div. 292, 78 N. Y. S. 546), or income of the judgment debtor from an iron working shop in which he hires three men and uses a truck and various machinery (Schafer v. Tyroler, 94 Misc. Rep. 127, 158 N. Y. S. 1090), on the ground that all these items are the proceeds of a business rather than personal earnings.

In Shelly v. Smith, 59 Iowa, 455, 13 N. W. 419, it was held that money due from boarders to the keeper of a boarding house who has several boarders and four employees, besides herself and her daughter, is not exempt, and in Youst v. Willis, 5 Okl. 170, 49 P. 56, the same ruling was made as to money due a hotel keeper from his guests. The statute in each case was the same as ours, and in the Iowa case the court pointed out that many elements of profit are involved in the keeping of a boarding house besides the mere personal earnings of the proprietor and his family.

In Clapp v. Smith, 91 Okl. 84, 216 P. 120, it was held that the proceeds of crops grown by a farmer are not exempt as "current wages or earnings from professional or personal services."

In Wineblood v. Payne, 129 Okl. 103, 263 P. 669, it was held that one who was driving a truck and hauling gravel at $3 per load might claim as exempt the reasonable wages of a truck driver, although it was conceded that the earnings of the truck were not exempt and there was nothing in the terms of his employment on which such a segregation could be based. The court cited in support of its decision 25 Corp. Juris 69, and the rule there stated is: "Where a debtor's income is derived from a business involving other elements of gain than his personal services, he is entitled to an exemption in as much thereof as is necessary to compensate him for his own personal labor, provided it can be ascertained. But if the amount due the debtor on account of personal labor cannot be distinguished from the rest, no part of such income will be exempt as 'personal earnings' under the statute."

Manifestly this decision is not supported by the authority cited and it does not seem to us well grounded in reason. How can it be said with truth that one who hauls goods in a truck by contract for a lump sum per load is receiving any particular portion of the freight charge for his personal services and the remainder for the use of his truck? If this can be done, it would be equally proper to find the rental value of the truck, subtract that from the gross receipts, and call the balance the earnings of the driver. Neither process takes account of the expenses of operating the truck, nor does the Oklahoma court point out how those expenses are to be paid, though perhaps it assumes that they will be met out of the balance remaining after taking out the wages of the driver. But suppose a truck operator, in order to meet competition, or by reason of bad judgment, or bad luck, fixes a price for hauling that does not cover the three items of operating expenses, driver's wages, and rental value of the truck. Which is then to be eliminated in apportioning the returns? The mere fact that one of these items is exempt from execution, if ascertained, hardly affords a reason for holding that it must or can be segregated from the others for that purpose where no means of segregation appear. It might easily happen that the hauling price would be no more than sufficient to cover the operating expenses. Since a truck could not be operated at all without some provision for the expenses of doing so, it would be more reasonable in such a case to apply the whole returns for that purpose and hold that no earnings for the driver were included therein (which would manifestly be the fact if the operator were solvent and no question of exemption were involved); but the Oklahoma decision would lead to the absurdity of applying the returns in such a case to the earnings of the driver although, in fact, there were no earnings. We think the true rule in this matter is that stated in the passage already quoted from Corpus Juris. That rule purports to be based on the case of Brainard v. Shannon, 60 Me. 342, and a reading of that case shows the ascertainment of the amount of personal earnings referred to is to be made by some reference to the original contract for the work and not by mere testimony in court as to the reasonable value of the services. In this Maine case, it appeared that the judgment debtor had done work for which it was agreed that he was to have $3 per day for his own wages and an agreed price for other men employed by him on the work. The statute there involved exempted "wages for his personal labor," and the court said: "But this provision does not exempt that which is due to him for the wages or work of other men employed by him, or due to him upon jobs into which other matters besides his personal labor, not capable of being distinguished from it, go to form the price which he is to receive, even though the amount thus due to him at the time of the service of the process does not exceed the amount of his wages for his own personal labor during the time specified. * * * The statement is, that Turner had been doing work for Shannon, for which he was to have a certain sum per diem for his own wages, and pay for the work of the men employed by him at a fixed rate. Under such a contract, honestly made without any fraudulent practice or design, we think that the wages of the principal defendant's personal labor may be exempted, so far as it can be ascertained from the accounts what is actually due for such wages."

There are other cases in which the same principles are followed. Applying them to the present case, we find that it nowhere appears that there was any arrangement by which the defendant was employed to render any personal services, or by which any part of the compensation to be paid for trucking was allocated to payment for such services. In the absence of something of this kind, the defendant is not entitled to claim an exemption for any part of that compensation as being his earnings for personal services.

[3-5] At the hearing of this matter, the court had before it, in addition to defendant's testimony, his affidavit claiming exemption, originally delivered to the marshal, in which he stated merely, in the words of the statute, that the money attached was "earnings due him for his personal services," and that the conditions making such earnings exempt existed. This affidavit, however, cannot be regarded as raising a conflict in the evidence, for it states a mere legal conclusion which can have no weight against facts stated by him on which he bases the conclusion. Burns v. Jackson, 53 Cal. App. 345-347, 200 P. 80. The burden is upon one claiming an exemption to show by evidence that he is entitled to it. An affidavit, in the language of the statute, is a mere conclusion of law and is not such evidence as will support an order like that made in this case. Petrich v. Francis, 83 Cal. App. 72, 256 P. 444.

The order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. PEET.Cr. 253.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Feb. 26, 1930.

1. Automobiles ⇨355(4).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for reckless driving.

2. Witnesses ⇨70.

Charge of reckless driving, dependent on speed of automobile, falls within law relating to competency of arresting officers (California Vehicle Act, § 155, as amended by St. 1929, p. 548, § 70).

California Vehicle Act, § 155, as amended by St. 1929, p. 548, § 70, requires every officer when on duty to be dressed in a full distinctive uniform, and to paint any automobile used for patrolling public highways a distinctive color, and that, on failure to so dress or comply with requirements as to automobile, arresting officer shall be incompetent as a witness or witnesses in any prosecution on charge involving speed of vehicle.

3. Witnesses ⇨77.

Refusal to permit cross-examination to determine competency of arresting officer, in prosecution for reckless driving dependent on speed of automobile, held error (California Vehicle Act, § 155, as amended by St. 1929, p. 548, § 70).

The defendant, by way of cross-examination, to which objection was sustained, asked the arresting officer the purposes for which he was patrolling the highway, whether he was attired in the uniform usually worn by traffic officers, and what the color of the officer's car was.

Appeal from Justice Court, Inglewood Township; A. F. Monroe, Justice of Peace.

Marlin D. Peet was convicted of reckless driving, and he appeals.

Reversed, and new trial directed.

BISHOP, J.

[1] The appellant was charged with reckless driving. The only witness for the people was an officer who testified that while patrolling a boulevard in the county he noticed the defendant driving between forty-five and fifty miles per hour down the boulevard, by other automobiles, and across street intersections. We are not impressed by the strength of the evidence in the case, but find it sufficient to uphold the judgment. The only question in the case arises out of rulings on the evidence.

The defendant by way of cross-examination asked the officer the following questions: "For what purpose were you patrolling the highway?" "Were you attired in the uniform usually worn by traffic officers?" "What was the color of the car you were driving?" Objections were made and sustained to these questions, and they remained unanswered.

It must be conceded that the ruling on these objections does not constitute reversible error, unless it is made so by section 155 of the California Vehicle Act. The pertinent provisions of that section, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 548, § 70), are as follows:

"Every officer when on duty for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act shall be dressed in a full distinctive uniform, and no officer shall use an automobile for patrolling public highways in the performance of such duty, unless such automobile is painted a distinctive color such as may be determined upon by the division of motor vehicles.

"In any prosecution under this act upon a charge involving the speed of a vehicle, any officer or officers arresting or participating or assisting in the arrest of the person so charged shall be incompetent as a witness or witnesses * * * when an automobile was used by such officer or officers in violation of the provisions of this act, or the officer or officers were not in full uniform, and the court shall be without jurisdiction to render a judgment of conviction upon the testimony * * * by any such officer or officers so using an automobile not in conformity with the act or not in full uniform. [Effective August 14, 1929.]"

It is apparent that our question, then, is this: Was the charge of reckless driving one "involving the speed of a vehicle," as these words are used in section 155? If it was, the defendant had a right to test the competency of the officer to be a witness, and to discover whether or not his testimony was to be given any weight at all; and in depriving him of this right the court erred to his prejudice.

It may be urged that a charge of reckless driving does not necessarily involve the speed of a vehicle. This is true in the sense that the recklessness need not consist in driving at an unlawful speed, but may be attributable to other deviations from the path of safe driving. But in the cause at bar the case of recklessness is founded on the speed at which the defendant was driving his car, under the conditions shown, and, as the rate of speed thus became a material issue in the prosecution, we conclude that the charge was one involving the speed of a vehicle.

We find support for this determination in the interpretation placed by our Supreme Court on the provision of the Constitution respecting the jurisdiction of "cases at law which involve the title or possession of real property." In the case of Hart v. Carnall-Hopkins Co. (1894) 103 Cal. 132, 37 P. 196, 199, the Supreme Court was considering on appeal a case begun in the justice's court to recover damages for the nonperformance of an agreement. The case was tried by the justice and judgment rendered; an appeal being taken on questions of law and fact. The superior court, quite properly, entered upon a trial de novo; the Supreme Court held, because it could not be told from the face of the transcript, that the case was one involving possession of real property. But, as during the taking of evidence on the trial de novo it appeared that an issue to be decided was as to the possession of certain land, the superior court continued under its original jurisdiction, and the case was properly appealed to the Supreme Court. Nor did it matter, the court said, that the question of possession was only incidentally involved. "If the issue * * * is so involved that it must be decided in order to determine the case, the superior court has original * * * jurisdiction, whether the involution may be said to be merely incidental or not." The language just quoted was repeated with approval in Dungan v. Clark (1910) 159 Cal. 30, 112 P. 718, and again in Morrissey v. Morrissey (1923) 191 Cal. 782, 218 P. 396.

[2] In other cases it is held that title or possession is involved, and therefore the justice's court has no jurisdiction, even though there is no issue joined on the subject. Illustrative of these cases is Boyd v. Southern California Ry. Co. (1899) 126 Cal. 571, 58 P. 1046. It is likewise true, we hold, that a case of reckless driving which is dependent upon the speed at which the car is driven for its proof of recklessness falls within section 155 of the California Vehicle Act, even though the defendant's evidence may not conflict with the prosecution's evidence as to his speed.

The parties have raised no question as to the constitutionality of the portion of section 155 with which we are concerned. Nor are we disposed to discuss the question other than to note that our Supreme Court in Fleming v. Superior Court (1925) 196 Cal. 344, 238 P. 188, devoted considerable space to a consideration of the constitutionality of the analogous provisions of section 155 concerning speed traps and declared them to be valid. The pronouncement was unnecessary to the determination of the case, but it was deliberately made, and, if it does not express the proper rule in our case, the distinction should be made by the Supreme Court, not by us.

[3] Because the defendant was not permitted to apply the touchstone of section 155 to the officer who appeared as a witness, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial directed to be had in the Superior Court of Los Angeles county.

We concur: McLUCAS, P. J.; SHAW, J.

BISHOP, J.

As the above cases all present problems embracing the question, "Is proof merely of the possession of intoxicating liquor sufficient to sustain a conviction under the Wright Act?" we have grouped them together for consideration. In each the defendant was charged with unlawful possession, found guilty, sentenced, and has appealed.

The liquor in the Ruddick Case, a quarter of a bottle less than a quart in size, was found in the kitchen cabinet of a flat occupied as a dwelling by defendant and her husband.

At Jones' residence, a gallon of whisky was found underneath a drawer in the china cabinet of the dining room.

Kate Coyne was found to have a partly filled pint bottle of whisky under her shoulder as she lay on a bed in a hotel room.

In a cabinet situated in the dining room of defendant Paar's residence, there were found sixteen bottles of assorted liquors.

It will appear, as we review the cases, that three questions are involved in the situation before us: Is the mere possession, that is, possession without intent to sell or transport, a public offense? Is it necessary to set forth an unlawful purpose or to negative the exceptions in the complaint or indictment? Is it incumbent on the people to prove that the case does not fall within the exceptions, or is the defendant to take the burden of proceeding with the proof that his possession is within the exceptions?

Without attempting at this point to separate the penal provisions of the National Prohibition Act (41 Stat. 305 [27 USCA]) which our state has adopted from those which are procedural or rules of evidence and are not adopted, the following sections, all in title 2, are pertinent to our investigation.

The first half of section 3, tit. 2 (27 USCA § 12), reads: "No person shall on or after the date when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, manufacture, sell, * * * furnish or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this Act, and all the provisions of this Act shall be liberally construed to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented."

Section 25 of the same title (27 USCA § 39) opens with this sentence: "It shall be unlawful to have or possess any liquor or property designed for the manufacture of liquor intended for use in violating this title or which has been so used, and no property rights shall exist in any such liquor or property."

A purely procedural provision is placed in section 32, tit. 2 (27 USCA § 49): " * * * It shall not be necessary in any * * * indictment to give the name of the purchaser or to include any defensive negative averments."

In the following section (33), 27 USCA § 50, we find: "After February 1, 1920, the possession of liquors by any person not legally permitted under this title to possess liquor shall be prima facie evidence that such liquor is kept for the purpose of being sold, bartered, exchanged, given away, furnished, or otherwise disposed of in violation of the provisions of this title. Every person legally permitted under this title to have liquor shall report to the commissioner within ten days after the date when the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, the kind and amount of intoxicating liquors in his possession. But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only and such liquor need not be reported, provided such liquors are for use only for the personal consumption of the owner thereof and his family residing in such dwelling and of his bona fide guests when entertained by him therein; and the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor in any action concerning the same to prove that such liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed, and used."

It is unnecessary to list at this time, but only to note that there are other conditions, described in title 2 of the Volstead Act, under which possession is declared to be lawful.

Addressing ourselves to the question, "Does the Volstead Act prohibit possession not shown to be for an unlawful purpose?" we find the negative answer given by appellants not without its support in the federal courts. There are three reported cases from the Western district of Pennsylvania upholding the position they take. United States v. Illig (D. C. 1920) 288 F. 939; United States v. Berger (D. C. 1925) 9 F.(2d) 167; Petition of Shoemaker (D. C. 1925) 9 F.(2d) 170. In the Southern district of Florida too a strong affirmation of appellant's contention is given in United States v. Dowling (D. C. 1922) 278 F. 630. The voice of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the Fifth Circuit probably must be added to these. See Hilt v. United States (1922) 279 F. 421.

The great weight of federal authority, however, supports the conclusion that the Congress could and did make mere possession of intoxicating liquor unlawful. The earliest case on the question coming to our attention is United States v. Murphy (D. C. 1920) 264 F. 842, 843, from the Eastern district of New York. The government had applied for permission to file an information charging the defendant with possession of liquor in violation of section 3, title 2, of the Volstead Act. The question at issue and the answer given by the court appear in the following quotation:

"Defendant insists that nothing therein contained can be taken to indicate that the mere possession of intoxicating liquor is prohibited, and that Congress * * * could not declare any act to be a crime which was not forbidden by the amendment [18th] itself. * * *

"The amendment in question was adopted in order that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage might come to an end. It was within the power of Congress to adopt any reasonable means calculated to bring about the desired result. Limiting possession as the act has done will tend to such an effect. * * *

"The difficulty, if not the actual impossibility, of preventing general traffic in intoxicating liquors, unless the possession thereof is confined to the home of the individual, as title 2, section 33, of the act permits, is so apparent as to need no comment, and Congress cannot be held to have exceeded its power as is contended."

From the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth Circuit we have Page v. United States (1922) 278 F. 41, 44, reviewing a case where the plaintiff in error had been charged with possession. He contended that section 3, title 2, was without vitality because Congress had no authority to prohibit possession. The court made answer: "If, in order to enforce the constitutional amendment, it is necessary to restrict the possession of intoxicating liquor to those having permits to possess the same and to private houses when intended for the sole use of the owner and his family and for bona fide guests, it is within the discretion of Congress to prohibit the possession as a means for the enforcement of the amendment."

The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit reached the same conclusion in Massey v. United States (1922) 281 F. 293, where legislation respecting possession of game, narcotics, burglar tools, and lottery tickets, furnished a precedent for interpreting the prohibition of possession of liquor.

In harmony with these decisions we find also Ex parte Ramsey (D. C. 1920) 265 F. 950 (a case also from the Southern district of Florida, it may be noted); Rose v. United States (C. C. A. 6th) 274 F. 245; Fitzhugh v. Mitchell (D. C. N. D. Cal. 1922) 277 F. 966; Jordan v. United States (C. C. A. 9th 1924) 299 F. 298; Riggs v. United States (C. C. A. 4th 1926) 14 F.(2d) 5; Fritzel v. United States (C. C. A. 7th 1927) 17 F.(2d) 965, and semble: Broens v. United States (C. C. A. 6th 1923) 290 F. 809; United States v. Club Chez Pierre (D. C. N. D. Ill. 1929) 31 F.(2d) 220; Herter v. United States (C. C. A. 9th 1929) 33 F.(2d) 402.

So far as we are aware, the federal Supreme Court has not spoken on the exact question under consideration. It has voiced its opinion with respect to an Idaho statute, however, in a manner strongly indicative of what its opinion would be. We quote from Crane v. Campbell (1917) 245 U. S. 304, 38 S. Ct. 98, 99, 62 L. Ed. 304:

"It must now be regarded as settled that, on account of their well-known noxious qualities and the extraordinary evils shown by experience commonly to be consequent upon their use, a state has power absolutely to prohibit manufacture, gift [etc.] of intoxicating liquors within its borders without violating the guaranties of the Fourteenth Amendment. (Citing cases.)

"As the state has the power above indicated to prohibit, it may adopt such measures as are reasonably appropriate or needful to render exercise of that power effective. (Citing cases.) And, considering the notorious difficulties always attendant upon efforts to suppress traffic in liquors, we are unable to say that the challenged inhibition of their possession was arbitrary and unreasonable or without proper relation to the legitimate legislative purpose."

We do not find in our state reports any such debate of the subject as has taken place in the federal courts. In several cases there appears comment explicable on the theory that the court had in mind that mere possession was not enjoined by the Wright act, but only possession for the purpose of sale or, etc. For example, in People v. Buttulia (1924) 70 Cal. App. 444, 233 P. 401, 402, it is said that proof of sales "would also tend to prove that his constructive possession of such liquor was for an illegal purpose." We find a statement to the same effect in People v. Mullaly (1926) 77 Cal. App. 60, 245 P. 811. That "the jury was carefully instructed that the mere possession of intoxicating liquor is not a crime" was set forth as a fact with seeming commendation in People v. Gatlin (1928) 92 Cal. App. 42, 267 P. 564.

All these expressions of opinion, if they are such, that mere possession is no offense, are referable to the same source as the one clear statement contained in People v. Medalgi (1928) 94 Cal. App. 543, 271 P. 552, 554, where the jury had been told: "You are instructed that in this class of offenses the intent is presumed from the doing of the act, that is, the mere doing of the act is sufficient to constitute the offense."

In denying a rehearing, the court criticized this instruction, saying: "If by said instruction the court meant the mere proof of possession of intoxicating liquor was sufficient to constitute the offense, without further proof that it was possessed for unlawful purposes, the instruction was erroneous."

In support of its statement, the court cited People v. Silva (1924) 67 Cal. App. 351, 227 P. 976; People v. Mattos (1924) 67 Cal. App. 346, 227 P. 974; People v. Arnarez (1924) 68 Cal. App. 645, 230 P. 193; and People v. Mul-laly, supra. In none of these cases was the interpretation of section 3, title 2, in controversy, and they are not authority for the conclusion that, in declaring "possession" to be an offense, Congress and the state Legislature are to be understood as having added the words, "for the purpose of violating the law by some further act." Because we are to note these cases in another connection, we shall not analyze them at this time.

Opposed to these hints and this declaration we have hints equally strong in People v. Mehra (1925) 73 Cal. App. 162, 238 P. 802, and In re Baldwin (1927) 85 Cal. App. 165, 259 P. 119. Moreover, we have two cases from which quotations are worthy of space. The petitioner in the case of In re Moore (1924) 70 Cal. App. 483, 233 P. 805, 806, had been held to answer on a charge of selling intoxicating liquor. The court expressed grave doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence as to the sale, but found plenty to prove possession, so denied his release, saying: "Possession," says the court in Beyer v. United States (C. C. A.) 282 F. 226, 'is a crime separate and distinct from the crime of the sale of liquor.' In title 2, § 3 * * * of the National Prohibition Law, it is expressly declared that 'no person shall * * * possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act.' Possession, therefore, except as authorized by the Volstead Act, is one of the acts which the Wright Act, by its adoption of the 'penal provisions' of the federal statute, denounces as a criminal offense."

A similar exposition of the law appears in Re Adams (1927) 85 Cal. App. 161, 259 P. 58, 59: "The law of California prohibits the possession of alcoholic intoxicating liquors fit for use for beverage purposes containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, excepting only when the liquor was obtained before the act went into effect and is kept in the owner's dwelling for use therein by him, his family, and bona fide guests, or in certain cases where certain permits are granted either for medicinal use, or, in accordance with certain of the provisions of the act, allowing special permission under special circumstances. In other words, it is unlawful to possess intoxicating liquor not permitted by any statutory authorization."

Among other authorities relied upon in the foregoing case are Page v. United States, supra, and Rose v. United States, supra, in both of which, as the court points out, the federal Supreme Court was petitioned but declined, to take action.

It should be kept clearly in mind that we are dealing with possession prohibited by section 3 and not the possession that constitutes a nuisance under section 21 of the Volstead Act, considered in People v. Mehra, supra, and People v. Mazzola (1927) 80 Cal. App. 583, 251 P. 222.

[1] On this first of the three questions before us we take the position, therefore, that by the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), as by the Volstead Act, the possession of intoxicating liquor, except as expressly permitted by the act, is an offense; and the courts should not write into section 3, title 2, a further provision not placed there by the Legislature, that possession is an offense only when coupled with an intent further to violate the law.

[2] To the second question we find a happy unanimity of opinion. It is undoubtedly the rule that in charging possession it is not necessary to state that the possession is not one of the excepted classes. Because of the bearing the answer to this question has upon our remaining problem, more time will be devoted to a review of the cases than would be warranted in support of an unchallenged principle.

The case of In re Lord (1926) 199 Cal. 773, 250 P. 714, 716, involved one convicted under the Poison Act. Objection was made that the complaint was insufficient, in that it failed to allege that defendant's act was not one of those excepted by the statute. The court said: "The authorities in this state are without conflict 'that such exceptions and provisos were to be negated in the pleading only where they are descriptive of the offense or define it, and that where they afford matter of excuse merely they are to be relied on in defense.'"

The petitioner in Matter of Lieritz (1913) 166 Cal. 298, 135 P. 1129, 1131, had been found guilty of violating the Wyllie Act. That act prohibited possession of liquor except in the home for guests, by a pharmacist, when stored where manufactured, etc. The information charging petitioner did not set forth that he was not in the favored group. This was met as follows: "The excepted classes are not mentioned in the definition of the offense, and it is therefore not necessary to enumerate them, nor to declare the defendant not a member of any one of them in drafting a complaint or information. The authorities almost without conflict declare that a complaint, indictment, or information need not allege that an accused comes within exceptions mentioned in the statute upon which the prosecution is founded."

To the same conclusion respecting charges under the Wright Act we find People v. Cencovich (1923) 64 Cal. App. 39, 220 P. 448; In re Trauger (1927) 88 Cal. App. 59, 262 P. 780; In re Baldwin (1927) 85 Cal. App. 165, 259 P. 119.

[3] It is not necessary, then, to plead that the possession charged is not of the character declared to be lawful. Must the people prove what they need not allege? Our answer is that they need not, and we believe that a study of the cases proves the unsoundness of the contrary conclusion enunciated in some of the decisions.

In two early cases in the history of the Wright Act in this state, the defendants were charged with the sale of liquor. In each, for some reason, the court instructed the jury substantially in the language of section 33 of title 2 of the Volstead Act, that possession of liquor was prima facie evidence that such liquor was kept for the purpose of being sold, etc., and that the burden was on the possessor to show that the liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed, and used. Quite properly in each of the cases the court held this instruction erroneous, because the Wright Act had adopted only the penal provisions of the Volstead Act. In each case it was concluded, however, that the instruction was harmless—in the one case because the question of possession was not involved; in the other because the possession proved could not have been lawful in any event. These two cases are People v. Mattos (1924) 67 Cal. App. 346, 227 P. 974, and People v. Silva (1924) 67 Cal. App. 351, 227 P. 976.

These cases were followed by the case of People v. Arnarez, to which reference has already been made. Here the defendant was charged with manufacturing liquor, and a verdict was returned finding him guilty of possession of liquor. Possession, the court held, was a distinct offense not included within the charge of manufacturing, and the judgment was reversed. The same instruction condemned in the two preceding cases of Mattos and Arnarez had been given in this case, and again it was disapproved; reference being made to those cases.

Next in the procession is the case of People v. Pagni (1924) 69 Cal. App. 94, 230 P. 1001. Here the defendant was charged with possession, and here again an instruction substantially in the language of section 33 of title 2 of the Volstead Act was given, to the effect that the burden of proof was upon the possessor in any action concerning the same to prove that such liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed, and used. Citing the Mattos, Silva, and Arnarez Cases, the court holds that this provision of the Volstead Act was not adopted and the instruction should therefore not have been given.

There follows the case of People v. Buttulia (1924) 70 Cal. App. 444, 233 P. 401, 402, in which the Mattos and Silva Cases are cited and this conclusion given as justifying the admission of evidence of sales of liquor: "In California, therefore, the burden rests upon the prosecution to prove the illegality of possession of intoxicating liquor and that is a material element of the offense."

The next in line is People v. Mullaly (1926) 77 Cal. App. 60, 245 P. 811, 813. The trial court had instructed the jury that, where the prosecution had made satisfactory proof of possession, the burden of proving any license or permit was upon the defendant. This the appellate court said was not in harmony with the Mattos, Silva, Arnarez, and Pagni Cases but held the instruction without prejudice, as "there was no pretense at the trial, however, that the defendant had the liquor lawfully or for a lawful purpose."

In People v. Miller (Cal. App. 1929) 275 P. 482, we find the latest approval of this doctrine; the Buttulia Case being given credit for it.

The conclusion reached in the Pagni Case and since approved, that the burden is on the state to establish the unlawfulness of the possession charged, is premised on the fact that the provisions of section 33 of the title 2 of the Volstead Act were not adopted by the Wright Act. This is a non sequitur. The provisions of section 32 of title 2 were not adopted either; yet the rule otherwise recognized that exceptions need not be denied in a complaint continues to be the law. The Wright Act did not repeal any rules of procedure in California, and the determining question is not, "What part of the Volstead Act was not adopted?" but "What principles govern in the absence of that act?" There is no mistaking the answer.

In the same volume containing the Buttulia Case we find People v. Moronati (1924) 70 Cal. App. 17, 232 P. 991, 992, where the defendant was convicted of having narcotic drugs in his possession. "The trial court instructed the jury that it was not incumbent upon the people to prove that appellant did not come within any of these exceptions, and it is contended that the instruction was error. It is well settled, however, that, 'when the subject-matter of a negative averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, the averment is taken as true, unless disproved by that party. * * *' The present case lies exactly within this rule. The instruction was therefore proper."

The case of People v. Boo Doo Hong (1898) 122 Cal. 606, 55 P. 402, 403, is a leading case on the question. There the Supreme Court upheld an instruction that the burden was upon the defendant charged with unlawful practice of medicine to establish that he had a certificate. The court quotes with approval from Greenleaf on Evidence, as follows: "But, when the subject-matter of a negative averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, the averment is taken as true, unless disproved by that party. Such is the case in civil or criminal prosecutions for a penalty for doing an act which the statutes do not permit to be done by any persons, except those who are duly licensed therefor; as, for selling liquors, exercising a trade or profession, and the like. Here the party, if licensed, can immediately show it without the least inconvenience; whereas, if proof of the negative were required, the inconvenience would be very great."

In Ex parte Hornef (1908) 154 Cal. 355, 97 P. 891, 893, the same conclusion is reached. The court said: "If he had any such defense on the facts of the charge against him, the time to make it was on his trial in the police court."

In People v. H. Jevne Co. (1919) 179 Cal. 621, 178 P. 517, 520, the same principle was recognized, the court saying: "The existence of such purpose affords, therefore, 'matter of excuse merely,' and is to be relied on in defense."

The rule has been applied in a prosecution for a violation of the Wyllie Act (St. 1911, p. 599). It will suffice to quote from the case, People v. Dial (1915) 28 Cal. App. 704, 153 P. 970, 971: "So here, although the information in this case excludes the defendant from the excepted classes, the statement of such exceptions may be regarded as surplusage, and no evidence thereof was required to establish the charge. This was defensive matter of which the defendant might avail himself by evidence, if he so desired."

We believe the principle to be established, therefore, that, in prosecuting an offender under the Wright Act for the possession of liquor, it is unnecessary for the people either to aver or prove that the case does not fall within the exceptions. We are not unmindful of the authority of the cases above reviewed, but believe the reasoning that leads to our conclusion is authority more binding on us.

The only exception applicable to the cases before us is that set forth in section 33, tit. 2, in these words: "But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only and such liquor need not be reported, provided such liquors are for use only for the personal consumption of the owner thereof and his family residing in such dwelling and of his bona fide guests when entertained by him therein."

With respect to this provision, the following quotation from People v. Avila, 78 Cal. App. 415, 248 P. 693, 695 is of interest: "We think that section 33 of title 2 of the Volstead Act, relative to the possession of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, which may be lawful, refers to and must be held to refer to intoxicating liquors procured prior to the date mentioned in section 3."

Supporting the same conclusion is the case of People v. Jones (1926) 78 Cal. App. 554, 248 P. 964.

In three of the cases at bar, that is, People v. Ruddick, People v. Jones, and People v. Paar, it does not appear from the people's evidence how the liquor was acquired and no attempt was made by the defendants to show that it was possessed before the Volstead Act went into effect or that it was lawfully acquired since then. It follows that, irrespective of other evidence in the cases from which unlawful possession might be inferred, the convictions must stand.

[4] In the case of People v. Kate Coyne, the defense was not that the liquor was lawfully possessed, but that it was not possessed at all. The court's decision on this question of fact is not one to be disturbed by us.

The judgments appealed from must all be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BUCHANAN. SAME v. KOZINSKY. SAME v. WALLEN.

Cr. 114, 115, 77.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Nov. 9, 1929.

1. Intoxicating liquors ☞173.

Conviction and punishment may be had both for sale or transportation of liquor and for possession of same liquor.

2. Indictment and information ☞191(1/2).

Crime of sale or transportation of liquor includes that of possession necessary for, and incidental to, sale or transportation.

3. Intoxicating liquors ☞236(6 1/2, 20).

Facts held to justify conviction for possession of liquor as well as transportation.

The facts established that defendant had in his hands in garage in his own place a box similar to that subsequently found to contain liquor in his automobile, warranting inference that he had liquor in his possession prior to the act of transportation.

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Charles L. Bogue and Caryl M. Sheldon, Judges.

Charles R. Buchanan and Morris Kozinsky were convicted of possession and transportation of liquor, and Bennett Wallen was convicted for possession and sale of liquor, and they separately appeal.

Affirmed as to the first named defendant, and reversed in part and remanded for a new trial as to the other defendants.

MacDonald & Thompson, of Los Angeles, for appellants Buchanan and Kozinsky.

Harry A. Finkenstein, of Los Angeles, for appellant Wallen.

Lloyd S. Nix, City Prosecutor, Joe W. Matherly and Fred W. Fellows, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for the People.

BISHOP, J.

In the above-entitled cases the defendants respectively received sentences imposing fines or imprisonment for the possession of intoxicating liquors, and also were sentenced for either the sale or transportation of the same liquor under circumstances which they make the basis of their claim that they are being doubly punished for one offense.

In the Buchanan case the evidence shows that the defendant drove into the garage on the place of his residence, and he was seen there, after an interval, with a brown box in his hands. Shortly thereafter he drove away and was arrested, a box similar in size and color to that which he was seen to have had in the garage being in his automobile, containing two one gallon bottles of contraband liquor. As already noted, defendant was found guilty of both possession and transportation.

In the Kozinsky case the defendant was observed to drive his automobile up alongside of a parked car. He opened the door of his car, and a sack was transferred by the driver of the parked car from the defendant's car to his own. The defendant was thereupon arrested, and it was found that the sack contained prohibited liquor. He was fined both for possession and for transportation.

In the Wallen case the defendant was shown to have been behind the counter in a drug store when a woman came in and asked for a pint of alcohol. He disappeared from view for one or two minutes in the rear of the drug store, then returned, and exchanged a bottle wrapped in paper for $3.50. It was discovered that the bottle contained alcohol, the sale of which is prohibited by law. Following defendant's conviction, he was given a term in jail for the sale and a fine for the possession.

[1, 2] By both federal cases and the decisions of our own appellate courts, we believe the following principles applicable to these cases to be thoroughly established: One may be found guilty and receive punishment for sale or transportation of alcoholic liquors, and at the same time be found guilty and be punished for the possession of the same liquor. But, where the only possession shown by the evidence is that necessary for and incidental to the sale or transportation, the crime of sale or transportation includes that of possession, and but one punishment may be meted out. Three cases from the appellate courts of this state are controlling, and make unnecessary an academic discussion of the problem.

The case of In re Louis Chaus (June, 1928) 92 Cal. App. 384, 268 P. 422, 424, involves a dual charge of possession and transportation. The evidence disclosed that the liquor in question, after being transported to its immediate destination, was removed from its conveyance and placed either in or on a trunk in a garage. The court stated:

"We are not unmindful of those decisions upon the principle of which petitioner seeks to rely, holding that the bare apprehension of one driving a vehicle containing alcoholic liquor may not be punished both for possession and transportation, since the former is then a part of, and necessary to, the latter." (Sic.)

The court then calls attention to the location of the liquor after transportation, and concludes that the defendant was properly punished for two offenses, for it was self-evident "that such possession of the alcohol * * * was not necessary nor incidental to the transportation."

In the case of People v. Mazzola (July, 1929) (Cal. App.) 279 P. 211, 212, the defendant was found guilty of the operation and possession of a still. Punishment for both offenses was approved, the appellate court pointing out that there was evidence of possession prior to the beginning of operation. The court, however, further stated:

"Was the only act of possession of the still necessarily involved in that of operating the still? If the possession of which the appellant was found guilty was necessary and incidental only to that of operating the still, then he was guilty of but one offense, and it cannot be carved into pieces whereby to inflict double punishment. Schroeder v. United States (C. C. A.) 7 F.(2d) 60, and cases there cited. If, however, there was possession for a substantial period of time which was not necessarily incident to the operation of the proscribed utensils, the appellant could be found guilty of both offenses. In re Chaus, 92 Cal. App. 384, 268 P. 422, and cases there cited."

It may be argued, in view of the fact that both of the cases just noted reach the conclusion that the evidence disclosed two separate offenses, that they are therefore not authority for the conclusion that, if the possession is incidental to the transportation (or operation, in the case of a still), the facts constitute but one offense. This criticism cannot be made of the most recent case in this state on the subject, that of People v. Clemett (Sup. Ct., Sept. 1929) 280 P. 681, 682.

In this case our Supreme Court had before it a judgment imposing penalties for the operation and also for the possession of a still. The evidence, the court said, confirmed its interpretation of the allegations of the information that "the possession and control period is included in the period of operation, inasmuch as possession and control were incidental to operation."

The conclusion of the court was that only the judgment based on the charge of operation could stand—that based on possession must be reversed. Of particular interest to us is the following discussion of the court:

"The same principles applied and reasoning adopted by courts generally in distinguishing the two offenses of possession and transportation are applicable to the instant case.

"In Schroeder v. United States (C. C. A.) 7 F.(2d) 60, 65, the rule is well stated: 'Possession for a substantial time, and followed by transportation, might constitute two distinct offenses, just as possession for a substantial time, followed by a sale, might amount to two distinct offenses. But, where the only possession shown is that which is necessarily incidental to the transportation, the offense is single, and not double.'"

The Schroeder Case quoted by our Supreme Court is a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Second Circuit. Two decisions in harmony with it have been rendered by the court of the first circuit. Brief quotations will suffice:

"* * * There was no such separate possession and transportation as to constitute two offenses." Segurola v. U. S. (C. C. A. 1926) 16 F.(2d) 563, 566.

"The testimony did not disclose any possession which was not incidental to transportation." Brown v. U. S. (C. C. A. 1926) 16 F. (2d) 682, 684.

We may conclude, therefore, that it is now the law of this state that, where it appears as a fact that the liquor which the defendant is found to have transported was in his possession for any period prior to the beginning of the operation of transportation or following its completion, he may be found guilty of two offenses, transportation and possession, and be punished for both. Where the only possession shown, however, is that necessary for and incidental to transportation, a penalty imposed for the transportation precludes the possibility of further punishment for possession.

With respect to sale and possession, we are aware of no case considered by the higher courts of this state. We are unable, however, to distinguish any difference in principle between such a case and that of operation and possession of a still or the transportation and possession of liquor. A similar conclusion has been reached by the federal courts. In Miller v. United States (C. C. A. 6th, 1924) 300 F. 529, 534, the court said:

"* * * In this case the only possession shown was that which temporarily came to Miller for the purpose of completing by delivery the sale which he was making."

And in Woods v. United States (C. C. A. 8th, 1928) 26 F.(2d) 63, 65, the court stated:

"Though there was substantial evidence of possession as charged in count 1, yet there was no evidence of possession under that count except of possession incidental to the sale covered by count 2. * * *

"This being the state of the evidence as to possession under count 1, the judgment as to that count should be set aside as involving double punishment, first, for the sale; second, for possession incidental to the sale. This is not allowable."

The federal Supreme Court is some times referred to as having rendered an opinion inconsistent with this conclusion in the case of Albrecht v. United States (1927) 273 U. S. 1, 47 S. Ct. 250, 254, 71 L. Ed. 505. A careful reading of the case discloses that it is in entire harmony with the conclusion we have reached, as will be noted from the following quotation, the emphasis being ours:

"One may obviously possess without selling, and one may sell and cause to be delivered a thing of which he has never had possession, or one may have possession and later sell, as appears to have been done in this case. The fact that the person sells the liquor which he possessed does not render the possession and the sale necessarily a single offense."

Applying these principles to the cases in hand, we conclude as follows:

The fact that defendant Buchanan had in his hands in the garage on his own place a box similar to that subsequently found to contain liquor in his automobile forms the basis for an inference which the jury could reasonably draw that he had liquor in his possession prior to the beginning of the act of transportation. The fact that the premises were his own distinguishes this case from that of Schroeder v. United States, supra, in a particular evidently deemed of significance by the court in the Schroeder Case, for the court there points out:

"There is no evidence that the accused lived on the premises" (a five-story tenement building).

[3] We conclude, therefore, that the facts in the Buchanan case justify a conviction of possession as well as transportation. Judgment is therefore affirmed.

There appears no evidence of possession in the Kozinsky case showing possession not involved in the process of transportation. The judgment in that case therefore must be reversed as to count II; the cause remanded for a new trial as to count II.

In the Wallen case there is no proof of possession other than that incident to the sale. The judgment must be affirmed as to count I (sale) and reversed as to count II (possession); the cause remanded for a new trial as to count II.

Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McLUCAS, P. J.

The defendant was charged with violation of a city ordinance of South Gate by distributing or throwing upon private porches in said city a notice of commercial advertising, to wit, the Down Town Shopping News, and was adjudged guilty. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

It was stipulated at the trial by plaintiff and defendant that their respective witnesses, if called, would by their testimony establish the following facts: That the Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News is a publication issued and published twice each week, and is composed of advertisements inserted by reputable firms and corporations engaged in the business of selling dry goods, jewelry, furniture, household equipment, and similar merchandise, in the city of Los Angeles and vicinity, and style notes in respect thereof; that said publication does not contain any matter which by any possibility could be construed as lewd, obscene, or scandalous, or injurious to the public health, morals, safety, or welfare; that said publication is not capable of being entered as second-class matter under the provisions of the United States Post Office regulations of March 3, 1879, and other United States statutes; that the city of South Gate at all times mentioned was a municipal corporation of the state of California, of the sixth class; that on or about the 29th day of September, 1928, the city clerk of the city of South Gate issued to Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation, the publisher of said publication, a license to transact the business of passing bills in the city of South Gate for the term of one year from the 1st day of October, 1928, to the 30th day of September, 1929, inclusive; that the defendant St. John at all times was the agent of said Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation, authorized and employed by said corporation to distribute its said publication pursuant to said business license; that on August 20, 1929, the city of South Gate duly enacted Ordinance No. 157 amendatory to Ordinance No. 155; that said Ordinance No. 157 provided: "That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to distribute or throw upon any street, alley or public place or upon any private yard, lawn, driveway, sidewalk, porch or steps of any residence or upon or in any part of any structure or upon any vacant property in said City of South Gate, any advertising sample, handbill, dodger, circular, booklet, or other notice of commercial advertising, provided that nothing in this Section shall prohibit the distribution and delivery of any newspaper which is capable of being entered as second class matter under the provisions of the United States Post Office regulations of March 3rd, 1879, and other United States Statutes."

That on the 17th day of July, 1929, on or before the effective dates of said Ordinances No. 155 and No. 157, Mrs. H. A. Schomer, residing in the said city of South Gate, made, executed, and delivered to Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation her request as follows: "Please deliver at my residence regularly the Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News, and occasional special announcements by Shopping News advertisers, it being understood and agreed that this service is entirely free, with no obligation of any kind on my part."

That subsequent to the effective dates of the ordinances hereinabove referred to, defendant has not delivered in the city of South Gate any publication of the Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News, or other advertising matter, except to the residences of persons who have theretofore executed and delivered requests in like form to the request executed and delivered by the said Mrs. Schomer; that on the 21st day of September, 1929, the defendant, acting as the agent of the Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation, pursuant to the said request of

Mrs. H. A. Schomer, which said request has not been revoked or canceled, delivered to the residence of said Mrs. H. A. Schomer, in said city of South Gate, by throwing upon the porch thereof a copy of the publication of the Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News Corporation, to wit, the "Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News," issued under date of September 23, 1929.

It is the contention of the appellant that said ordinance does not prohibit the distribution of a publication of the character of the Los Angeles Down Town Shopping News by delivering copies thereof to private residences of persons who have requested such delivery, and, secondly, that if said ordinance does prohibit such distribution, it is to that extent unconstitutional and void.

[1-4] Deeming the ordinance sufficient in its terms to prohibit the distribution of notices of commercial advertising upon private porches, in the city of South Gate, to all persons, whether such persons have requested such delivery or not, we proceed immediately to a discussion as to whether said ordinance is unconstitutional and void as to appellant. The Constitutions of the United States and of the state of California guarantee certain fundamental rights and, among others, that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It is to be conceded that advertising, as urged by appellant, is a lawful and useful occupation, and, as such, is a property right secured by the fundamental law. A statute prohibiting, regulating, or interfering with private business can be upheld only under the police power, and the police power can be rightfully exercised only when the statute in question is for the protection of the public health, the public safety, the public morals, or the general welfare. It is always a judicial question whether any particular regulation of the right to pursue a lawful and useful occupation is a valid exercise of the legislative power. Ex parte Drexel, 147 Cal. 764, 82 P. 429, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 588, 3 Ann. Cas. 878; Frost v. City of Los Angeles, 181 Cal. 22, 183 P. 342, 6 A. L. R. 468; Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 234, 77 P. 924, 66 L. R. A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82, 1 Ann. Cas. 428; In the Matter of the Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 P. 427.

[5] By the great weight of authority, the enactment of reasonable ordinances regulating or prohibiting the distribution of handbills, circulars, samples, and other advertising matter, in such manner as will ordinarily result in the littering of streets, sidewalks, or other public places, constitutes a valid exercise of the police power. McQuillin, Municipal Corporations (2d Ed.) vol. 3, § 987, note 22 A. L. R. 1484. In Wettengel v. Denver, 20 Colo. 552, 39 P. 343, 344, it was held that an ordinance providing that no person shall hand or offer to any traveler or other person on any public street or place, any handbill, advertisement, circular, or other thing of such nature or character that the person taking the same will naturally or probably throw or deposit the same so as to litter or obstruct the street or place, or where the same may be or become calculated to frighten horses or other animals, is reasonable as protecting the public in its right to the free and safe use of the highways of the city by tending to keep them clean, and as preventing the possible frightening of horses. The decision was limited to the distribution of handbills or circulars of the character described in the ordinance, and the court said: "If the object of this ordinance is to prohibit the distributing to travelers on the street of any circular or hand bill, irrespective of its character, it might be held unreasonable, and come within the principle announced in the case of People v. Armstrong, 73 Mich. 288, 41 N. W. 275, 2 L. R. A. 721, 16 Am. St. Rep. 578."

In People v. Armstrong the ordinance provided in substance, that no person shall distribute circulars, handbills, or advertising cards of any description in or upon any of the public streets and alleys. The defendant was distributing cards one and one-half by two inches in size announcing Y. M. C. A. meetings, to persons only who expressed a desire for the same, and was found guilty of violating the ordinance. The ordinance was held unreasonable and too broad in its terms, but the court held that miscellaneous throwing to the winds of handbills, circulars, or advertising cards would not only litter up the streets and become a nuisance, but would tend to frighten teams and horses and great danger might be apprehended to life and limb.

In Philadelphia v. Brabender, 201 Pa. 574, 51 A. 374, 58 L. R. A. 220, it was held that an ordinance forbidding any one "to cast, or place in the streets of the city, or on the footways thereof, or into the vestibules or yards, or upon the porches of any dwellings or other building within the limits of the city, any paper, advertisement, hand bills, circulars or waste paper," excepting newspapers or circulars in envelopes, did not interfere with the right to acquire, possess, and protect property, as interfering with the advertisement of business, and that the provision did not make invidious discrimination by excepting newspapers and circulars in envelopes. 22 A. L. R. 1486. It was claimed that so far as the ordinance related to the casting of advertisements, circulars, handbills, and waste papers into the vestibules of dwellings, it was invalid. The court said: "It is obvious, however, that the reason upon which the ordinance rests is not merely that the casting of these fugitive papers in the places described is an annoyance to the owners of the premises, but that the wind catches them up and casts them into the streets, where they lie or are blown about, to the annoyance and inconvenience of the general public. This is liable to happen not only to papers cast into the yards and upon the porches, but also, although perhaps in a less degree, to those cast into the vestibules of city dwellings."

In Re Anderson, 69 Neb. 686, 96 N. W. 149, 150, 5 Ann. Cas. 421, in holding an ordinance valid and constitutional which declared it unlawful for any person to circulate or distribute or scatter about, or to hand to any person upon a public street, etc., any dodgers, handbills or circulars, the court said: "The ordinance in question is manifestly a police regulation intended to further the public health and safety by preventing the accumulation of large quantities of waste paper upon the streets and alleys, which might occasion danger from fire, choke up and obstruct gutters and catch-basins, and keep the streets in an unclean and filthy condition. A police regulation, obviously intended as such, and not operating unreasonably beyond the occasions of its enactment, is not invalid simply because it may affect incidentally the exercise of some right guaranteed by the Constitution. In all matters within the police power some compromise between the exigencies of public health and safety and the free exercise of their rights by individuals must be reached. The test in such cases is whether the regulation in question is a bona fide exercise of the police power or an arbitrary and unreasonable interference with the rights of individuals under the guise of police regulation."

In People v. Horwitz (Mag. Ct.) 140 N. Y. S. 437, 439, an ordinance providing "that no person shall throw, cast or distribute in or upon any of the streets, avenues or public places, or in front yards or stoops, any hand bills, circulars, cards or other advertising matter whatsoever" was held a valid exercise of the police power which applied to the distribution of circulars folded in newspapers which were sold on the streets.

We have reviewed all of the authorities which have been cited in the briefs of able counsel, and find that in at least two of these cases the ordinances prohibited, as in the case at bar, throwing circulars, handbills, or advertisements upon private porches. Philadelphia v. Brabender, and People v. Horwitz, supra. In Philadelphia v. Brabender a provision of the ordinance forbidding the casting of advertisements into the vestibules of dwellings was held valid. In People v. Horwitz, while the ordinance was held valid, the defendant was charged with distributing advertisements upon the public sidewalks, and the provision of the ordinance prohibiting distributing or casting advertisements upon private porches was not discussed.

Appellant urges that the Philadelphia ordinance was regulatory only, in that no distinction was made between commercial advertising and circulars and pamphlets devoted to political or religious purposes, and it permitted the distribution of any matter inclosed in an envelope, while the South Gate ordinance prohibits the distribution only of commercial advertising. We do not interpret the South Gate ordinance as prohibiting the distribution of commercial advertising. It merely regulates such distribution. Nothing in the ordinance forbids the distribution of such matter personally to any person in any dwelling or other private building in said city. The ordinance merely forbids throwing or distributing in public places, or in yards, or other places where such distribution is likely to result in the littering of public places. The ordinance does not even prevent the deposit of such advertising matter in a secure box or receptacle provided for the receipt of such matter. Again, the ordinance provides that nothing therein shall prohibit the distribution and delivery of any newspaper which is capable of being entered as second-class matter under the provisions of the United States Post Office regulations. Such newspapers would, in all probability, contain commercial advertising.

Appellant contends that the South Gate ordinance is not intended to prohibit isolated distribution here and there in the particular community, but the record shows that this is not a case of isolated distribution. The complaint charges the defendant with throwing upon private porches in said city a notice of commercial advertising, to wit, the Down Town Shopping News. The complaint does not charge an isolated offense. The statement on appeal shows that said publication is issued twice each week, that defendant is employed to distribute said publication in the city of South Gate, that on September 21, 1929, defendant threw a copy of said publication upon the porch of Mrs. H. A. Schomer, in said city, and that subsequent to the effective dates of said ordinance defendant has not delivered in said city any copy of said publication or other advertising matter except to the residences of persons who had theretofore executed and delivered requests in like form to that executed and delivered by the said Mrs. H. A. Schomer. It is clearly apparent from the whole record that this is not a case of isolated distribution.

[6, 7] Appellant argues that only ordinances regulating or prohibiting the distribution of advertising matter in public streets or places can be upheld as a valid exercise of the police power, but in view of the authorities cited, we are not prepared to hold that the enactment of a reasonable ordinance regulating or prohibiting the distribution of circulars, pamphlets, or other advertising matter in such manner as will ordinarily result in the littering of streets or other public places, does not constitute a valid exercise of the police power. The casting of such advertising matter on private porches is quite as likely to result in the littering of public streets or places by such advertising matter being blown by the winds, or kicked onto the sidewalk and the streets, as if such matter had been directly thrown or distributed in such public places. Nor do we feel that the fact that the householder requests the delivery of such advertising renders less likely the littering of such public places by throwing such pamphlets on private porches. The winds do not await the convenience of the householder in removing such pamphlets to a secure place; in fact, it is a matter of common knowledge that in the absence of the householder, or even without such absence, many copies of advertising publications are left on private yards and porches, with the result that such matter is blown about as if it had been cast to the four winds, and public streets and places are littered thereby. It may well be that in so far as said ordinance prevents the distribution of said advertising matter to persons in residences, stores, or other private places, expressing a willingness or desire for the same, it could not be sustained as constitutional. In our opinion, appellant does not bring himself within such kind of distribution by throwing advertising matter on private porches at the request of the householder, where such distribution is likely to result in littering public streets and places.

[8] Finally, appellant claims that said ordinance is unconstitutional and void, in that it denies to the defendant the equal protection of the laws, and arbitrarily discriminates against the defendant and other persons engaged in the delivery and distribution, in the city of South Gate, of publications containing commercial advertisements but incapable of being entered as second-class matter under the provisions of the United States Post Office regulations, in favor of persons engaged in the distribution and delivery in the city of South Gate of circulars, pamphlets, and publications containing political or religious advertisements, or publications containing commercial advertisements but capable of being entered as such second-class matter. Even if an ordinance regulating the distribution of pamphlets devoted to religious or political purposes could be so drawn as not to interfere with the constitutional guaranty of the right of free speech, surely it is not for the defendant to say the act is void because it does not prohibit other acts equally as mischievous as the acts prohibited. Evidently, in the judgment of the municipal authorities, there was not the same necessity for regulating the distribution of pamphlets and circulars other than those containing commercial advertising.

In City of Philadelphia v. Brabender, supra, the court held that there was no discrimination impairing equal rights in an ordinance prohibiting the casting of advertisements in vestibules of dwellings, though newspapers and addressed envelopes were excepted. The court said: "Nor can we see that an invidious discrimination is made against any one by the ordinance. All persons are treated alike and subject to the same restrictions. True, the ordinance exempts from its operation newspapers and addressed envelopes, but evidently not for the purpose of favoring those who advertise in that way, but because in the judgment of the municipal authorities, there was not the same necessity for prohibiting the delivery of newspapers and addressed envelopes to the persons for whom they are intended in that way. This discriminates against no persons or class of persons, and surely it is not for the defendant to say that the ordinance is void because it does not prohibit other acts equally as mischievous as the acts prohibited. 'The discriminations which are open to objection are those where persons engaged in the same business are subjected to different restrictions, or are held entitled to different privileges under the same conditions. It is only then that the discrimination can be said to impair that equal right which all can claim in the enforcement of the laws.' Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 S. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145. The limitations of the powers conferred upon municipal corporations are that they must be exercised in a reasonable, lawful and constitutional manner. 'If these limitations are not transgressed courts cannot interfere with the ordinances of the municipality, for to the mayor and council must be left a reasonable discretion, and for the proper and wholesome exercise thereof they are accountable not to the courts, but to the people.' O'Maley v. Borough of Freeport, 96 Pa. 24, 42 Am. Rep. 527. 'Where the municipal legislature has authority to act, it must be governed, not by our, but by its own discretion; and we shall not be hasty in convicting them of being unreasonable in the exercise of it.'"

For like reasons, we see no discrimination or denial of the equal protection of the laws in the ordinance now before us.

The problems presented to us for solution are not altogether free from difficulty. If the ordinance were to be so construed as to prohibit the distribution of advertising matter personally, or in boxes or receptacles, or in any other manner whatsoever, which is not likely to result in the littering of public streets or places, it would affect adversely only persons who make such distribution, and the record does not show that defendant made such kind of distribution. The discrimination between newspapers and all other sorts of commercial advertising is upheld in Philadelphia v. Brabender, supra. If an improper discrimination is made by the classification of newspapers into those which can be entered as second-class mail matter and those which cannot be so entered, it affects adversely only persons who distribute newspapers of the class last mentioned. Defendant is not such a person. The whole ordinance cannot be declared invalid because of its possible defects in these respects, and the defendant, who is not within either provision which would be so condemned, cannot be heard to object to them. In re Cardinal, 170 Cal. 519, 523, 150 P. 348, L. R. A. 1915F, 850.

[9] On the whole, it must be said that the case raises some doubts as to the validity of the ordinance in all respects, yet it is a settled rule that the power of the judiciary to declare an ordinance unconstitutional should never be exerted except when the conflict between it and the Constitution is palpable and incapable of reconciliation. If there is a doubt only as to the constitutionality of the ordinance, it is the duty of the court to resolve the doubt in favor of its constitutionality, and uphold it. 5 Cal. Jur. 612, 613, 633, 634 and cases cited; Bayley v. Garrison, 190 Cal. 690, 696, 214 P. 871.

We conclude that said ordinance is not unconstitutional and void as to appellant. The judgment is ordered affirmed.

Appeal from Recorder's Court, City of Montebello; A. F. Roach, City Recorder.

K. M. Stewart was convicted of driving an automobile forty miles per hour in a twenty-mile zone, and he appeals.

Paul G. McIver, of Montebello, for appellant.

Louis H. Burke, of Montebello, for the People.

SHAW, J.

The defendant was convicted on a charge of driving an automobile forty miles per hour in a twenty-mile zone, and appeals from the judgment. The complaint, which was in substantially the language just used in stating it, is inartificially drawn, but no point is made on this appeal in regard to it, and we proceed on the assumption that it is sufficient.

All of the points specified as grounds of appeal resolve themselves into the contention that the trial court did not follow the provisions of section 155 of the California Vehicle Act, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 548, § 70), and for that reason it had no jurisdiction to render a judgment of conviction. The respondent has also raised the question whether this section of the act is constitutional. But in view of the conclusion to which we have come as to its interpretation, we do not deem it necessary for the purposes of this case to express any opinion on the constitutional question.

Section 155, after defining and prohibiting speed traps, provides:

"Every officer when on duty for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act shall be dressed in a full distinctive uniform, and no officer shall use an automobile for patrolling public highways in the performance of such duty, unless such automobile is painted a distinctive color such as may be determined upon by the division of motor vehicles.

"In any prosecution under this act upon a charge involving the speed of a vehicle, any officer or officers arresting or participating or assisting in the arrest of the person so charged shall be incompetent as a witness or witnesses if any speed trap was used in such arrest, or when an automobile was used by such officer or officers in violation of the provisions of this act, or the officer or officers were not in full uniform, and the court shall be without jurisdiction to render a judgment of conviction upon the testimony procured by the use of a speed trap or by any such officer or officers so using an automobile not in conformity with the act or not in full uniform."

This case requires an interpretation of this section only as it relates to the use of an automobile by officers, and the questions arising are whether the provisions in regard thereto apply to all officers who may chance to be on a public highway and there arrest a defendant for speeding, or only to those who are patrolling the public highways for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the act; and also whether the burden of showing the facts in this matter rests upon the prosecution or the defense.

[1-3] To the first question stated, the provisions of section 155 afford a ready answer. The testimony of arresting officers is to be excluded "when an automobile was used by such officer or officers in violation of the provisions of this act." All other cases are to be governed by the general rules of evidence, which view an officer in the same light as a private citizen, and permit the testimony of either as to any fact of which he has knowledge. To discover what is a violation of the provisions of this act, we look at the preceding sentence of section 155, and there see that "no officer shall use an automobile for patrolling public highways in the performance of such duty" (that is, the "duty for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act," mentioned in the previous part of the sentence), "unless such automobile is painted a distinctive color such as may be determined upon by the division of motor vehicles." That is, the limitation on the testimony of an arresting officer applies only to cases where such officer was at the time of the arrest patrolling public highways for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the act, and in such cases excludes his testimony only if, in the performance of that duty, he used an automobile not painted the distinctive color designated by the division of motor vehicles. The provision under consideration was clearly not intended to apply to a case where an officer may have been on a highway for some purpose disconnected with the vehicle act, e. g., the pursuit of criminals or his own private affairs, and does not forbid him to turn aside from such a purpose in order to arrest a speeder. Such a casual arrest does not, of itself, require the conclusion that the officer was patrolling public highways for the purpose of enforce-ing the vehicle act. Any broader construction of this limitation than we give it would ignore some of the words of the statute, contrary to the well-known rule of statutory construction that: "It is fundamental that, if possible, a statute or code section should be construed so as to give meaning and effect, not only to the statute or code section as a whole, but to each and every part thereof, i. e., to every word and clause, and certainly to every distinct or coordinate provision or section. * * * Words should never be considered unnecessary and surplusage, if a reasonable construction can be adopted which will give force to and preserve all the terms of the statute." 23 Cal. Jur. 758, 759.

[4-6] Upon whom rests the burden of showing the facts which disclose whether the arresting officer violated the provisions of the act? Appellant contends that the prosecution must make this proof as a foundation for introducing the testimony of the officer, relying on the concluding provision of the section that the court shall be without jurisdiction to render a judgment of conviction on the testimony of an officer who has violated the law, and the rule that the jurisdiction of an inferior court will not be presumed, but must be established by the party relying on it. The rule referred to is well established, but we do not think it applies to the present case in the manner claimed by appellant. The jurisdiction of the trial court over the case was shown, within the meaning of this rule. Section 155 does not declare that an officer who is using an automobile in violation of its terms shall not arrest a speeder, or that one so arrested shall not be prosecuted, or that any court shall not have jurisdiction of a criminal proceeding against him. The jurisdiction of the trial court attached to this case upon the filing of a complaint charging an offense of which jurisdiction is conferred by law upon it and the bringing of the defendant before it (Roberts v. Police Court, 185 Cal. 65, 195 P. 1053; Fleming v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 344, 238 P. 88), and that jurisdiction continued at least through the trial and until judgment. The general rule is that a court which once acquires jurisdiction of a cause retains it until the cause is disposed of. The utmost effect of the provision relied on by appellant, assuming that it is valid and the word "jurisdiction" is used in its ordinary sense, is to divest the court of its jurisdiction when a lack of competent evidence appears at the time of judgment. In such a situation we think the presumption as to the continuance of an existing condition (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32) may be applied even to the jurisdiction of an inferior court, and since the court had jurisdiction of the case at the beginning and through the trial, it should be presumed that such jurisdiction continued, unless and until the contrary is shown.

[7, 8] The exclusionary rule of section 155 goes to the competency of the arresting officer as a witness under the conditions stated and is similar in nature and effect to the rules declaring that other witnesses occupying certain relations to the parties, or to the facts, are not competent, such as attorneys, physicians, clergymen, husband and wife, etc. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1880, 1881. In fact, the similar provision excluding an arresting officer's testimony in case of a speed trap, contained in the 1923 amendment of section 155 (St. 1923, p. 567), was likened to these other exclusionary rules in Fleming v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 344, 351, 238 P. 88. As to all such rules making witnesses incompetent as to particular facts or under particular conditions, the burden is on the party asserting a witness' incompetency to show it, unless such a showing already appears in the record. 5 Jones on Evidence (2d Ed.) § 2085; 28 R. C. L. 448; People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 44 P. 186; People v. Tyree, 21 Cal. App. 701, 706, 132 P. 784; People v. Harden, 24 Cal. App. 522, 523, 141 P. 1075; People v. Holloway, 28 Cal. App. 214, 218, 151 P. 975. "A person offered as a witness is presumed to be competent, if he appears to be of sufficient age and mental capacity, and the burden rests upon the objecting party to show incompetency by a preponderance of evidence." 40 Cyc. 2239.

[9] "Where a witness is incompetent to testify at all, the objection to his competency must be made when he is offered as a witness and before he is sworn, and if not made then is waived, unless the grounds of incompetency become apparent only after the examination of the witness is commenced, in which case an objection must be taken at once, or it will be construed as waived. 40 Cyc. 2237.

[10] "The competency or incompetency of a witness may be made to appear by a voir dire examination, or outside evidence, or during the course of his own testimony. It is the right of the party against whom a witness is called to have him put on his voir dire and to question him in order to test his competency." 40 Cyc. 2240.

[11] The rules just stated are properly applicable to the provisions of section 155 declaring that arresting officers are incompetent as witnesses under certain conditions. These provisions are in the nature of exceptions to the general rule that all persons of sufficient age and intelligence are competent witnesses and the burden is on the defendant who claims that the officers are incompetent under this section to show the facts from which their incompetency arises.

It is obvious that the provision as to the jurisdiction of the court is merely ancillary to that rendering the officer's testimony incompetent, and is in the nature of a penalty to secure its enforcement. Hence, one who has failed to avail himself of the provision as to incompetency by making the proper showing should not be heard to assert a loss of jurisdiction. Even if we suppose that both the provision as to the evidence of officers and that as to the jurisdiction of the court are merely adjuncts to a general purpose of the Legislature to keep traffic officers on the highway as a means of repressing reckless and unlawful driving, as suggested in Fleming v. Superior Court, supra, in regard to the speed trap law, yet both provisions are in the nature of exceptions to the general rules as to competency and jurisdiction, and we think the burden is upon one who relies upon the existence of either exception to show it.

[12] In the case at bar, it appears from the record that at the beginning of the trial and before any witnesses were called or sworn, the defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, basing his objection on section 155 of the Vehicle Act, and this objection was overruled. It follows from what we have already said that there was no error in this ruling. The court had jurisdiction to proceed and to convict the defendant on any proper evidence. This general objection cannot be regarded as an objection to the competency of witnesses who had not yet been produced, and who were not named in the objection. After this objection was overruled two police officers of the city of Montebello were called and sworn, and upon their testimony alone the defendant was convicted. From the testimony of one of them, it appeared that they saw the defendant speeding and chased and arrested him, and that they were riding at the time on a public street, in a police car which was painted black; whereupon the defendant objected to any further testimony from the witness on the ground that he was incompetent under section 155, because the automobile was not painted as required by that section. This objection was overruled. The facts testified to by the witness did not show his incompetency, for the reason that it did not appear that he was patrolling the street for the purpose of enforcing the vehicle act. The defendant made no request to examine the witness further in this respect, and did not offer to show any further facts than the witness had stated. There was therefore no error in the ruling.

[13] The court in overruling one of the above-mentioned objections stated, as a reason for its action, that it had not received any official notice of the action of the motor vehicle department in designating white as the color to be used on automobiles subject to section 155. This was not a sufficient reason for the ruling. The act of the motor vehicle department, under section 155, in designating the distinctive color for automobiles, is a public act of the executive department of this state, and the courts must therefore take judicial notice of it under subdivision 3, section 1875, of the Code of Civil Procedure. No notice of such action is necessary to any court or person.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Intoxicating liquors ⇨134.

Manufacture of cider and fruit juices which are in fact nonintoxicating and for use in home is not offense (Wright Act; National Prohibition Act tit. 2, §§ 3, 29 [27 USCA §§ 12, 46]).

National Prohibition Act tit. 2, § 29 (27 USCA § 46), as adopted by the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), provides that penalties against manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to person for manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home, but such cider and fruit juices shall not be sold or delivered except to persons having permits to manufacture vinegar.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⇨236(13).

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction for possession of intoxicating liquor (Wright Act; National Prohibition Act tit. 2, §§ 3, 29 [27 USCA §§ 12, 46]).

The evidence disclosed that defendant had purchased a quantity of grapes, crushed them, and poured the juice into barrels where it was found, nothing was added to the juice, and it was not intoxicating, and was used only by defendant and his family.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⇨231.

Refusal, in prosecution for possession of liquor, to permit evidence to determine whether liquid resulting from crushed grapes was in fact intoxicating, held erroneous (Wright Act; National Prohibition Act tit. 2, § 29 [27 USCA § 46]).

4. Intoxicating liquors ⇨134.

Liquid made by adding water to jelly-like syrup obtained in market was not within exception in respect to manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices (Wright Act; National Prohibition Act tit. 2, §§ 3, 29 [27 USCA §§ 12, 46]).

The exception made to the general rule that no person shall manufacture or possess liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume is limited under National Prohibition Act tit. 2, § 29 (27 USCA § 46), as adopted by Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), to those who themselves have taken the steps whereby cider or fruit juice is obtained from the fruit, and does not include those who make use of fruit juice preparations manufactured by some one else.

On Rehearing.

5. Intoxicating liquors ⇨134.

"Juice" as used in law excepting manufacturer of nonintoxicating cider and fruit juice from penalties for manufacture of liquor is sap obtained by expression (National Prohibition Act tit. 2, § 29 [27 USCA § 46]).

6. Intoxicating liquors ⇨110.

Federal Prohibition Commissioner has no authority to make regulations in respect to state liquor law (Wright Act).

The Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) adopted only the penal provisions of the Volstead Act (27 USCA), and not the regulations which United States officers may adopt by way of interpretation or enforcement of that act.

7. Statutes ⇨219.

Departmental construction of statute cannot alter plain meaning thereof, but is of value only where meaning is doubtful.

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Chas. B. MacCoy, Leonard Wilson, and Charles L. Bogue, Judges.

BISHOP, J.

Recently we were called upon to hold (People v. Ruddick, 288 P. 45), that by the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), the mere possession of intoxicating liquor fit for beverage purposes was made a public offense, except as possession was authorized by the act under certain circumstances. In the three cases now before us, the defendants contend that their possession was authorized, each relying upon that portion of section 29, title 2, of the National Prohibition Act (27 USCA § 46), as adopted by the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), which reads as follows:

"The penalties provided in this chapter against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person for manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home, but such cider and fruit juices shall not be sold or delivered except to persons having permits to manufacture vinegar."

So far as we are aware, this provision has not received attention at the hands of any of the appellate courts of this state. It has been construed, however, in five federal cases, the first of which is United States v. Hill (D. C. Md. 1924) 1 F.(2d) 954, 956. The defendant was on trial charged with the manufacture and possession of wine and cider. It was agreed that the manufacture was authorized by title 2, section 29, if the liquor was not intoxicating. It was not disputed that the liquor was intoxicating tested by the definition contained in section 1, title 2, of the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 4); but the defendant proposed to prove that it was not, in fact, intoxicating. Should evidence directed to this question be admitted?

In support of its affirmative answer, the court advanced these cogent reasons:

"But it is obvious that by the concluding sentence of section 29 of the act, Congress intended that persons manufacturing nonintoxicating cider for use in their homes, and not for sale, should be in a class by themselves, at least in some particulars, otherwise the sentence has no meaning or use whatsoever. If it was intended to punish persons for manufacturing cider for use in their own homes, which contains more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, there was no necessity for the provision, for the act without the sentence already provided such punishment. If, on the other hand, it was intended by Congress that persons who made cider containing less than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume should not be subject to punishment, there was no need for the provision, for the reason that the other provisions of the act did not provide punishment for such person. The only reasonable explanation for singling out home manufacturers of cider and fruit juices for special mention in this section, to my mind, is that Congress did not intend to subject them to the strict provisions as to the alcoholic content of the product specified in section 1, but intended to prohibit the manufacture of cider and fruit juices for home use, which should be, in fact, intoxicating. If the section is so interpreted, then there is a reason for its insertion in the act."

The Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, came to a like conclusion, in Isner v. United States (1925) 8 F.(2d) 487, 488. The defendant, charged with unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor, had gathered a quantity of wild cherries and elderberries, had strained out the berries, and added some water. The concoction was found in his cellar. At the trial he offered to show that the liquid was, in fact, not intoxicating, but an objection to this evidence was sustained. Upon the hearing on appeal the government stipulated that the wine was not, as a matter of fact, intoxicating, although it did contain more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume. The court stated its conclusion in the following language:

"We therefore hold that in all such cases it is necessary to prove that such vinegar and fruit juices are in fact intoxicating before a conviction can be had.

"This view of this section is unanimously held by the court, and, as the writer of this opinion was a member of the lower house of Congress when this act was passed, he can say without doubt that the foregoing construction of this section was the intent and meaning of Congress. This provision now under consideration was not a part of the bill as it passed the House of Representatives, but was inserted in the Senate after a number of speeches had been made by persons complaining that the 'grandmother and housewife' were going to be 'penalized and made criminals' if they made blackberry cordials or blackberry wines for use in their own home. In order to meet such objection on the part of such critics of the bill, this provision was agreed upon and inserted in the Senate after a conference of members and Senators deeply interested in the passage of the act and the success of prohibition. A different interpretation than this one placed upon the act would be to totally disregard the plain language of the Congress, which inserted this provision in the Volstead Act for the purpose of making a different rule for conviction of persons who make nonintoxicating vinegar and fruit juices exclusively for their home uses."

Two contrary conclusions have appeared in reports of federal cases, and should be noted. One of these, United States v. Picalas (D. C. N. D. W. Va. 1928) 27 F.(2d) 366, was appealed, and the judgment reversed on the authority of the Isner Case. See Picalas v. United States (C. C. A. 4, 1929) 33 F.(2d) 1022.

The remaining federal case [In re Baldi (E. D. N. Y. 1929) 33 F.(2d) 973] arose from a petition for the return of twenty-six barrels of wine unlawfully seized. Title 2, section 29, was relied upon as authorizing the possession and therefore the return of the liquor which had been taken. The court held that the possession was not authorized under the section because the wine was intoxicating and because the great quantity involved demonstrated that it was possessed for commercial purposes and not for family use. As the wine was shown to contain 13.13 per cent. of alcohol by volume, it was plainly intoxicating in fact, but the court relied rather on the definition, not being satisfied to interpret section 29 as using the word intoxicating in a sense different from section 1. No attempt was made to explain the purpose to be served by the provision in section 29 if so interpreted, and we are constrained to follow the reasoning of the other federal cases.

[1] We conclude, therefore, that the last sentence of section 29 is one of the exceptions referred to in section 3, title 2, of the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 12), and that a person does not offend under the act, who manufactures, and, after manufacturing, possesses exclusively for use in his own home cider and fruit juices which are, in fact, nonintoxicating.

[2] The evidence in the case against Sinicrope is not sufficient to sustain the judgment when tested by the conclusion just expressed. From the state's case it appeared that the liquor in the possession of the defendant was wine or "what might be called grape juice or fruit juice." The evidence given on behalf of the defendant stands uncontradicted that some three weeks prior to his arrest he had purchased a quantity of grapes, crushed the grapes in his back yard, and poured the juice into the barrels, where it was found. Nothing was added to the grape juice, and it was, in fact, not intoxicating. It was used only by himself and his family, consisting of eight persons. In the premises the judgment against the defendant Sinicrope must be reversed, the cause remanded for a new trial.

[3] In People v. Patalano, the prosecution established that the defendant had in his possession some five barrels of wine. Defendant endeavored to prove that his possession was legal because within the provision of title 2, section 29 of the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 46) which we have considered. His testimony was that he had purchased some grapes and crushed them and placed the grape juice in these barrels. All attempts to introduce evidence to determine whether the resulting liquid was, in fact, intoxicating or not, were defeated by the rulings of the court. In view of the exception made by title 2, section 29, this ruling was incorrect, and the judgment is reversed, the cause remanded for a new trial.

In People v. Stoddard we have presented a somewhat different situation. A prima facie case of unlawful possession was established beyond doubt. By way of an endeavor to bring himself within the shelter of title 2, section 29, the defendant proved that the liquor he was charged with possessing was made by the process of adding water to a thick jelly-like syrup obtained in the market, the syrup being concentrated grape juice.

[4] We are of the opinion that the attempted defense fails. The defendant cannot say the liquor he possessed was fruit juice which he manufactured. If he has manufactured any product, he has done so by operating on a product manufactured by some one else. The raw article, fruit, from which fruit juices may be manufactured, was never in his hands. If any fruit juice was manufactured, it was done, not by him, but by those who made the grape juice which in turn was concentrated to make the syrup bought by the defendant in the market. We are convinced that the exception here made to the general rule that no person shall manufacture or possess liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume is limited to those who themselves take the steps whereby cider or fruit juice is obtained from the fruit, and does not include those who make use of fruit juice preparations manufactured by some one else.

It follows that the judgment in the case of People v. Stoddard should be affirmed.

Opinion on Rehearing in PEOPLE v. STODDARD.

PER CURIAM.

A petition by defendant for a rehearing, and an extensive brief in support thereof by amici curiæ, have been filed, and we have considered them, but we find therein no reason to change the conclusion stated in our opinion previously filed in this case. A great part of the petition and brief are devoted to the citation and discussion of authorities in support of the proposition that the word "manufacture" includes "the process by which a new product is made by combining materials which in themselves are the finished product of some other manufacturer." We have no quarrel with this proposition or the authorities by which it is supported. We do not hold, as suggested in the brief, that in every case "one who by his own effort produces an article or commodity cannot be deemed to be a manufacturer thereof unless in its production he uses only raw materials," if—as the brief apparently means but does not say—the term "raw materials" is defined to mean materials in the state in which nature produces them; nor does our decision depend upon any construction of the term "manufacture" so as to exclude defendant's operation therefrom. We do hold, however, that in the particular case of grape juice the raw material from which it is produced is necessarily the grapes, for reasons which we will presently state.

[5] It is declared in the brief that "to be a manufacturer of grape juice * * * one * * * may use * * * grape juice which has been prepared by another," but no explanation is given of how this may be accomplished. We think the same grape juice can be manufactured but once, and any further processes to which it may be subjected, although they be of a manufacturing nature, cannot constitute the manufacture of grape juice. A reference to the definition of the word "juice" is helpful to an understanding of the statute. That word is defined as follows: "The extractable fluid contents of plant cells or plant structures consisting of water holding sugar or other substances in solution." Webster's Dictionary. "The fluid part of animal or vegetable matter; especially the expressible watery matter in fruits, containing usually the characteristic flavor." Standard Dictionary. "The juice of vegetables or fruit is nothing but the sap obtained by expression. If the sap is subjected to heat and evaporation, the article thus produced is generally understood to be a different thing from the sap." Per Taft J. in Smith v. Rheinstrom (C. C. A. 6, 1895) 65 F. 984, 985. It follows from these definitions, and is in effect held in the case just cited, that the syrup or "concentrated grape juice" which defendant testified he bought and used in his operations was not grape juice. Undoubtedly it had at one time been grape juice, before it passed through the manufacturing process by which it was reduced to the "thick jellylike syrup" which defendant described, but it does not follow that it again became grape juice by the addition of water, and we cannot hold that it did, for two reasons. In the first place, the defendant, on whom was the burden of proof, made no showing that the fluid resulting from the addition of water to this syrup was the same either chemically or physically as the original grape juice; and we very much doubt if it was, in view of the results obtained in other processes of concentration and dilution, instances of which are canned or dried milk. In the second place, if it were possible by any sort of synthetic process to make a fluid identical with the juice extracted from grapes, it would not be grape juice by any of the foregoing definitions. It is an essential part of all of them that the fluid to be termed "juice" shall have been extracted or pressed from the fruit. This is not true of the fluid produced by the defendant. Some part of it had been so extracted, but not the added water which constituted four-fifths of its bulk.

Title 2, section 29, of the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 46), does not in terms except liquids equivalent to, or identical with, fruit juice, and we can see no reason to suppose anything of the kind was intended. In fact, a general consideration of the purposes of the act and of the exception leads us to a contrary conclusion. The general purpose of the act is to suppress the use of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and as incidental to that it was deemed necessary to define intoxicating liquors as including all those liquors which contain more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol, to prohibit all manner of dealings with such liquors whether for beverage purposes or not, with a few exceptions, and to surround the exceptions which might lead to any commercial exploitation with safeguards in the way of permits and regulations. No such safeguards were thrown around the manufacture of fruit juices under title 2, section 29. The purpose of that exception as stated in Ismer v. United States (C. C. A. 4, 1925) 8 F.(2d) 487, was to prevent the grandmother and housewife from being penalized and made criminals, if they made the excepted liquors for use in their own homes. It is evident to us that it was not intended thereby to open a path to any sort of commercial dealing, which with the profit urge continually back of it would be likely to lead to abuse of the privilege. If defendant's operation is permitted by law, no doubt manufacturing interests will arise to advertise and exploit the use of this grape syrup for the manufacture of so-called "grape juice." This would result in a situation quite different from that which would appear if the grandmothers and housewives, and the householders, who are also within the exception, were under the necessity of procuring the fruit and extracting the juice therefrom. Fruit juice may by fermentation be made intoxicating in fact, and the statute provides no means of checking up on the process or of discovering who are engaged in it, as it does in the case of all other permitted manufacturing operations. Congress may well have deemed such a condition harmless in case of the comparatively few persons who would go to the trouble of obtaining fruit and extracting the juice therefrom; but have thought that, if any one might merely buy fruit syrup and add water to it, the simplicity of the operation and the influence of advertising and sales pressure by the manufacturers of the syrups would increase the practice to such an extent as to aggravate greatly the difficulty of enforcing the law. We think that title 2, section 29, of the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 46), sanctions nothing of that kind, and that the term "fruit juices" is there used in the sense of the dictionary definitions so as to include only the fluid actually extracted from fruit. On account of this limited meaning of the term, the only raw material from which fruit juice can be manufactured is of necessity the fruit itself, although, as already stated, it is not generally true that manufacturing can be carried on only with materials provided by nature. The fluid which the defendant manufactured and possessed was therefore not fruit juice, and he was not protected in his possession of it by title 2, section 29, of the Volstead Act.

It is claimed that the conclusion thus stated is contrary to the decision in United States v. Hill (D. C. Md. 1924) 1 F.(2d) 954. On a careful reading of that case we find that this question was neither presented to, nor considered by, the court. The fact that the defendant had manufactured the liquor found in his possession was declared by the court to be undisputed and conceded, but the nature of the manufacturing operation does not appear from the report.

[6, 7] Our attention is also called to an instruction of August 6, 1929, addressed by the United States Prohibition Commissioner to his agents, directing them not to interfere with the use of grape concentrates in the home for the manufacture of fruit juices, and it is contended that this is a regulation having the force of law. We are here dealing with a law of the state of California, regarding which the Prohibition Commissioner, who is an officer of the United States, can have no authority to make regulations. Our statute, the Wright Act, has adopted only the penal provisions of the Volstead Act, not the regulations which United States officers may adopt by way of interpretation or enforcement of that act. Moreover, such departmental construction of the statute cannot alter the plain meaning of the statute, but is of value only where its meaning is doubtful. Hodge v. McCall, 185 Cal. 330, 334, 197 P. 86.

TIPTON v. TIPTON.
L. A. 11863.

Supreme Court of California.
May 6, 1930.

1. Divorce ⚡252, 286.

Where divorce is for cruelty, discretion of trial court in disposing of community property is not arbitrary and is subject to revision on appeal (Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1).

Under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1, when ground of divorce is extreme cruelty, community property must be assigned in such proportions as the court, from all facts of case and condition of parties, may deem just.

2. Divorce ⚡252.

Where divorce is for desertion, there is no discretion on part of trial court to divide community property other than equally (Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 2).

Under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 2, when ground for divorce is desertion, community property must be equally divided.

3. Divorce ⚡252.

When divorce is for cruelty, nonoffending party is entitled to more of community property than that awarded to one who is at fault (Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1).

Action for divorce by Florence Kathrine Tipton against Thompson Ramsey Tipton. Judgment for plaintiff. From a decree awarding all community property to defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Koenig & Brunton, Victor H. Koenig, and A. W. Brunton, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. L. Belt and E. S. Green, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

The plaintiff obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from her defendant husband on the grounds of desertion and extreme cruelty. Notwithstanding the findings that the defendant was guilty of desertion and extreme cruelty, the court allotted all of the community property, consisting of real estate of the value of $2,500 and an automobile, to the defendant husband. The plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll from that part of the interlocutory decree which awarded all of the community property to the defendant.

[1-3] The sole question for determination is this: May the trial court lawfully award all of the community property to the offending party when the divorce is granted on the grounds of desertion and extreme cruelty? The question must be answered in the negative. When the ground for the dissolution of the marriage is desertion, the community property must be divided equally. Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 2. When the ground is extreme cruelty, the community property must be assigned "in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case, and the condition of the parties, may deem just." Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1. But the discretion of the trial court in disposing of the community property under subdivision 1 is not an arbitrary one and is subject to revision on appeal. Civ. Code, § 148. When the divorce is granted on the ground of desertion alone, there is no discretion to divide the community property other than equally, and the plain inference to be derived from the foregoing Code sections is that when the divorce is granted on the ground of extreme cruelty the nonoffending party is entitled to more than that awarded to one who is at fault. Eslinger v. Eslinger, 47 Cal. 62; Quagelli v. Quagelli (Cal. App.) 277 P. 1089; 5 Cal. Jur. p. 358 et seq., and cases therein cited.

The evidence is not before us, consequently we are not in position to modify and affirm the judgment. That portion of the interlocutory decree appealed from is therefore reversed.

PACIFIC EMPLOYERS' INS. CO. et al. v.
INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION
et al.

L. A. 11767.

Supreme Court of California.

April 28, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 26, 1930.

Master and servant § 405 (6).

Evidence sustained finding of serious and willful misconduct of employer having employee operate unguarded saw injuring hand, authorizing award of penalty (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act § 6 (b), as amended).

PRESTON, and RICHARDS, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Leon S. Thompson, claimant, opposed by the Patterson-Ballagh Corporation, employer, and the Pacific Employers' Insurance Company, insurer. To review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation, the insurer brings certiorari.

Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; RICHARDS and SHENK, JJ., dissenting.

SEAWELL, J.

This cause presents a single question: Was the industrial, compensable injury sustained by respondent Leon S. Thompson caused by the serious and willful misconduct, within the meaning of section 6, subdivision b, of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 4749, pp. 1710, 1715 et seq.), of his employer, petitioner Patterson-Ballagh Corporation, a corporation? A statement of the case follows:

On October 31, 1928, said respondent Thompson, while performing duties arising out of and in the course of his employment by said corporation, sustained severe injuries to his hand by reason of its contact with a revolving circular saw. Petitioner Pacific Employers' Insurance Company, a corporation, the insurer of said employer, assumed liability for the normal benefits due said employee under said act. Upon hearing of the claim before the Industrial Accident Commission, however, that body found that said injury was proximately caused by the serious and willful misconduct of the employer and it therefore awarded said employee, in addition to a permanent disability of 34 per cent., or $2,518.72, the sum of $1,259.36, that is, an increased indemnity of 50 per cent. to be paid by said employer by reason of its said alleged serious and willful misconduct. Petitioners thereupon filed their application for writ of review. The main award is not disputed, but by the instant proceeding they seek to have annulled the latter portion thereof imposing said penalty of 50 per cent. Hence, as above stated, the question is whether, in the light of the evidence adduced upon the hearing and the provisions of said Workmen's Compensation Act, which permit the imposition of such a penalty, respondent Commission was warranted in finding said employer guilty of such serious and willful misconduct as justified them in assessing it. The facts are simple and the evidence is substantially without conflict.

Said employer had been engaged for some months in the manufacture of oil well specialties made of rubber. Shortly before the accident it undertook to install in its plant for the first time power-driven machinery. Mr. Patterson, the president of the corporation, purchased what he considered the best power-driven saw on the market for his purpose—a combined cross-cut and rip saw, so arranged that when in use the rip saw cutting edge could be raised to project through a slot in the table, but when not in use it could be lowered below the table surface. When in use it was unguarded and when not in use it was below the level of the stand and was harmless. Mr.

Patterson employed C. N. Dingle, an industrial engineer, to install said motor power machinery. He had been in the manufacturing business for some months prior to the injury suffered by the employee, Thompson. The saw as delivered was affixed to a stand which was a part of its equipment and was in readiness for action, but the saw proper was unguarded. Mr. Patterson, the employer, was asked the following questions upon the hearing, and gave the answers which follow:

"Q. * * * In other words, when it showed up on the job was it just what you expected? A. No, not in regards to guards, no.

"Q. Did you order at the time any guard or anticipate any guard for the rip saw? A. I anticipated guards, yes.

"Q. Did you discover the fact that there were no rip guards? A. Yes; that is correct.

"Q. Before it was used? A. Before it was used.

"Q. Did you at the time take any steps to remedy its then condition? A. Yes, I did.

"Q. What steps, if any, did you take?" To this question the witness stated that he "purposely" hired a man who represented that he understood saws and saw conditions and that he was the only man to handle the saw. The man to whom reference was made is Thompson, the employee, who by trade is a carpenter, but who professed to have some skill in the use of circular saws. The witness Patterson admitted that he knew as "of course" that there were certain rules adopted by the Industrial Accident Commission dealing with the standards of safety and guarding the equipment in his plant. The state of the evidence is such on the issue of his knowledge of safety requirements—if his failure to inform himself on that subject be a defense—that the Industrial Accident Commission, sitting as judges of the evidence, could well have found and undoubtedly did impliedly find from the testimony of Mr. Patterson, the president of said corporation, as well as from other testimony, that he had knowledge of the existence of "wood working safety orders" adopted by the Commission which required him to place a safety device on the saw; that no guard was practical is rebutted by the photographs of the saw as now used, which appears to be practical and at the same time affords protection to the workman who uses the saw. The testimony of the employee was that had the saw been guarded he would not have sustained the loss of his thumb and portions of two fingers. The evidence seems to sustain this conclusion.

C. N. Dingle, the engineer who installed said machinery, testified that none of the machinery was safeguarded for the reason that it was in the course of construction, and, as he continued, "we hadn't gotten to the safeguarding point yet. * * * At the time of getting the saw in, it was suggested that that would be another thing that we would have to do. * * * In my opinion there should be a safeguard on it [the saw]." He further testified that it was his intention to provide a safeguard for said rip saw. The machinery and saw were in operation about a week before the injury occurred. It seems clear that the Commission was fully justified in finding that the employer was careless and indifferent as to the safety of its employees. Its haste to set in motion its machinery before it was lawfully prepared to do so was the assumption of a hazard which it had no right to assume.

The room in which the saw was installed seems to have been small and quite crowded with lumber and other materials. As another employee entered the room the attention of Thompson was momentarily arrested from his employment and his thumb and fingers were amputated as above described. This circumstance may as likely happen to the most skillful mechanic as to one without skill. It was to insure against such fortuitous cases that the safeguarding of dangerous machinery was made mandatory.

Petitioners' insistence that no sufficient evidence appears in the record to sustain a finding of serious and willful misconduct on the part of the employer cannot be sustained, but must be overruled. "'Willfully,' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage." Sec. 7, subd. 1, Pen. Code. (Italics ours.)

The seriousness of the failure or refusal on the part of the employer to comply with the order of the Commission is self-evident. This case on principle is not distinguishable from Hoffman v. Dept. of Industrial Relations (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 974.

It is clear to us that the award must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; SHENK, J.

PRESTON, J.

I dissent. The evidence in this case, though sufficient to sustain the compensatory award, offers no justification whatsoever for the imposition of a 50 per cent. penalty for alleged serious and willful misconduct on the part of the employer, nor, in my opinion, is the case of Hoffman v. Dept. of Industrial Relations (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 974, controlling here.

The circumstances of each particular case, viewed in the light of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, must determine the question of whether the acts or omissions of an employer constitute serious and willful misconduct, "conduct which the employer either knew, or ought to have known, if he had turned his mind to the matter, to be conduct likely to jeopardize the safety of his employees." E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 184 Cal. 180, 188, 193 P. 105, 108, 16 A. L. R. 611.

In this case the record shows that Mr. Patterson, the president of the employer corporation, had purchased what he considered the best machine of its type on the market; that he was not familiar with such machinery and, therefore, took the precaution to employ an experienced industrial engineer to help him and to supervise its installation. It appears that this engineer had not found a guard for the saw which was acceptable when it was in operation, and, although he intended to try to guard it in some way, he knew of no absolute safeguard for it. He stated he had no hesitancy in ordering a man to operate it as it then stood. His views, of course, were followed by said employer, but, in this situation, such further steps were taken by it as Mr. Patterson felt might serve to insure the operator's safety. To this end he made certain that the operator he hired thoroughly understood saws. Not only this, but he consulted said operator on the subject. No objection was made to the saw being unguarded, but the operator did ask, as his workroom was congested, that no one else be allowed to enter it, and this request was promptly acceded to.

Serious and willful misconduct involves much more than mere negligence or even gross or culpable negligence. It contemplates actual knowledge, or that which in the law is esteemed to be the equivalent of actual knowledge, on the part of an employer that the thing which he is doing is wrong, coupled with a conscious failure to act to the end of averting injury; that is, it must appear that the circumstances surrounding the act or omission are such as "evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of." See E. Clemens Horst v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, and Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, 421, 185 P. 510.

It will be noted that in this case there is involved no intentional or willful violation on the part of the employer of any statute or safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission because the evidence shows that it had no knowledge of any requirement with respect to further guarding the piece of machinery in question. It is also clear that in the hiring of said experienced engineer and experienced operator and in its compliance with the suggestions offered by these persons, this employer gave thought to the exercise of reasonable care for the safety of its employees. There is no evidence whatsoever of a reckless disregard for their safety. In other words, I do not believe the record before us contains any justification whatever for the finding on the part of respondent Commission of such serious and willful misconduct on the part of said employer as should subject it to the penalty imposed. The award of the Commission to my mind, in so far as it undertakes to impose said 50 per cent. additional compensation penalty, should be annulled.

Description of property condemned in mass in summons complied with statute, where complaint contained description thereof in separate parcels; complaint and summons being served together (Code Civ. Proc. § 1245).

Proceedings for condemnation of property were instituted under Street Opening Act 1903, supplemented by Street Opening Bond Act 1911 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Acts 8198 and 8199). Section 6 of Act 8198, providing that condemnation proceedings should be governed by provisions of Code of Civil Procedure, made applicable Code Civ. Proc. § 1245, requiring a reference to complaint for a description of the respective parcels to be taken.

PRESTON, J.

The essence of this appeal is the claim that a certain interlocutory judgment of condemnation is void upon its face, which judgment was entered on the 22d day of June, 1926, pursuant to proceedings theretofore had by the city council of the city of Los Angeles under the Street Opening Act of 1903, supplemented by the Street Opening Bond Act of 1911 (Deering's Gen. Laws, Acts 8198 and 8199, p. 3309 et seq.), in an action instituted by said city in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles, entitled "The City of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, plaintiff, v. L. W. Blinn et al., defendants," No. 152083, against plaintiff here and a large number of other persons, all owning property interests within an area necessary to be taken for the widening and opening of Flower street from Washington street to Exposition boulevard, and for the prolongation of said street from Exposition boulevard to the intersection of Thirty-Eighth and Figueroa streets, in said city.

In said action, on January 20, 1925, plaintiff here was duly served with summons, to which was attached a copy of the complaint; it made default; later an award was made by referees which, without objection upon the part of plaintiff, was confirmed by the court; and later, on June 22, 1926, as above stated, said interlocutory judgment of condemnation was entered in due course. Soon thereafter an assessment covering the cost of the entire improvement, including an amount sufficient to pay plaintiff for its property so taken, was prepared and filed with the city council. A hearing was then had upon said assessment as filed, and at this juncture plaintiff for the first time appeared and objected to the confirmation of said assessment upon the ground that the council had no jurisdiction to fix, levy, or collect the same. Its protest was denied and the assessment was confirmed by the council. Within thirty days thereafter, to wit, on January 11, 1928, plaintiff commenced this action against the city of Los Angeles and the other defendants named to have said proceedings taken by the city council and by the board of public works declared invalid and to have issued an injunction against the collection of said assessment or any part thereof. Issue was joined, a trial had on the merits, and thereafter judgment was entered for defendants. Plaintiff has appealed, relying solely upon the ground first above set forth.

It is claimed that the interlocutory decree is void upon its face because the summons did not contain the elements required by statute, in that it failed to make "reference to the complaint for descriptions of the respective parcels" sought to be condemned in said action. Section 1245, Code Civ. Proc.

Section 6 of said act of 1903 (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 8198, p. 3313), referring to condemnation proceedings, provides: "Said action shall in all respects be subject to and governed by such provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure now existing or that may be hereafter adopted, as may be applicable thereto, except in the particulars otherwise provided for in this act." This, of course, makes applicable the provisions of both section 407 and section 1245 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is conceded that the complaint complied with the requirements of section 1244 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and an examination of the summons shows that it contained the names of the parties and a direction that the defendants appear and answer in the manner provided by statute or plaintiff would apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint. It further contained a description of the entire area, in one parcel, sought to be condemned to effectuate said improvement, and also contained the following language: "And you, and each of you, are hereby notified to appear and show cause why the property above described should not be condemned as prayed for in the complaint."

It is our conclusion that inasmuch as said summons contained a description of the property in mass, and the complaint contained a description thereof in separate parcels, copy of complaint and summons being served together, the last above-quoted reference in said summons was sufficient to fully comply with the said provision of section 1245 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring a reference to the complaint for a description of the respective parcels to be taken. This being our conclusion, it is unnecessary to discuss the other questions treated in the brief.

The judgment is affirmed.

CROCKER NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SAY et al.

1. Bills and notes  96.

That makers personally did not receive proceeds did not render note void for want of consideration, detriment to payee lending money being adequate consideration.

The bank whose stockholders executed note received the full benefit from the proceeds of the note which was given to another bank to evidence loan of money.

2. Evidence  418.

Extrinsic evidence is inadmissible to avoid liability of maker signing note in individual capacity, even if he was then another's agent.

3. Evidence ⇨418.

Refusal to make bank party defendant with stockholders executing note sued on held not error where note disclosed no agency.

4. Evidence ⇨418.

Admitting evidence of alleged agency for bank of directors signing notes individually for accommodation held error.

5. Bills and notes ⇨106.

Directors individually signing note could not avoid liability because bank receiving proceeds obtained money for ultra vires purpose, where lender did not participate (Bank Act 1909, § 37, as amended [St. 1923, p. 56]).

The directors, sued on note they executed to obtain money for their bank, contended that there was no liability on their part because of fact that money was obtained for the purpose of enabling bank to acquire stock of another bank in violation of Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 96) § 37, as amended (St. 1923, p. 56), which provides that no bank, except as otherwise provided therein, may purchase or invest its capital or surplus or money of depositors in corporate stock of any corporation unless purchase or acquisition shall be necessary to prevent loss to bank on obligation owned or on debt previously contracted in good faith.

6. Bills and notes ⇨59.

In absence of payee's fraud or deceit, it could only sue bank's stockholders and directors who executed note to obtain money for bank not party thereto (Civ. Code, § 3099).

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action on the following promissory note:

"$56,214.79 San Francisco, Cal. June 4, 1923.

"On demand, and if no demand be made, then six months after date, for value received in gold coin of the Government of the United States, I, we, or either of us, jointly or severally, promise to pay to the order of Crocker National Bank of San Francisco at its banking house in the city, Fifty-six thousand two hundred fourteen and 79/100 dollars, with interest from date at the rate of six per cent. per annum, until paid, payable quarterly—both principal and interest payable in like gold coin.

"W. H. Say

"Henry Ross

"Ivan C. McIndoo"

The note was executed under the following circumstances: The Valley Bank was a state bank doing business in Fresno. It was contemplating the purchase of the National Bank of Bakersfield for the purpose of establishing a branch at Bakersfield. The Valley Bank either owned or controlled 679 shares of the 1,000 shares of the Bakersfield bank. Before the transaction could be completed it became necessary to repair the capital assets of the Bakersfield bank to the extent of $56,214.79. The members of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Valley Bank discussed ways and means for securing the necessary funds, and it was decided to apply to the plaintiff bank for a loan for the required amount. The Valley Bank had an account with the plaintiff bank. The cashier of the Valley Bank was authorized to proceed to San Francisco to interview the proper officers of the plaintiff bank in an endeavor to obtain the loan. Thereafter the cashier of the Valley Bank had a conference with a vice president of the plaintiff bank at San Francisco at which time the application for the loan was made and the purposes for which the funds were to be used were fully explained to the officers of the plaintiff bank. The latter agreed to recommend the loan provided a note for the amount was signed by responsible and acceptable directors of the Valley Bank. The names of several members of the executive committee were mentioned and approved. The cashier of the Valley Bank then returned to Fresno. The note sued on was prepared and was signed by the defendants who were stockholders and directors of the Valley Bank and were members of said executive committee. On or about the date of the note, the cashier of the Valley Bank transmitted the note in the form above quoted to the plaintiff by mail with the request that the amount thereof be placed to the credit of the Valley Bank. This was done and the Valley Bank received the benefit of the amount of the note. The Valley Bank paid the interest on the note for a time. After due demand on the defendants and default in payment this action was commenced on May 26, 1924.

The defendants resisted the action on four grounds: (1) That there was no effective delivery of the note; (2) that the defendants received no consideration for the note; (3) that they signed the note solely as agents for their principal, the Valley Bank of Fresno, the real debtor, which facts were known to the plaintiff at the time; and (4) that the loan to the Valley Bank by the plaintiff was made for an illegal and unlawful purpose known to the plaintiff.

By their answer and by motion the defendants sought to have the Valley Bank made a party to the action on the ground that a complete determination of the controversy could not be had without its presence as a party. The motion was denied. Over the plaintiff's objection the court admitted evidence on all of the issues raised by the special defenses. Thereafter the court found that the defendants signed the note solely as agents and that the transaction was otherwise as contended by the defendants in this respect; that the Valley Bank itself received the entire proceeds of the loan, and therefore no consideration was received by the defendants; that the note was accepted by the plaintiff "for the purpose of evading the laws of the state of California concerning the purchase of the capital stock of one banking institution by another banking institution"; that the plaintiff knew that the proceeds of said loan were to be used by the Valley Bank in a transaction which involved the purchase by the Valley Bank of capital stock of the National Bank of Bakersfield; and that the plaintiff knew this to be a prohibited transaction.

[1] Delivery of the note is assumed in the findings of the court, and it is not now seriously questioned that the delivery to the plaintiff found to have been made by the cashier of the Valley Bank after the execution of the note by the defendants was not effective as such. The fact that the defendants personally did not receive the proceeds of the note would not, of course, render the note void for want of consideration. The detriment suffered by the plaintiff bank was adequate in that behalf. The first and second defenses therefore need not be further noticed.

The main grounds of the appeal are that the court erred in admitting evidence to contradict the defendants' liability on the note; that the competent evidence is insufficient to support the findings; and that the findings do not support the judgment.

[2, 3] Under some circumstances and in a proper action, extrinsic evidence may be introduced to establish the liability of a principal who is not a party to the contract (see Geary St., etc., R. R. Co. v. Rolph, 189 Cal. 59, 207 P. 539; Pacific Ready-Cut Homes, Inc., v. Seeber, 205 Cal. 690, 272 P. 579; Rubin v. Platt Music Co., 92 Cal. App. 203, 268 P. 396; 1 Cal. Jur. pp. 831 et seq.), but extrinsic evidence is not admissible to avoid the liability of the maker of a promissory note who signs in his individual capacity even though he was the agent of another at the time. Moreover, sufficient evidence of agency must appear on the instrument itself. Sayre v. Nichols, 7 Cal. 535, 539, 68 Am. Dec. 280; Hobson v. Hassett, 76 Cal. 203, 18 P. 320, 9 Am. St. Rep. 193; 19 Cal. Jur. pp. 823 et seq.; 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (6th Ed.) § 300; Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) §§ 1150, 1162; Story on Promissory Notes, § 68. The principle is so definitely settled with reference to negotiable instruments that further discussion is unnecessary. No contention could be made that the instrument sued on discloses the agency or shows that the defendants executed it for and on behalf of a principal. The court, therefore, did not err in refusing the defendants' request to make the Valley Bank a party defendant to the action.

[4] The record herein discloses a situation wherein the defendants were accommodation makers and the court erred in admitting in this action any evidence of their alleged agency. Without this evidence there would be no basis for the finding that the defendants signed solely as agents.

[5] This leaves for consideration the sufficiency of the evidence to support and the effect of the finding that the plaintiff accepted the note signed by the defendants for the purpose of evading the laws of the state of California concerning the purchase of the capital stock of one banking institution by another and that the plaintiff knew that the Valley Bank was procuring the money for an alleged unlawful purpose. In this connection it is to be noted that the court found that the money loaned by the plaintiff was to be used for three different purposes: First, to repair the capital assets of the National Bank of Bakersfield; second, to purchase the assets of that institution; and third, to enable the Valley Bank to buy the stock of that institution. The plaintiff therefore urges a fatal inconsistency in the findings. The inconsistency is apparent. When the findings are considered in a light most favorable to the defendants' position, viz., that the plaintiff loaned the money to the Valley Bank with knowledge that the latter bank intended to use the funds for the purpose of buying the stock of the Bakersfield bank, we are met with the contention that the plaintiff may not recover because the Valley Bank intended to, or did, violate section 37 of the Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 96) as amended (St. 1923, p. 56), reading in its pertinent parts as follows: "No bank shall, except as otherwise provided in this act, purchase or invest its capital or surplus or money of its depositors, or any part of either, in the capital stock of any corporation unless the purchase or acquisition of such capital stock shall be necessary to prevent loss to the bank on an obligation owned or on a debt previously contracted in good faith, * * * provided, however, that not more than an amount equal to twenty-five per centum of the capital and surplus of any such bank may be at any one time invested in the capital stock of * * * such other corporation. * * *

Assuming that the purchase of stock in the Bakersfield bank, as contemplated by the Valley Bank, would exceed the statutory authorization, the contemplated action was, at the most, ultra vires. Whatever remedies might otherwise exist as against the assumed ultra vires act of the bank, such remedies could not have the effect of striking down the entirely lawful transaction between the Valley Bank and the plaintiff herein. The Valley Bank could not urge its own usurpation of power as against a valid obligation created between itself and its creditor in another and distinct transaction. Chambers v. Security, etc., Bank, 51 Cal. App. 212, 196 P. 488. It is not and could not successfully be contended that the Valley Bank was without power to borrow money from the plaintiff or that the plaintiff was without power to lend money to the Valley Bank. Having received the full benefit of the loan from the plaintiff, the Valley Bank would not be heard to complain that it intended to use the money for an unauthorized purpose when, as here, it does not appear that the plaintiff was to participate in any wise in the unauthorized act. Much less may the defendants urge that they are not liable on an obligation to which the Valley Bank is not a party.

The foregoing discussion relates to the effect of the findings most favorable to the defendants' position, namely, that the purpose of the Valley Bank in using the money was to purchase stock of the Bakersfield bank, and to the contention of the defendants that such a transaction was contrary to the statute. However, the evidence more directly and positively supports the finding that the money was to be used for the purpose of repairing the impaired capital stock of the Bakersfield bank. It is not shown that such a purpose was unlawful.

[6] The cases of Bank of Orland v. Harlan, 188 Cal. 413, 206 P. 75, and First National Bank v. Reed, 198 Cal. 252, 244 P. 368, relied upon by the defendants, are widely distinguishable on the facts and are not in point. Here no fraud or deceit is charged against or brought home to the plaintiff bank. Here the documentary evidence establishes the enforceable obligation. It is the well-settled rule of the law merchant generally that only those persons who are parties to a negotiable instrument may be sued upon it (section 3099, Civ. Code), and there is no evidence in the record to remove this case from the operation of the general rule.

We conclude, therefore, that the competent evidence before us is insufficient to support the findings in favor of the defendants and that the findings otherwise do not support the judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action to cancel and set aside a trust deed. The trial court accepted the theory of the defense, and found, in effect, that appellant Wilford J. McCray and respondent W. W. Reese (who died prior to the trial of the cause) were associated together in mining ventures. McCray, in the early part of 1924, sought to borrow $5,000 from the respondents Reese, representing that, unless he could secure that amount, he and certain other persons were liable to be criminally prosecuted. Learning that the Reeses did not have sufficient funds to make the loan, McCray stated that he could raise the $5,000 provided sufficient security was given, and requested the respondents Reese to deed to him a quarter section of land in Kern county owned by them. The Reeses accordingly executed a warranty deed to McCray, who thereafter obtained a loan of $5,000, giving as security therefor a mortgage on the Kern county property. He agreed with the respondents to pay the interest and principal of the note and to protect their property from foreclosure. Subsequently, McCray and his wife, appellant Anna McCray, reconveyed the property to Mrs. Reese subject to the $5,000 mortgage. At the time of the reconveyance, respondent Reese demanded security against the incumbrance placed on the property, whereupon the McCrays executed a promissory note for $5,000, dated April 1, 1924, in favor of Ella Reese, and secured by the deed of trust here in controversy covering property owned by the appellants in Los Angeles. Appellants failed to pay the interest and principal of the note secured by the Kern county property, and respondent Ella Reese was compelled to make the payments in order to prevent the foreclosing of the mortgage. Appellants likewise defaulted in the payment of interest and principal on their note executed to Ella Reese and secured by the deed of trust, and the property given as security therefor was sold by the trustee, the respondent Leo E. Sievert, to Ella Reese.

Appellants' theory of the case is based on an entirely different set of facts which they sought to prove. According to their contentions, McCray and Reese entered into negotiations with certain parties to raise $25,000 with which to finance the purchase of the property of the Springfield Gold Mining Company. They were to raise in the beginning at least $10,000, of which $5,000 was to be furnished by each of them. McCray not being in a position to put up his share, Reese agreed to advance the amount for him, if McCray would guarantee the payment by signing a note and giving a trust deed covering the Los Angeles property of the appellants. Appellants assert that, with this understanding, they signed the note for $5,000 in favor of respondent Ella Reese, and also signed and acknowledged the trust deed requested by Reese, and left them with a notary public with instructions to deliver them to Reese when the $10,000 had been raised by him; that, in some manner and contrary to appellants' instructions, Reese obtained possession of the note and trust deed which he afterwards had recorded; that this action was brought to cancel and set aside the deed, first, because appellants had not, at any time, delivered it to the respondent Reese, and, secondly, because of the failure of Reese to raise the $10,000, no consideration passed for the execution of the note and deed. The trial court rejected the contentions of the plaintiffs (appellants), and rendered its decision and judgment in favor of the defendants.

The trial court found that, while the trustee's deed of the Los Angeles property to Ella Reese and an amendatory deed were void because defective on their face, in that the sale was not advertised for six weeks in a newspaper of general circulation, as required under the terms of the trust deed, the deed remained a valid lien upon the property covered thereby. The court also found that there was no consideration for the deed to the Kern county property from the Reeses to McCray, and that the mortgaging of the property by the McCrays and the redeeding of it to Mrs. Reese subject to the mortgage constituted a good and sufficient consideration for the execution of the promissory note and trust deed to the Los Angeles property herein sought to be canceled and set aside.

Appellants attack certain findings of the trial court as not sustained by the evidence. As already noted, they claim a delivery of the trust deed in escrow and a failure of respondents to comply with its terms; that there was no delivery of the trust deed to respondents, and no consideration passed therefor. As to the warranty deed from the Reeses covering the Kern county property on which the $5,000 mortgage was placed by McCray, the appellants claim that the deed was given to McCray for an interest in a mining deal. There was evidence that the deed was given to McCray "to enable [him] to raise $5,000 for the purchase of an interest in the contract which [McCray] was one of the owners of," and, again, that for the $5,000 raised by the mortgage Reese was "to get a one-fourth interest in an agreement which [McCray] held against the Springfield Gold Mining Company." On the other hand, there was testimony on behalf of the respondents to the effect that representations were made to the Reeses by McCray and his associates that McCray had issued a check without sufficient funds in the bank to cover it; that, if the check was refused by the bank, it would result in the cancellation of a contract and the inability of McCray and his associates to complete the organization of a corporation, in which event one of the associates, who had sold preorganization certificates of the corporation, would be liable to arrest; and that upon these representations the Reeses executed the deed to the Kern county property in order that the money might be raised.

We have carefully reviewed the record in the case, and find that, while there was evidence in favor of appellants' theory, there was also ample evidence to support the findings of the trial court upholding respondents' contentions. The testimony, in line with the contradictory statements and inconsistent claims of the parties, is irreconcilably conflicting. "It is the duty of the trier of facts to reconcile, if possible, any apparent conflict, whether such conflict is developed upon the whole case or in the testimony of an individual witness, and to give effect to all the evidence, when the nature of the case will admit of such a disposition, or, if the conflict is irreconcilable, to affix [his] own value to the contradictory evidence." And it is a cardinal rule that where, upon a question of fact, the testimony in the court below involves a substantial conflict, the action of the lower court will not be disturbed. 10 Cal. Jur. 1171, 1172, §§ 382, 383, and cases cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

McKENZIE, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment against the estate of her testate, George Hamlin Fitch, said judgment being based on an alleged separation agreement entered into by plaintiff and decedent during his lifetime.

Respondent and Fitch were married by a justice of the peace at Fairfield, Solano county, on the 7th day of June, 1912. At the date of marriage plaintiff was thirty-six years of age and had two daughters by a former marriage, one of whom was between thirteen and fourteen years of age; the age of the other girl is not shown.

In September, 1912, Fitch and his wife were having marital difficulties, the nature of which, other than Fitch's statement that he was disappointed, does not appear. Mrs. Fitch consulted James M. Hanley, an attorney, who wrote to Fitch concerning the matter, and the letter brought a reply from James F. Lanagan, an attorney who represented Mr. Fitch. Mr. Lanagan died before the trial, Fitch being dead, and Mrs. Fitch not being competent to testify under the provisions of subdivision 3, section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, Mr. Hanley appears to have been the only available person who had knowledge of the negotiations that led up to the writing hereinafter referred to, and which is the foundation upon which plaintiff's case rests. Mr. Hanley's testimony is brief and amounts to this: That he discussed the matter with Mr. Lanagan, at Lanagan's office, three times, and that on one occasion Mr. Fitch was present; that he proposed to Lanagan and Fitch that they draw up a property settlement agreement giving Mrs. Fitch a monthly allowance for support of $250 per month; that Fitch said he would pay her $150 per month and no more, and that if she would not take that he would go beyond the jurisdiction and pay nothing; that Fitch said he would start paying immediately and would continue as long as he lived; that after this Mr. and Mrs. Fitch then fixed the matter up without the aid of either lawyer, and that a few days later Mrs. Fitch brought him the following letter: "Enclosed you will find check for $150 for your separate maintenance for October. Hereafter I will send a similar check on the first of each month. Yours sincerely, George H. Fitch;" that Mrs. Fitch told him that Fitch would not sign any other paper, and that a few days later he met Mr. Lanagan and told him, "I think our clients have got together, they have agreed and I guess there is nothing else to do, it is just as good in his writing as if we had written it and if it is acceptable to her and she has taken the money, I suppose that is all right, and I let it go at that."

The evidence shows clearly that the foregoing letter with a check for $150 inclosed was received through the mail by Mrs. Fitch on October 4, 1912, and that she received a similar letter and check for like amount for a while, and then for $170 from Mr. Fitch about the first of every month until and including the first day of May, 1915—a period of two years and eight months. These checks were all accepted and cashed by Mrs. Fitch. From October 3, 1912, to the end, Mr. and Mrs. Fitch did not live together nor communicate with each other except by means of the stereotyped letters accompanied by a check which he sent her every month until May 1, 1915, when he ceased making payments.

In the early part of 1915 Fitch went to New York, remained there a few months; went to Europe for a few months; returned to United States and resided in New York and Florida until 1920, when he returned to California, and resided in the vicinity of Los Angeles until his death on the 25th day of January, 1925.

May 6, 1919, Mrs. Fitch commenced in San Francisco an action for divorce against Mr. Fitch, charging him with having deserted her on the 3d day of October, 1912. The complaint, which was verified by Mrs. Fitch, makes no mention of the contract involved in this action, nor of any agreement concerning property or maintenance agreements. The prayer of the complaint asked for "general relief." Mr. Lanagan, as attorney for defendant, filed an answer denying the desertion. The answer has attached to it Fitch's written authorization for Lanagan to appear for him. An interlocutory and final decree followed in due course on the 28th day of May, 1920.

Mr. Fitch died January 25, 1925, and letters of administration with the will annexed were issued to defendant, who is a daughter of deceased. In August, 1925, plaintiff presented to defendant for allowance her claim against the estate; the claim was disallowed and this suit followed.

[1] In considering this case we must differentiate the facts in this case with those in Estate of Patterson, 46 Cal. App. 415, 189 P. 483, wherein it was held a contract between husband and wife concerning property is not required to be in writing. The exception contained in section 159, Civil Code, is noted in that case. In the instant case plaintiff pleaded a separation agreement, and she is bound by her pleading. In considering this case in the light of the respective briefs, we are not fully enlightened concerning the law because counsel for respondent assumes, without authority or argument, that at all times since October 3, 1912, there existed a valid and binding obligation on the part of Mr. Fitch to pay Mrs. Fitch $150 per month so long as he should live. If this be true, some of the arguments of counsel for appellant are not in point, because, as regards separation agreements, the general rule appears to be that the parties to such an agreement can do almost anything they please, providing they do what they agreed to do and do nothing they agreed not to do.

The all-important allegation of the complaint reads as follows: "That on or about the 3d day of October, 1912, said plaintiff and the said George Hamlin Fitch entered into an agreement to live separate and apart from each other, and at said time, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the said George Hamlin Fitch agreed in writing to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $150.00 per month as and for separate maintenance and to pay the said sum of $150.00 per month to the said plaintiff for and during the term of her natural life; said sum being payable, according to the terms of said agreement on the first day of each and every month from and after the date of said agreement." The defendant denied this allegation, and during the trial strenuously objected to the introduction in evidence of the letter in question, and likewise objected to the oral testimony of Mr. Hanley. The court found this allegation of the complaint to be true. Judgment was awarded plaintiff for monthly payments and interest thereon during the four years preceding the death of Mr. Fitch. The judgment was entered January 4, 1929, and is for the recovery of $7,200 principal and $3,990.50 interest. Defendant appeals and urges several grounds for reversal. Several of the grounds for reversal advanced by her cannot be intelligently considered until it is determined, first: Did the parties make any valid and binding contract? And, second: If a valid contract was entered into, was it to continue until the death of one of the parties or was it one that could be terminated at any time? If there was not a valid contract, or if there was a valid contract which was terminated when Fitch ceased making payments or when Mrs. Fitch secured a divorce, the trial court was not justified in rendering judgment for plaintiff.

[2, 3] The laws of this state sanction husband and wife making contracts respecting property. Section 158, Civ. Code. They may likewise agree, in writing, to a separation, and make provision for the support of either during such separation. Section 159, Civ. Code. It is almost a universal rule that separation agreements provide not only for maintenance, but likewise settle and determine the property rights of the parties, both as to the present and future; but it is not essential to the validity of a separation agreement that the property right or inheritance rights of the parties are or are not disposed of. In such agreements property rights may be excluded entirely, or they may be included in whole or in part. Jones v. Lamont, 118 Cal. 499, 50 P. 766, 62 Am. St. Rep. 251; Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 P. 358.

[4-6] Statutory requirements as to the execution of separation agreements must be complied with. R. C. L., vol. 9, p. 527. Our statute requires that separation agreements must be in writing, which implies that the agreement must not only be in writing, but also that the writing must be signed by both parties. In the instant case there was not an agreement in writing, unless the letter sent with the check constituted an agreement which was signed by Mr. Fitch, but Mrs. Fitch never signed any agreement. It is clear that the parties, with the aid of their respective attorneys, were negotiating in regard to a property settlement and separation agreement. According to the testimony of Mr. Hanley, the negotiations included "obtaining maintenance and support from Mr. Fitch," "to discuss the domestic relations of Mr. and Mrs. Fitch," "to adjusting and to arrive at a property settlement agreement between Mr. and Mrs. Fitch."

Mr. and Mrs. Fitch abandoned their respective attorneys and undoubtedly made some sort of an agreement themselves. What was this agreement? It is not in writing, and how could it be proven by previous negotiations between the attorneys alone? Conceding that Mr. Fitch did say at one time previous to his final agreement with Mrs. Fitch that he would pay $150 per month so long as he lived, how can it be determined that was the final agreement? After the parties had made their agreement, Mr. Fitch did not make any statement to Mr. Hanley or to any one else concerning the terms of the agreement he and Mrs. Fitch had entered into, except by and through the letter in question. This leaves plaintiff with the letter and the facts that subsequently developed to establish her case by. This letter reads as follows: "San Francisco, Cal. Oct. 3rd, 1912. My dear Amerique: Enclosed you will find check for $150.00 for your separate maintenance for October. Hereafter, I will send a similar check on the first of each month. Yours sincerely, George H. Fitch." The case of Carl v. Carl (Sup.) 166 N. Y. S. 961, involved a separation agreement which contained a clause relating to duration of payment almost identical with the one under consideration. It reads as follows: "The party of the first part agrees to give to the party of the second part the sum of $5 per week, for the support and maintenance of the said party of the second part, payment to be made on each Monday, and commencing with the date of this agreement, payment to be made by post office order to the party of the second part." The husband ceased paying, and the wife brought suit to collect installments. The lower court held that the contract contemplated a permanent separation. The upper court in reversing the judgment said: "It will be noted that this contract does not, in any specific terms, say how long it shall continue in force. Is it to have any greater force than ordinary commercial agreements (such as contracts for hiring), which may be terminated at any time, when no fixed term is stated? We think not."

The reasoning and the ruling in Carl v. Carl is to the effect that the terms used in the letter in question imply that the agreement may be terminated at any time. "The law enters, as a silent factor, into every contract. That which is implied by law becomes a part of the written contract, the same, in general, as if it were written therein, and if the contract is thus made clear and complete it can no more be varied or contradicted by parol evidence as to the matter imported into it by law than it can in any other respect." Elliot on Contracts, vol. 2, § 1628. Having in mind that the letter in question relates to a separation agreement, and viewing it in the light of the way it was made and the purpose of the maker (or makers, although Mrs. Fitch signed nothing), we conclude that the terms of the letter implied that it was revocable at any time, and that this legal implication could not be varied by parol evidence. It then follows that the trial court was in error in allowing the introduction of parol testimony to prove how long the payments were to continue.

[7] Having determined the agreement, such as it was, could be terminated at any time, we are of the opinion that it was terminated by Fitch when he ceased making payments, and that this termination was acquiesced in by Mrs. Fitch. Mr. Fitch stopped making payments in May, 1915, and no complaint was filed to recover on this agreement until Fitch died. In 1919 she filed in San Francisco a complaint seeking a decree of divorce. Mr. Fitch appeared in this action by his attorney, Mr. Lanagan, who was authorized in writing to so appear; nothing was said in the complaint about a separation agreement or any money due thereon, nor after Mr. Fitch appeared in the action was an amended complaint filed so that she could recover the $7,200 that was then due her, if there had been a valid agreement in existence. True, there is some testimony in the record that Fitch disappeared and could not be found, but it is not at all convincing or entitled to serious consideration considering that her claim, if she had any, amounted to more than $18,000 at the time Mr. Fitch died. Mrs. Fitch knew that Mr. Lanagan was his lawyer, yet no inquiry was made of him. Furthermore, a man who for years had held an important position with a great metropolitan newspaper and could write books and sell them could be easily found by one who was his creditor to the extent of thousands of dollars. If Mrs. Fitch had not secured a divorce, or if Mr. Fitch had not left a will disposing of his separate property, the facts herein might have furnished a different theme.

If the rule laid down in Carl v. Carl, supra, is not followed, and we were to hold that the duration of the agreement in question could be established by parol, we would have to rely on the frail memory of man to go back many years to determine if the term was during Mrs. Fitch's life, or during Mr. Fitch's life, or during a term when the husband's income was so much, or during the term Mrs. Fitch's daughters were too young to go to work, which last condition might be fairly inferred from the whole record. The last payment in 1915 was evidently made after Fitch left San Francisco, because it was made through the office of his attorney, Mr. Lanagan. Mrs. Cupples, plaintiff's daughter, testified as a witness, and, while testifying concerning the last check that came through Mr. Lanagan's office, she said it was fixed in her mind because "I was forced to go to work." At that time no one knew Mr. Fitch was going to repudiate any agreement made by him. Furthermore, the later checks sent by Mr.

Fitch were for $170 instead of $150. It is fair to assume that the total amount paid by Fitch was $5,000—a significant figure, and the addition of $20 to the later checks is inconsistent with the character of a man, more or less prominent, who would obscure himself to avoid his financial obligations.

These observations are not prompted by the thought that they have anything to do with the findings of the trial court, or that they have anything to do with our determination of this case, other than to emphasize the importance of having all the essentials of separation agreements reduced to writing and signed by both parties, as the law provides. Mrs. Fitch did not sign any agreement, and the mere acceptance of money would probably not have bound her. If, in such a case, one was attempting to bind her, and parol testimony was admitted to explain under what circumstances she took the money, confusion would result.

The exigencies of business and commerce, where at every place at all times people are engaged in everyday business affairs, demand that laws should be flexible and not too exacting; but there is no need for informal rules when applied to separation agreements, and as proof of this we fail to find in any of the law books reference to a case where the agreement has not been signed by both parties; neither have we found a case where an attempt has been made to establish such a claim by a letter which at most only relates to some previous agreement, nor have we found, in the reports of the states where such agreements must be in writing, any instance of where the terms of such an agreement were established by parol evidence.

The law regards with great caution all stale demands made against a decedent's estate. In this case the lips of the parties to the transaction involved herein are closed; one by death, and the other by law. Both were presumed to know that the law required such agreements to be in writing and signed. This requirement they did not comply with; consequently the court must consider the legal rights of plaintiff and all those interested in the estate from the position the plaintiff and decedent placed themselves in. It is of no moment that in this particular case the ruling of the court might or might not be of advantage to either side. This seems to be a case of first impression, and the rule announced at this time ought to establish a precedent that will tend to avoid rather than create confusion. Separation agreements are seldom made and there never can be necessity for haste, and there seems to be no good reason why they should not comply with the strict requirements that the statute provides.

We therefore hold, first, that the letter in question did not constitute a valid and binding obligation for the reason that it does not contain an agreement to live separate and apart; that it lacks mutuality, and that it was not signed by both parties; and, second, that the promise or agreement contained in the letter to pay $150 per month was one that could be abrogated at any time by either of the parties, and that it was abrogated.

Judgment reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in favor of defendant.

1. Pleading ⇨254.

Where original complaint showed malpractice action was barred, but amended complaint omitted date, court upon demurrer could assume date was correctly alleged originally (Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3).

After a demurrer pleading the statute of limitations, Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, had been sustained, plaintiff amended his complaint, and defendant then interposed a special demurrer attempting to compel plaintiff to plead facts specifically.

2. Limitation of actions ⇨104(1).

Plaintiff in malpractice action had to ascertain at his peril whether to sue within statutory period, notwithstanding alleged concealment of facts (Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3).

STURTEVANT, J.

[1, 2] To the plaintiff's fourth amended complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff declined to amend. Judgment in favor of the defendant was entered, and from that judgment the plaintiff has appealed. The plaintiff in his complaint charged the defendant with malpractice. On the face of the original complaint it appeared that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. Therefore a demurrer pleading the statute of limitations was sustained. The only material difference between the allegations of the original complaint and the fourth amended complaint is that in the latter the date of the alleged negligent act is not specifically set forth. Because it was not specifically set forth, the defendant interposed a special demurrer in which he made fifteen attacks, attempting to compel the plaintiff to plead the facts on the face of his complaint. In passing on the last demurrer the trial court, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, was justified in assuming that the date of the wrongful act was correctly set forth in the original complaint and to rule accordingly. Williamson v. Joyce, 137 Cal. 151, 152, 69 P. 980. Furthermore, the defendant's special demurrer was addressed to the date. If the date had been inserted, the plea of the statute was good. If the date was omitted, the special demurrer was good. The plaintiff may not complain in either event. In a further attempt to avoid a plea of the statute of limitations the plaintiff inserted certain allegations pleading that the defendant concealed from him certain facts regarding the plaintiff's case. However, this is not an action in equity, but is an action in malpractice. The statute of limitations which is applicable is subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Harding v. Liberty Hospital Corp., 177 Cal. 520, 522, 171 P. 98. Within the period of time so specified in that statute it was the plaintiff's duty to ascertain at his peril whether he desired to maintain this action. In Lattin v. Gillette, 95 Cal. 317, at page 320, 30 P. 545, 546, 29 Am. St. Rep. 115, the court quotes with approval from Wood on Limitations as follows: "Where an attorney is sued for malpractice the cause of action arises from the time when such malpractice occurred, and that without any reference to the circumstance whether the client then knew the fact or not." Continuing, the court cites many other authorities to the same effect. We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

While the Hunter-Dulin building was being constructed at the corner of Sutter and Montgomery streets in San Francisco, several different contractors were engaged in their work at the same time. Lindgren & Swinerton were the general contractors, and the plaintiff was employed by them as a common laborer. At the time of the accident, which is the subject-matter of this action, he was working on a tramway which led from a window on the west side out over the sidewalk. At the same time the defendants, A. Quandt & Sons, the painters, were engaged in the performance of their contract. At the time of the accident they were working on the fourth and fifth floors directly over and above the plaintiff. While the plaintiff was so at work a wooden plank fell and struck him, and for the injuries so sustained he commenced this action to recover damages. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, the defendants have appealed and have brought up a typewritten record.

[1, 2] The defendants assert that in his complaint the plaintiff pleaded specific acts of negligence, that he did not prove those specific acts, and that the judgment should be reversed. The plaintiff introduced proof that the plank that hit the plaintiff was a painter's plank, that it was marked A. Quandt & Sons, that Mr. Hatton, plaintiff's boss, saw the plank strike, and that he looked up and saw defendants' men near the fire escape at the fourth and fifth floors. Almost immediately thereafter Mr. Hatton went up to where defendants' men were at work and there met defendants' foreman. With him Mr. Hatton went to the fire escape and there saw defendants' operators at work, and while there he had a conversation. Mr. Hatton testified that the fact was admitted as to what service dropped the plank—that the actions of the men practically admitted that they had dropped the plank. These statements were not objected to, and there was no motion to strike it out. It has some probative weight. Sanders v. Austin, 180 Cal. 664, 666, 182 P. 449; Walberg v. Underwood, 39 Cal. App. 748, 752, 180 P. 55. There was direct and positive testimony that, at the time of the accident, Joe Terran was one of the painters employed on the job by the defendants, and that at that time he was on the job. After the accident happened Mr. Theodore Quandt, one of the defendants, had a conversation with one of the attorneys for the plaintiff. In that conversation Mr. Quandt stated that Terran dropped the plank. The foregoing evidence was some proof of plaintiff's allegations, whether it be said they pleaded negligence in general or specific terms.

[3] The defendants assert that the plaintiff did not prove that the dropping was negligent and of what that negligence consisted. Of course, under the facts, he was not bound to do so. Dixon v. Pluns, 98 Cal. 388, 389, 33 P. 268, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180; Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 607, 265 P. 238, 59 A. L. R. 480.

[4] At no time did the defendants explain or attempt to explain how or why they allowed the plank to fall. After all the evidence had been taken the defendants asked an instruction directing a verdict in their favor. The request was denied, and the denial is assigned as error. Of course, under such circumstances no such instruction should have been given because the defendants had not introduced any evidence to remove the inference of negligence which arose by reason of the evidence introduced by the plaintiff. We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

This is a motion to affirm the judgment based upon a directed verdict in favor of defendants on the ground of appellant's failure to print or set forth in his brief or any supplement thereto, as required by section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, any portion of the record sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment.

[1] Appellant's brief is unusual in form and entirely insufficient to give the court any adequate understanding of the case. Only fragmentary portions of the pleadings are set forth, from which it is impossible to determine the issues thereby made, the theory of appellant's case, or the relief sought. In fact, it does not appear from anything set forth in the brief that appellant's fourth amended complaint stated a cause of action against any of the respondents. Further, the brief is lacking in any orderly specification of alleged errors to aid in ascertaining the issues on this appeal. "The briefs must present each point separately under an appropriate heading showing the nature of the question to be presented." (Rule VIII, Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal.) By inference from the space devoted, it may be surmised that appellant's main contention is that the trial court erred in refusing to admit in evidence certain exhibits set forth in the appendix. We should not be compelled to resort to inference. The specifications of error should be clearly set forth, and a sufficient portion of the record should be printed to demonstrate such error. By reason of the deficiency of the brief, it is impossible to determine therefrom whether the exhibits were relevant to any material issue made by the pleadings. Again we are given no aid by anything printed or set forth in the brief in determining whether the evidence offered at the trial was sufficient to prove other material issues that may have been made by the pleadings. The action of the trial court in directing a verdict in favor of the defendants was proper unless the evidence offered tended to prove all of the material issues. To affirmatively show error it would be necessary to print or set forth adequate portions of the pleadings and evidence, and we find appellant's brief entirely lacking in this regard.

[2, 3] All presumptions are in favor of the judgment and the proceedings upon which it is based, and the duty is upon the appellant to affirmatively show the existence of error upon which he asks for a reversal. Where an appeal is taken upon the alternative method, the provisions of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure must be complied with, and, if appellant fails to meet these requirements, no duty devolves upon this court to make an independent investigation of a voluminous typewritten transcript in search of error upon which to base a reversal. Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 176 Cal. 680, 169 P. 379.

[4] On oral argument of the motion to affirm the judgment the requirements of the law were called to appellant's attention, but no request was made for leave to file a supplemental brief. The provisions of section 953c have been repeatedly pointed out in the decisions, and, the appellant having failed to comply therewith by affirmatively showing the existence of error, the judgment should be affirmed upon motion. Bryant v. Kelly, 203 Cal. 721, 722, 265 P. 817; Dahlberg v. Dahlberg, 202 Cal. 295, 260 P. 290; Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054; Chandlee v. McCalla, 179 Cal. 678, 178 P. 709; *Riffee v. 1. Railroads ⇨348(8).

Evidence, in action for death of guest in automobile struck by train, held to support conclusion that railroad's negligence proximately contributed to death, notwithstanding negligence of automobile driver.

Negligence of railroad relied on was failure to ring bell and sound whistle when approaching street crossing, as required by Civ. Code, § 486.

2. Railroads ⇨337(5).

Fact that automobile driver approaching railroad crossing saw wigwag signal in motion held not to discharge railroad from duty to give statutory warning signals (Civ. Code, § 486).

3. Appeal and error ⇨930(1).

Allegations of complaint and testimony in support thereof on which action was tried are presumed included within verdict.

4. Railroads ⇨307(3).

Fact that railroad tracks and wigwag signal constitute general notice of danger held not to relieve railroad of duty to give statutory signals (Civ. Code, § 486).

5. Railroads ⇨316(4).

Absence of limitation on speed of trains through cities held not to permit excessive speed constituting negligence in itself.

6. Railroads ⇨350(11).

Whether speed of train at street crossing is so excessive as to constitute negligence depends on circumstances, and is for jury.

7. Negligence ⇨93(1).

If concurrent negligence of railroad and automobile driver resulted in death of guest in automobile, railroad would be liable, notwithstanding driver's concurrent negligence, unless deceased was contributorily negligent.

8. Negligence ⇨141(11).

Instruction, in action for death of guest in automobile struck by train, on effect of driver's gross negligence, held properly refused.

Instruction refused, in substance, told jury to render verdict for defendant railroad, if it believed from evidence that gross negligence, which is total lack of care in approaching and going on crossing immediately in front of train, was proximate cause of collision. Such instruction was instruction on facts, and omitted all elements relative to negligence of railroad and question whether, notwithstanding gross negligence in failing to stop, look, and listen, driver would not have stopped had required signals of approach of train been given.

9. Railroads ⇨327(12).

Fact that guest riding in automobile was intoxicated held not to render him contributorily negligent in wholly intrusting himself to driver.

10. Railroads ⇨327(1).

Driving motor vehicle while under influence of intoxicating liquor constitutes negligence per se (California Vehicle Act, § 112).

11. Railroads ⇨350(21).

Knowledge of automobile guest that driver is intoxicated constitutes contributory negligence within province of jury.

12. Railroads ⚡351(16).

Instruction, in action for death of guest in automobile, relating to driver's intoxication, must be based on injury resulting from driver's negligent operation.

13. Railroads ⚡327(12).

Contributory negligence of guest in getting into automobile operated by drunken driver will not defeat recovery for injuries, unless injury resulted from driver's negligence.

14. Railroads ⚡327(12).

If injuries to automobile guest are joint result of driver's intoxication, constituting negligence and concurrent negligence of third person, guest knowing of driver's condition would likewise be chargeable with contributory negligence.

15. Appeal and error ⚡882(15).

Where trial court's failure to instruct was due to defendant's failure to submit instructions, defendant cannot assign failure to instruct as error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County;
H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Ethel G. Johnson, individually and as guardian ad litem of Dorothy Johnson and another, against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Devlin & Devlin & Diepenbrock, of Sacramento, George F. Jones, of Oroville, and Jerome D. Peters, of Chico, for appellants.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiffs had judgment in the sum of $30,000 in an action for damages suffered on account of the death of Hallie Lindsley Johnson, occurring at about 12:30 a. m., December 24, 1926, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the appellants in the operation of a railroad train over a street crossing in the city of Chico. The deceased, Johnson, at the time in question, was riding as a guest in an automobile driven by one Jack Salzer. The plaintiff, Ethel G. Johnson, is the surviving widow, and Dorothy Johnson and Gordon Johnson are the minor children of the deceased and of the plaintiff Ethel G. Johnson.

The complaint, after alleging certain preliminary matters not necessary to mention, sets forth that on the 24th day of December, 1926, Hallie Lindsley Johnson was riding as a passenger in an automobile, along a public highway known as First street, in the city of Chico, traveling in a westerly direction, and in so doing reached a point where First street crosses the right of way of the Southern Pacific Company. It is then alleged that the said deceased was using and exercising due care in his own behalf, and that said defendants, at said time, carelessly and negligently caused one of its regular passenger-carrying trains, owned and operated by the defendant company, and then and there in charge of William Edgar Field, as engineer, and Joseph Wilson Laurant, as fireman, to approach said crossing at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and that, while approaching said crossing, the defendants negligently and carelessly omitted to give any signal by the ringing of any bell or sounding of any steam whistle, as required by law, and that, by reason of such negligence and carelessness, the locomotive drawing said train collided with the automobile in which said Johnson was riding, resulting in his immediate death.

It is further alleged in the complaint that the crossing in question is situated in a thickly populated portion of the city of Chico; that it is so built up that one approaching the railroad crossing from the east is not able to perceive a train coming from the north, until after passing the last building on the north side of First street. It is further alleged in the complaint that the defendants were aware of the fact that First street is a much-traveled highway. Other matters are alleged in the complaint, but, as the gravamen of the action is the alleged failure of the defendants to give proper warning of the approach of the train and running at a high and dangerous rate of speed, it is unnecessary further to follow the allegations of the complaint.

The answer of the defendants admits the running of the train drawn by a steam locomotive. Denies that the deceased was riding as a passenger, in an automobile, along First street, in the city of Chico; denies that the said deceased was using due care, or any care; denies that the train was being drawn or propelled at a high or dangerous rate of speed. The answer then admits that the crossing was frequently used; but alleges that said crossing was properly protected, and, in addition to the ordinary crossing signs, the defendant company maintained an electric wigwag signal which was operating at the time of the approach of the train in question. The answer then further alleges that the death of Hallie Lindsley Johnson was caused solely by his own negligence. There is no issue tendered by the answer of the defendants that Hallie Lindsley Johnson's death was caused by the negligence of the driver of the automobile in which Johnson was riding, the negligence of the deceased only being pleaded.

The evidence, as set forth in the transcript, shows that the defendants were operating a south-bound passenger train known as "Number 13," drawn by a steam locomotive, and that the train consisted of 12 cars. No. 13 was due in the city of Chico at about 12:20 a. m., but on the morning of December 24, 1926, apparently was a few minutes late. The deceased was a resident of Chico, by occupation a cement contractor and bridge builder. He, in company with Percy Dow and George Malloy, was riding as a guest in an automobile owned and driven by Jack Salyer. At the crossing heretofore referred to, the automobile was struck by the locomotive of train No. 13, and all four of the occupants instantly killed. First street is a well-paved street running in an easterly and westerly direction across the northern boundary of the business section of the city of Chico, and crosses the right of way of the Southern Pacific Company at right angles. First street for many years has been, and on the day in question was, the main artery of travel connecting the east and west sides of the city of Chico. First street is also the connecting highway between the east and west sides of the Sacramento valley. The population of the city of Chico at the time of the accident was estimated to be about 14,000. The record likewise shows that First street and First street crossing was much used by the traveling public at all times. The main line of the railroad at said crossing runs about due north and south. At the crossing in question there are also five spur tracks maintained by the defendant company. All four corners of the intersection are well built up. From the direction in which the deceased was traveling, no view could be had of an approaching train, until one had reached a point about 58 feet from the center of the main-line track. The main-line track is practically straight for a distance of something over 600 feet north of First street, when it curves gently to the westward. Paralleling the main-line track of the defendant company, for a distance of over 3,000 feet, is a certain highway known as "Nord avenue." This avenue varies from 350 to something over 400 feet distant from the main line of the railroad. North of First street the main line of the railroad is intersected by a highway known as "Sacramento avenue," distant from First street 3,080 feet. On the four corners of First street, where it intersects the right of way of the defendant company, were buildings, one used by the Diamond Match Company as a planing mill, one as a packing plant by the California Packing Corporation, one used as a warehouse by the Pacific Fruit & Produce Company, and one used by Pacific Gas and Electric Company; all of these buildings are shown to be quite large.

On December 24, 1926, no electric light was maintained by the city of Chico at the intersection of First street with the right of way belonging to the defendant company; the red light on the wigwag signal being the only illumination.

The record shows that during the early part of the evening of December 23, 1926, Jack Salyer, George Malloy, and Percy Dow had spent most of their time in and about two pool rooms in the city of Chico, one maintained by a person named Walker, and the other by a person named Quilter. These pool rooms were near a café known as "Max's Café"; that some time about 11:30 p. m. they were joined by the deceased; that, after repairing to Max's Café and having some refreshments, the four persons just mentioned got into an automobile owned and driven by Jack Salyer, and started in a westerly direction on First street, and proceeded at what some of the witnesses testified to be a high rate of speed, until the crossing was reached. The automobile was a "Moon" touring car, with the curtains down, or at least down so far as the rear portion of the car was concerned. The deceased was riding at the right of the driver.

The testimony on the part of the defendants shows that the train was approaching from the north at a speed of between 45 and 48 miles per hour, until it reached a point somewhere in the vicinity of Sacramento avenue, where the brakes were applied and the train from that point on was rolling without the use of steam, and, when it reached First street crossing, the speed had been reduced to approximately 30 miles per hour.

On the part of the plaintiff, a witness was introduced who testified that he was driving an automobile southerly on Nord avenue between Sacramento avenue and First street, at a rate of approximately 45 miles per hour, and that the engine was running abreast of his automobile; that he slowed down slightly when reaching First street, in which street he turned easterly and traveled a very short distance when he witnessed the collision and heard the noise made by the engine striking the "Moon" touring car.

There is practically no dispute as to the whistling signals given by the defendants. The testimony is to the effect that the station signal was sounded approximately one mile from the depot, which, by the way, is situate about 1,320 feet south of First street; that shortly thereafter a crossing signal was given before the locomotive reached Sacramento avenue. Just what distance from the avenue this signal was sounded cannot be determined from the testimony. Thereafter no whistle was sounded until the train was approximately on the intersection. The testimony of the engineer was that he was giving the semaphore call of four blasts while he was passing over First street. His testimony is as follows:

"Q. You gave these four blasts of the whistle about where? A. I was coming over First street.

"Q. You gave the four blasts of the whistle as you were coming over First street? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was the whistle blowing as you crossed First street? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you see this automobile before you struck it? A. No, sir.

"Q. What was the first intimation that you had that your engine had struck an automobile? A. The fireman told me."

The record shows that the automobile was approaching from the fireman's side of the engine; that, as the automobile came past the buildings, the fireman called to the engineer to stop the train, but that the engineer was then blowing the semaphore whistle and did not hear him, and that he (the fireman) stepped to the engineer's side, again spoke to the engineer, and applied the emergency brakes.

A number of witnesses testified to hearing the station whistle, and also as to the crossing whistle when the train was north of Sacramento avenue, and that no other whistle sounded until the giving of the semaphore calls which we have just mentioned, while the train was crossing the street where the collision took place.

It thus appears, by the testimony of witnesses for both the plaintiff and the defendant, that compliance was not had with the provisions of section 486 of the Civil Code, relative to the sounding of a whistle at least 80 rods distant from a crossing, and the sounding of the same at intervals thereafter until the crossing is passed. The crossing whistle given was sufficiently distant. The same may be said of the station whistle, which was still farther distant, but, after giving the crossing whistle at some point north of Sacramento avenue, which avenue we have stated is 3,080 feet north of First street, no other whistling signals were given until the locomotive was practically upon the "Moon" automobile. The fireman testified that the bell was set ringing at about the time the crossing signal was sounded. The engineer testified concerning the ringing of the bell as follows:

"Q. Was the bell on that locomotive ringing as you came into Chico that night? A. Yes.

"Q. How was that bell ringing on that locomotive? A. By a little air motor."

The testimony of the fireman as to the ringing of the bell is as follows:

"Q. Was the bell on that locomotive ringing as you approached Chico? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How do you know that? A. Because I was ringing it myself.

"Q. You turned it on? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was the bell ringing when the locomotive stopped at the station? A. Yes.

"Q. How do you know that? A. Because I shut it off."

The fireman further testified that he set the bell ringing more than 80 rods distant from the First street crossing.

On the part of the plaintiff, there was introduced the testimony of the witness to which we have heretofore referred as having driven the car on Nord avenue approximately parallel with the main line of the railroad on which train No. 13 was approaching, for a distance of over 3,000 feet; that he heard the crossing whistle given north of Sacramento avenue, and that, from the giving of such crossing whistle, no other whistle was sounded until the train was upon and crossing First street, and that during the time he was traveling abreast of the locomotive, as herein mentioned, he heard no bell, and that no bell was rung, but that, after the collision had occurred, he heard the bell ringing on the locomotive. This witness further testified that he was driving with what is called the "cutout" open, but that it made little noise; that the window to his left, and which would be toward the train, was about halfway down. This witness further testified that the train was not making very much noise; that the wigwag was working at the time of the accident appears to be established by uncontradicted testimony.

On the part of the plaintiff, a number of witnesses were introduced who testified that on the night in question all of the four men were sober. On the part of the defendant, testimony was introduced to the effect that the driver of the car, Jack Salyer, was drunk, and that, just preceding the time when Johnson got into the automobile, Johnson obtained a flask of liquor from one of the party, gave it to Jack Salyer, who took a drink, and that all of the parties took a drink therefrom. A reading of the testimony would lead to the conclusion that all four of the men had been drinking to some extent. The fact that they had been drinking to some extent does not appear to be contradicted; the testimony in behalf of the plaintiffs going only to the effect that the men were not intoxicated.

Upon this appeal it is contended by the appellants that the plaintiffs failed to prove any negligence of the defendants as the proximate cause of the accident, and that it conclusively appears that the sole, proximate cause was provided by the driver of the automobile; that the plaintiffs failed to prove that the whistle was not sounded and the bell not rung, as required by statute; and that the court erred in refusing to submit to the jury the theory of the defendants that the negligence of the driver of the automobile was the sole, proximate cause of the accident; that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions offered by the defendants, concerning the intoxication of the driver of the automobile; likewise that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury upon the effect of intoxication on the part of the deceased.

In so far as the negligence of Jack Salyer, the driver of the automobile, is concerned, it is conceded that his negligence has been established, the testimony showing that he was propelling the automobile toward the railroad crossing at a high rate of speed, and did not stop to look and listen, as the circumstances and conditions surrounding the intersection required.

As we read the record, the cause was tried upon the theory that Jack Salyer was negligent, and also upon the theory that the defendants were likewise negligent in their failure to signal the approach of a rapidly moving train, as required by section 486 of the Civil Code, and that the excessive speed of the train and the lack of signals contributed to the collision; and that the deceased, being a guest in the automobile driven by Jack Salyer, and having no control thereof, was not responsible for his acts, and that the negligence of the driver was not attributable to the deceased.

A rather severe attack upon the testimony of the witness Odom, who was the one testifying as to the nonringing of the bell while he was traveling alongside of the defendants' locomotive, is made upon this appeal, but, as we have nothing to do with the credibility of the witness, the attack of the appellants on, and the defense of the respondents of, this witness, need not be further considered.

[1-4] Disregarding the effect of the verdict of the jury for a moment, the testimony shows conclusively that no warning signal was given of the approach of the train, by sounding of the locomotive whistle, for considerably over a half mile before the locomotive reached the intersection of First street. If the warning signal, by sounding the whistle, was given as required by law, at least 80 rods north of Sacramento avenue, then the last locomotive whistle was sounded approximately three-quarters of a mile north of the intersection of First street. The finding of the jury, even though upon negative testimony, that the bell was not rung, is conclusive upon this appeal. The verdict of the jury is also conclusive relative to the sounding of the whistles. Thus, if it be conceded as it must be, that Jack Salyer, as the driver of the automobile, was guilty of gross negligence in failing to stop, look, and listen for the approach of the train, yet the jury was warranted, under the testimony, in coming to the conclusion that, had the proper signals been given, then and in that case Jack Salyer would have heard the same and taken proper precautions to avert the accident; or, at least, that the deceased

Hallie Lindsley Johnson would have heard the signals of the approaching train and taken such precautions, in the way of warning Jack Salyer of the approach of the train as might or would be reasonably necessary to insure his own safety. With these premises in view, there is sufficient testimony in the record to support the judgment that, notwithstanding Jack Salyer's negligence, the negligence of the defendants proximately contributed to the death of Hallie Lindsley Johnson, and that the defendants are liable in damages therefor, even though Jack Salyer, if alive, would also be liable in damages. That Jack Salyer should have seen the wigwag signal in motion, and should have responded to its admonition that the company was about to claim the right of way, and that a train was approaching, does not discharge the defendants from complying with the provisions of section 486 of the Civil Code in giving the warning signals as therein required. The jury having rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs upon testimony sufficient to support the same, arguments of appellants that Jack Salyer was alone responsible in carrying Johnson to his death, when he (Salyer) knew that the train was approaching, has no foundation for its support. The allegations of the complaint and testimony in support thereof, upon which the action was tried, are presumed to be included within the verdict of the jury, and therefore, upon this appeal, we are held to a finding that the proper signals were not given; and, if the proper signals were not given, the jury was warranted in concluding that Jack Salyer's negligence in failing to stop, look, and listen was not the sole or proximate cause of the death of Hallie Lindsley Johnson, but rather enforces the conclusion that the death of Johnson was due to the concurrent negligence of both the automobile driver and the defendants. There is no testimony in the record showing that the deceased knew of the approach of the train. That the driver should have known does not charge the deceased. Therefore the argument based upon such assumption is really assumption only, and need not be answered. The fact that railroad tracks are a sign of danger and constitute a general notice of danger, and the fact that the installation of a wigwag signal which, in operation, is additional warning or notice of danger, does not relieve the situation in which the appellants have been placed by reason of the testimony to which we have referred, and the verdict of the jury.

A long list of authorities are cited by appellants, all of which tend to establish that the appellants would not be liable in an action for the death of Jack Salyer, but, as they do not trench upon the rights of the decedent or of the heirs of the decedent in this case, we do not need to follow them in detail.

[5, 6] We come next to the question of speed. So far as this case is concerned, there is neither statute no ordinance limiting the speed of trains. However, that does not open the gates wide for the running of trains through a populous city, or a city no larger than that of Chico, estimated to have a population of about 14,000, at such a high rate as to render it dangerous and a negligent act in and of itself. In some states, as set forth in Ann. Cas. 1914B, p. 602, the general rule is that, in the absence of a prohibitory statute or ordinance, a railroad company may ordinarily run its trains at such speed as it sees fit, and that a charge of negligence cannot be predicated on the rate of speed at which a train is run, unless there are attendant circumstances which make such speed negligence (citing a long list of cases). Further, on page 603 of the same volume, the modern rule is thus stated: "The recent cases are in accord with the general rule that while no rate of speed is of itself negligence, it may be negligence to run a train at a high rate of speed through a populous community and over a much-frequented crossing"—citing a long list of cases.

In Wyseur v. Davis, 58 Cal. App. 598, 209 P. 213, 214, this court had before it consideration of a crossing accident where the speed of a train was involved, and it was there said: "The uncontradicted evidence shows that the train was running at the speed of 45 miles an hour at the time of the accident. * * * The court instructed the jury: 'That it is for the jury to determine from all of the circumstances, whether the rate [of speed] at which said train was being operated was negligent.' It must be presumed in support of the verdict that the jury decided the issue of negligent speed against the defendant. This implied finding of the jury is conclusive on appeal." Whether the speed of a train in approaching a crossing is so dangerous or excessive as to constitute negligence is a question for the jury has been likewise held in the following cases: Badostain v. Pacific Ry. Co., 83 Cal. 290, 256 P. 576; Bilton v. Southern Pacific Co., 148 Cal. 443, 83 P. 440; Tousley v. Pacific Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 457, 137 P. 31. The latest case holding that negligence in relation to the speed is a question for the jury is that of Young v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 208 Cal. Sup. 568, 283 P. 61, where the cases which we have cited are approved and a quotation therefrom is set forth to the effect that whether the rate of speed at a crossing is so dangerous or excessive as to constitute negligence must depend upon the circumstances and the conditions involved, etc., which must be determined by the jury.

As to the right of the jury to accept negative rather than positive testimony concerning the giving of signals, we need only refer to Jones v. Southern Pacific Company, 74 Cal. App. 10, 239 P. 429, and the late case of Switzer v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co.

et. al. (Cal. App.) 285 P. 918, where the cases on this subject are quoted and referred to.

The next assignments of error necessary to be considered relate to the giving and refusal of instructions. The court, of its own motion, in relation to the speed of the train, instructed the jury as follows: "The speed of the train, standing alone, does not constitute negligence, and you cannot base a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, under the evidence in this case, upon proof of excessive speed of the train, unless you also believe from the evidence that the defendants failed to give appropriate warning signals of the approach of the train to said crossing, and that deceased Johnson was not guilty of negligence." Excessive speed must be considered in relation to the circumstances, but the error is in favor of the appellants. And further that: "In cases where the question of excessive speed is in controversy, it is a question of fact for the jury to decide." The court further instructed the jury that: "Negligence is omitting to do something which a reasonably prudent person would do under the circumstances." And that: "If you believe from all the evidence in the case that the defendants failed and neglected to give such signal and warning of the approach of the train to the First street crossing in Chico, as required by law, as a reasonably prudent person would have done under the conditions and circumstances prevailing at the time, and that Hal-lie Lindsley Johnson was killed by reason thereof, then the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict at your hands, unless the defendants make out the defense of contributory negligence, as elsewhere explained in the instructions." What would constitute contributory negligence on the part of the deceased was then set forth. The jury was also instructed that, the deceased riding as a guest with Jack Salyer, if the jury believed he was so riding, and had no control over the management of the automobile, the negligence of Salyer could not be attributed to the deceased Johnson. The court instructed the jury in accordance with the wording of section 486 of the Civil Code, and therefore we do not think that the objection to the words "as provided by law," inserted by the court in the instruction relative to the giving of signals, constituted error, or, if error, not of sufficient significance to warrant reversal. Nor is the objection of the appellants as to the instruction wherein reference is made to the life expectancy of the deceased of any moment, as the only testimony in the case was just as stated in the instruction.

[7] The court also instructed the jury that they could not find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff unless they believed "from the evidence that said negligence, if any, was the sole, efficient and proximate cause of the collision of the train with the automobile, resulting in the death of Hallie L. Johnson, and that said Hallie L. Johnson was not guilty of any contributory negligence on his part." This, of course, was a far more favorable instruction for the defendants than one to which they were entitled, the law being that, where two joint tort-feasors, by their concurrent acts, result in the death of a third person, an action for damages may be maintained. Thus, if the negligence of the defendants and the negligence of Jack Salyer, concurrent in point of time and act, resulted in the death of Johnson, liability would be fixed on the defendants, even though there was a concurrent negligent act on the part of Salyer, unless there was some contributory negligence on the part of the deceased.

[8] A review of the instructions given, without further particularizing the different ones, leads to the conclusion that no cause for reversal exists by reason of the giving of any of them. The appellants set forth in this behalf the refusal of the court to give three instructions which we will copy. Defendants' proposed instruction No. 11 is in these words: "The driver of the automobile involved in this action was guilty of gross negligence, that is, a total lack of care in approaching and going upon the crossing immediately in front of the train involved in this action, and had it not been for this negligence on the part of the driver, no collision would have resulted between the train and the automobile. If you believe from the evidence that such negligence on the part of said driver was the proximate cause of the collision, you will render your verdict for the defendants in this action." Besides being an instruction upon the facts, this instruction omits all the elements which we have considered relative to the negligence of the defendants, and the question whether, notwithstanding his gross negligence in failing to stop, look, and listen, the driver would not have stopped had the required signals of the approach of the train been given.

Defendants' proposed instruction No. 13 reads: "If you believe from the evidence in this case that the decedent Hallie L. Johnson was in such condition, by reason of the use of intoxicating liquor, that he was unable to exercise the care an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under the circumstances shown in evidence, you must find him guilty of contributory negligence in wholly entrusting his care and safety to the driver of the automobile, and must render your verdict for the defendants."

Defendants' proposed instruction No. 14 is in these words: "You are instructed that a person who rides as a guest in an automobile which is driven by a person who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor, is guilty of negligence, and if you believe from the evidence in this case that the driver of the automobile in question was under the influence of liquor, and that the decedent Hallie L. Johnson, knew that he was under the influence of liquor, then I instruct you that for Hallie L. Johnson to ride in said automobile was negligence in and of itself, which precludes a recovery in this case by the plaintiffs and your verdict must be for the defendants."

[9] Instruction No. 13 above set forth scarcely calls for comment. It certainly is not the law that an intoxicated person may not ride as a guest in an automobile without placing himself at the mercy of every negligent person who may also be using the same highway. If instruction No. 13 is the law, no intoxicated person could be safely taken home while in that state. The intoxication of a guest alone does not take away from him all the protection accorded by the laws of the state, and he is not liable to be killed or injured with impunity, as this instruction would imply.

[10, 11] Defendants' proposed instruction No. 14 is somewhat nearer the law, but is not a correct statement thereof. It does not include the negligent driving of the person who is under the influence of liquor. Section 112 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553) makes it unlawful for any one to drive a motor vehicle while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, and thus per se, makes it negligence for one in that condition to drive a motorcar, and likewise the knowledge of such intoxication of the driver on the part of the guest is a question of contributory negligence on his part for the jury to determine.

[12-14] Again, a correct instruction in relation to intoxication must be based upon the injury occurring by reason of the negligent operation of the person who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor. In the recent case of Jones v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 285 P. 709, 713, this court reviewed at some length the cases bearing upon the intoxication of automobile drivers. We therein pointed out, where it was shown that the driver of the car was under the influence of liquor, and that the accident was due to his contributory negligence or the manner in which the car was driven by reason of the use of intoxicating liquor, and also the further fact that the plaintiff in that case knew that the driver of the car was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. We also called attention in that case to the language of the California Vehicle Act, which reads, "under the influence of intoxicating liquor"—not that the driver must actually be intoxicated or in a drunken condition, but that he is driving while under the influence of an intoxicant. We there quoted from the case of Schwartz v. Johnson, 152 Tenn. 586, 280 S. W. 32, 47 A. L. R. 323, the following language: "When one gets into an automobile which is to be operated by a drunken driver, through the traffic of a populous city, such person takes his life in his hands. All the authorities are to the effect that such contributory negligence prevents a recovery by one taking such a chance, if he is injured as a result of the driver's negligence"—citing a number of cases. The injury, however, must be due to the result of the driver's negligence. We think it also true that, if the injury is due to the joint result of the driver's negligence and the concurrent negligence of a third person, the guest in the automobile, knowing of the driver's condition, would likewise be chargeable with contributory negligence in riding with the driver under the influence of intoxicating liquor. That the proposed instruction simply, in part, followed the language of the statute, without defining the degree of the influence of the intoxicant, does not seem to militate against its correctness. This question was presented in the case of People v. McKee, 80 Cal. App. 200, 251 P. 675, and it was there held that an instruction following the language of the statute was unobjectionable. Whether the degree of intoxication need be specified in the instruction would seem to be questioned in the case of Trotter v. Bullock, 148 Wash. 516, 269 P. 825, 826, where the Supreme Court of Washington uses this language (after mentioning the fact that intoxicating liquor has a different effect upon different mentalities): "Nor can substantial dispute arise over the claim that one who partakes of liquor, even in a moderate degree, is not able to drive a car with the same degree of judgment as if he was wholly sober. While the modern automobile is a machine that may be driven by one with a very ordinary amount of mechanical knowledge, its extreme flexibility, which permits almost instant response to the action of the driver, makes it an exceedingly dangerous instrumentality to intrust to one not in the full possession of all of his faculties"—citing Crowell v. Duncan, 145 Va. 489, 134 S. E. 576, 50 A. L. R. 1425. The court then refers to the common fact that one who is careful and competent as an operator of an automobile, when perfectly sober, may become incompetent and reckless after indulgence in one or two drinks. The question of driving an automobile when under the influence of liquor is quite fully considered in the case of Crowell v. Duncan, as reported in A. L. R. supra.

The case of Jensen v. Chicago Ry. Co., 133 Wash. 208, 233 P. 635, contains an instruction approved by the Supreme Court of Washington, which refers to the fact that the intoxicating liquor must to some degree weaken the judgment, lessen the discretion, or increase the recklessness, of the driver. But, if all of these elements, or any of them, may be said to be implied in the use of the term "under the influence of intoxicating liquor," the proposed instruction is nevertheless an incorrect statement of the law. There is testimony in the record from which the jury might conclude that Jack Salyer was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, within the prohibitory provisions of section 112 of the California Vehicle Act, and that the deceased had knowledge thereof, and also that the deceased, by his own act, aided in placing the driver of the automobile under such influence, and, if the requested instruction had correctly stated the law, we are not prepared to say that such an instruction would not have had some bearing upon the verdict of the jury.

[15] It is further contended by appellants that, if the instruction is incorrect, it should have been modified and given by the court. This contention, however, appears to be without merit. In Garlick v. Bowers, 66 Cal. 122, 4 P. 1138, the court disposed of such a contention as follows: "The plaintiff requested the court to give several instructions which were not given. We think none of them should have been given without modification, and that of itself constituted sufficient ground for the refusal." The question of whether the driver of the "Moon" automobile was under the influence of intoxicating liquor was not presented by the pleadings. It was a special issue brought out by the testimony.

In Sherman v. Kirkpatrick, 83 Cal. App. 307, 256 P. 570, it was held that: "The trial court need not, of its own motion, give special instructions in the absence of a request therefor by counsel."

In Dover v. Archambeault, 57 Cal. App. 659, 208 P. 178, the question of what duty devolved upon the court in considering erroneous proposed instructions, we find the following language: "Moreover, the proposed instruction omitted the element of negligence in operation of the car. Where instructions offered are such that they cannot properly be given without modification, that of itself constitutes a sufficient ground for refusing them." Citing the case of Garlick v. Bowers, supra.

Upon the same point as to the duty of the court, reference may be had to 3 C. J. p. 850 et seq. See, also, as to "Necessity for requests," 24 Cal. Jur., p. 796, § 74. Under these authorities it must be held that the failure of the court to instruct on the subject of the use of intoxicating liquor was due to the failure of the appellants to propose a proper instruction, and therefore cannot now be assigned as error.

Other reasons have been assigned as error which we have not discussed, but we will content ourselves with the simple statement that they have been fully considered, and we find nothing in any of the assignments of error justifying a reversal. No contention is made that the damages allowed are excessive.

The judgment is affirmed.

DOW et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
Civ. 3991.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

April 26, 1930.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing May 26, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court
June 23, 1930.

4. Railroads ⇨350(11).

Pleadings and evidence, in action for death of guest riding in automobile struck by train at street crossing, held to raise issue of fact as to train's speed.

Complaint alleged that defendants carelessly and negligently caused one of their regular passenger trains to approach crossing and then and there pass over track at very high and dangerous rate of speed. Answer did not actually deny high rate of speed, but denied that defendants carelessly and negligently caused train to pass over track at very high or dangerous rate of speed. Cause was tried on theory that complaint sufficiently alleged train was being operated at negligent rate of speed and that defendants had sufficiently denied same.

2. Trial ⇨296(3).

Instruction, in action for death of guest in automobile struck by train at street crossing, eliminating issue of speed of train, held reversible error, notwithstanding further instruction.

Instruction complained of told jury, in substance, that railroad had right to operate trains at any rate of speed, except where such speed was limited by law, and further instructed jury that there was no law of the state, county, or city regulating speed of trains over crossing in question. Subsequent instruction advised jury that railroad was required to operate trains over obstructed crossing with due regard to safety of persons who might be using crossing.

3. Appeal and error ⇨930(2).

Where instructions are conflicting, appellate court cannot presume jury disregarded erroneous instruction and followed proper instruction.

4. Railroads ⇨316(2).

Speed of train proper in open country might be highly dangerous and constitute negligence as matter of law in city or thickly populated center.

5. Railroads ⇨316(2).

Whether speed of train, absent statute or ordinance regulating same, constitutes negligence, depends on circumstances and place.

6. Railroads ⇨350(11).

Whether speed of train in well built-up or populated section of city constitutes negligence is question for jury.

7. Railroads ⇨346(5).

Law presumes that automobile guest will exercise reasonable care, but does not require him to interfere with management of machine.

8. Railroads ⇨350(21).

Whether speed of train prevented automobile guest from exercising reasonable care for his own safety after danger of collision became imminent held for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Ada Carline Dow, individually and as guardian ad litem for Bernice Dow, a minor, against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellants.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, and J. D. Peters, of Chico, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J.

The defendants had judgment in an action prosecuted by the plaintiffs to obtain damages suffered by them for and on account of the death of Percy Everett Dow, on the 24th day of December, 1926, alleged to have been caused by the carelessness and negligence of the defendants. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The complaint in this action, after alleging a number of preliminary matters unnecessary to be set forth herein, contains two paragraphs specially involved upon this appeal. These paragraphs are as follows:

"V. That on the 24th day of December, 1926, said Percy Everett Dow was traveling as a passenger in an automobile and along the public highway on First Street, in Chico, Butte County, California, from an easterly to a westerly direction, near and at a point where said First Street crosses the right of way of said Southern Pacific Company. That as said Percy Everett Dow had reached said crossing and was using and exercising due care on his own behalf for his own safety, the said defendants carelessly and negligently caused one of its regular passenger-carrying trains, with locomotive attached, owned and operated by the defendant Southern Pacific Company, and then and there in charge of and being driven by the defendant William Edgar Field, then and there the regularly employed engineer of said defendant Company, and Joseph Wilson Laurant, then and there the regularly employed fireman of said defendant-Company, at the time on said Railroad, to approach said crossing, and then and there pass over the track of said Railroad at a very high and dangerous rate of speed, and said defendants negligently and carelessly omitted the duty incumbent upon them and which they owed the said Percy Everett Dow, while approaching said crossing, to give any signal by ringing any bell or sounding any steam whistle, as provided by law, and that by reason of said negligence and carelessness, the said Percy Everett Dow was unaware of the approach of the said railroad train.

"VI. That said steam train complained of herein, was traveling in a southerly direction, and was approaching said crossing, and was being operated and driven in a negligent and careless manner, at a high, rapid and dangerous rate of speed, through Chico, and over said highway crossing at said point."

This action is a companion case to that of Ethel G. Johnson et al. v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. App.) 288 P. 81. Both cases are based upon practically the same state of facts, save and except as otherwise stated herein, and the opinion in the Johnson Case is hereby referred to as containing a statement of the facts shown by the testimony in this case as fully and completely as though recopied herein.

In addition to what we have recited of the testimony in the Johnson Case, the transcript in this case shows that the deceased, Percy Everett Dow, was riding as a guest in an automobile owned and operated by Jack Salyer, and came to his death by a collision which occurred about 12:30 a. m. on the morning of December 24, 1926, between the automobile driven by Jack Salyer and the locomotive drawing train No. 13, owned and operated by the defendant corporation. The transcript further shows that First street in the city of Chico where the collision occurred is one of the main arteries or highways; that said street is a well-paved and much-traveled street, connecting, as it does, the east and west sides of the Sacramento valley leading to the city of Chico; the population of the city of Chico being estimated at about 14,000. The record shows, without much contradiction, that First street crossing in the city of Chico comes within the class of what is generally termed a "blind crossing"; all four corners of the crossing being well built up, and the approach of a train from the north being obscured from the view of one traveling easterly on First street. The record in this case likewise establishes that, after the locomotive struck the automobile being driven by Jack Salyer, it carried the automobile on the pilot a distance of about 1,000 feet. The record further shows that Percy Everett Dow occupied the rear seat of the automobile driven by Jack Salyer. The collision resulted in the immediate death of Percy Everett Dow. Ada Carline Dow is the widow of the deceased, and Bernice Dow is a minor daughter of the deceased and of the plaintiff Ada Carline Dow.

At the request of the defendants, the court gave the following instruction, designated as "Instruction No. 7," which is assigned as error, to wit:

"You are instructed that a Railroad Company has the right to operate its trains at any rate of speed, except where such speed is limited by law, and you are further instructed that there is no law of the State of California, or of the County of Butte, or of the City of Chico, regulating the speed of trains over the First Street crossing in the City of Chico." In addition to the testimony set out in the opinion in the Johnson Case, relative to the speed at which the train was traveling, we herewith set forth the testimony of the engineer operating the locomotive of train No. 13 at the time of the collision which shows a somewhat different state of facts, as to the question of speed, shown by the testimony in the Johnson Case. The testimony of the engineer is as follows:

"Q. You mean the speed restriction of the Company? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What was it? A. 50 miles an hour.

"Q. 50 miles an hour? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In other words, the Company restricts you to 50 miles an hour, and you believe, as an engineer, if you were late, you had a right to make up that time by going across crossings at 50 miles an hour? A. I don't believe it but I know it.

"Q. Now, is it not a fact that the curve you have reference to is where the track straightens out just a little above the bridge? A. I don't know how far it is; I don't remember how far it is.

"Q. You don't know how far it is? A. It is as I said here.

"Q. Pardon me, Mr. Field. Did you begin first to reduce your speed when you got around that curve? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you did that to reduce your speed going into the station, didn't you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Why didn't you reduce your speed to go over that crossing? A. Because there is neither rule nor law that requires it to be done.

"Q. So you thought, did you, Mr. Field, that you had a perfect right to drive over that crossing at First Street, at that hour of the night or day, at any rate of speed up to 50 miles an hour? A. So far as the rules were concerned."

In so far as what the engineer thought, the testimony might have been objected to as immaterial, but it is produced here as bearing upon the question of speed. The testimony shows, without any contradiction, that, prior to the reduction of speed, the train had been running at from 45 to 48 miles per hour. In the Johnson Case the testimony indicated that the first reduction of speed was had further from the crossing, just how far is not definitely stated. Here the testimony shows that the reduction of speed was had just as the engine rounded the curve, and came upon the straight track leading to the crossing. Other testimony in the case shows that the distance of the curve from the crossing, or, rather, the distance from the crossing to where the track curved gently to the westward, is 600 feet. From this fact the jury may well have concluded that the rate of speed when train No. 13 reached First street crossing was much in excess of 30 miles per hour, as testified to by the engineer and fireman.

[1] Upon this appeal it is contended by respondents that the rate of speed at which the train No. 13 was being operated was not really put in issue, and therefore, if it be conceded that the instruction which we have set forth is erroneous, no prejudice has resulted. The contention of the respondents in this particular, however, does not appear to be well taken. Paragraph V, while not a model pleading, does, when stripped of unnecessary verbiage, contain the following allegation relative to speed: "The defendants carelessly and negligently caused one of the regular passenger trains, with locomotive attached, owned and operated by defendants, Southern Pacific Company, to approach said crossing, and then and there pass over the track of said railroad at a very high and dangerous rate of speed." The paragraph then contains a further allegation as to the negligence of the defendants in not giving any signals.

[2] Paragraph VI contains an allegation that the train was being operated and driven in a negligent and careless manner, at a high, rapid, and dangerous rate of speed, through the city of Chico and over said highway crossing. The answer of the defendants does not really deny the high rate of speed. The clerk's transcript shows the denial to be in the following language: "Deny that defendants carelessly and negligently caused the regular passenger-carrying train with locomotive attached * * * to pass over the track of said railroad at a very high or dangerous rate of speed." An examination of the transcript, however, shows that the cause was tried upon the theory that the complaint sufficiently alleged that the train was being operated over First street crossing at a negligent rate of speed, and that the defendants had sufficiently denied the same, and therefore the question of speed was an issue of fact in the case. That instruction No. VII eliminated this issue from consideration by the jury must be conceded. By the instruction the court told the jury that a railroad company possesses the right to operate its trains at any rate of speed, except where such speed is limited by law, and then informed the jury that there was no law of the state of California, or of the county of Butte, or of the city of Chico regulating the same. From this instruction the jury could not very well conclude otherwise than that, at the time and place in question, the defendants had the right to operate train No. 13 at any rate of speed it saw fit. This instruction is not a correct statement of the law. The fact that the Legislature has not, nor has the county of Butte, nor the city of Chico, attempted to regulate the rate of speed over the crossing in question, does not open the gates to any rate of speed which either the company or the defendants' agents might see fit. Being an obstructed crossing, or a crossing in which the approach of the train is more or less obstructed, the record showing sufficient testimony from which the jury might very well conclude that the approach of a train from the north could not be perceived or seen by any one traveling in a westerly direction until a point was reached about 58 feet from the center of the main line on which the train was approaching, an entirely different situation is presented from that where a train is being propelled through an open country. The testimony shows that First street is a much-used highway, and that the crossing is in the vicinity of a rather thickly populated section of the city.

In the annotation to the case of St. Louis & San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Moore et al., as reported in Ann. Cas. 1914B, 597, we find the law relative to the two situations very aptly stated, to wit: "The running of a train at a high rate of speed over a grade crossing in the country is not ordinarily deemed negligence"—citing a number of cases. And then: "The fact that the view of one approaching a railroad crossing is obstructed may make it negligence to propel a train across such a crossing at a high rate of speed"—citing a number of cases.

In Bilton v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 148 Cal. 443, 83 P. 440, 442, the Supreme Court, in effect, approves just what we have here stated. In that case the following language appears in the opinion: "It is true that, in the absence of any statute or ordinance on the subject, no rate of speed is negligence per se. When taken in connection with other circumstances, however, the situation is very different. We can conceive of cases where, independent of any statute or ordinance, a speed of 35 miles an hour in approaching a crossing would, under the circumstances there existing, be so dangerous as at once to force all sensible and impartial men to the conclusion that those operating the train were not using reasonable care to avoid injury to others, and thus constitute negligence per se. However this may be, there can be no doubt that the question as to whether or not a rate of speed at a crossing is so dangerous or excessive as to constitute negligence must depend upon the particular circumstances there existing, and, if the circumstances are such that reasonable and impartial men may well differ as to whether the speed maintained at the particular place showed a want of reasonable care, the question as to whether the railroad company was guilty of negligence in maintaining such speed is one for the jury."

[3, 4] The respondents call our attention to plaintiffs' instruction No. 15, and present the argument that this instruction cures any error in the giving of defendants' instruction No. 7. This argument, however, does not appear to us to be logical. By instruction No. 7 the jury was advised that the company possessed the right to propel its train at any rate of speed it saw fit. By instruction No. 15 the jury was advised that the defendant company was required to run its train across First street crossing in Chico with due regard to the safety of persons who might be using said crossing, etc. This must be read in connection with instruction No. 7 which eliminates the issue of speed from the management of the train. If it does not have this effect, then and in that case the two instructions are conflicting, and we cannot presume that the jury disregarded instruction No. 7 and followed instruction No. 15. Hoffman v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. App.) 281 P. 681. This case also shows that the question of speed is for the jury. The only manner in which these instructions could be read together is, as we have stated, that the jury was advised that the defendants were required to operate their trains over the crossing in question, with due regard to the safety of persons using the same, not considering the issue of speed. In other words, if the defendants took the other ordinary precautions to insure the safety of persons using the crossing, then and in that case it might propel its trains over First street crossing at any rate of speed. This is not the law. A rate of speed which would be perfectly proper in an open country would be highly dangerous, and in some instances so dangerous as to be negligence as a matter of law. The conditions and circumstances are to be taken into consideration, and a rule which has no application in an open country may have binding effect and restrictive powers in thickly populated centers.

In Cooper v. L. A. Ry. Co., 137 Cal. 229, 70 P. 11, 13, where the rate of speed of a train through a city of the sixth class was being considered, the court said: "Whether the rate of speed was reckless as well as dangerous was for the jury to determine from all the evidence. Certainly, the court was not warranted in saying, as a matter of law, that 30 miles an hour was not a reckless rate of speed for a train to make within the boundaries of a city of the sixth class." Being of the sixth class, the conclusion is reasonable that the city there referred to was less in population than the city of Chico at the time of the accident involved herein.

The recent case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Stephens (C. C. A.) 24 F.(2d) 182, does not in any wise limit the rule relative to the propelling of trains through cities or relatively thickly populated districts. In the Stephens Case the crossing where the collision occurred was in the country, and was a crossing which would be generally spoken of as unobstructed, and where one approaching the crossing could from time to time see, likewise, the approach of a train. Under such circumstances it was held that a speed of 50 miles per hour did not present the question of negligence as an issue for the jury to decide. With this holding we readily agree.

In Young v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 279 P. 438, 440 (see, also, 283 P. 61), the court spoke of the rule there being considered as follows: While it is well established that proof of a given high rate of speed, in the absence of a statute or ordinance, does not establish negligence per se, it is equally well established that a car traveling at the same high rate of speed is not necessarily operated in a manner free from negligence.

[5, 6] The cases which we have cited, and the following cases from which we will not quote, establish the law in this state that whether a given rate of speed, in the absence of a statute or ordinance regulating the same, is or is not negligence, depends upon the circumstances and the place where the train is being operated, and, if the train is being operated in a well-built up or populated section of a city, it is an issue for the jury as to whether the speed of the train involved constituted negligence as a matter of fact. Wyckoff v. Southern Pacific Co., 4 Cal. App. 94, 87 P. 203; Burr v. United Rys. of San Francisco, 163 Cal. 663, 126 P. 873; Ellis v. Central California Traction Co., 37 Cal. App. 390, 174 P. 407; Badostain v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 83 Cal. App. 290, 256 P. 576. See, also, cases cited in Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co. et al., heretofore referred to in this opinion involving the same crossing and accident. Other cases might be cited, but the foregoing we deem sufficient.

In support of their contention that the giving of instruction No. 7 constituted no error, the respondents call attention to the case of Davenport v. Waters (Ga. App.) 148 S. E. 772. The instruction in that case, however, is readily distinguishable from the one under consideration. The opinion in the case of Davenport v. Waters sets forth the instruction, which reads: "There is no law in this State regulating the speed of trains approaching public crossings. The law as to trains approaching public crossings is as set forth in the Code section which I have just read to you in the charge.' The judge had just read to the jury as a part of his charge the language of the act of 1918. * * * That section sets forth the duty of a railroad engineer when his train is approaching public crossings. It requires him to blow for the crossings, to maintain a constant and vigilant lookout along the track ahead of the engine while approaching a crossing, and to otherwise exercise due care in order to avoid injuring any person or property on the crossing or at any point on the track within 50 feet of the crossing. However, there is no specific provision regulating the speed of trains approaching public crossings, and the charge complained of was not error."

Respondents also cite the case of Eaton v. Southern Pacific Co., 22 Cal. App. 461, 134 P. 801, 806, where the court refused to give the following instruction: "A speed of 15 or 20 miles an hour is not of itself negligent." And the further instruction: "No unusual speed of the engine could have misled the plaintiff unless he saw or heard the engine and undertook to cross ahead of it, and to make such an attempt and fail is conclusive evidence of contributory negligence." The speed of the train was not involved in that action, but, if it had been, there is nothing in what is said concerning the instruction, pertinent to the case at bar. In the Waters Case the instruction as quoted shows clearly that it had reference only to some statute regulating the speed at crossings, and it may be conceded that there is no law in this state which regulated the speed of the train involved in this action, but that is readily distinguishable from an instruction that tells the jury that a railroad company has the right to operate its trains at any rate of speed it may see fit, except where the speed is limited by law, referring to regulations imposed either by statute or ordinance. Such is the effect of the given instruction.

[7, 8] Again, it is argued at considerable length that, even though the train was passing over First street at a high rate of speed, the speed had nothing to do with the collision. This is all based upon the negligence of the driver of the automobile with whom Dow was riding as a guest. The argument presented is on the theory that Dow is held to the same liability and responsibility as the driver of the car. The decisions, however, are all to the contrary, and are so numerous that they need not be cited. The law presumes that a guest riding in an automobile will take reasonable precautions to protect himself from injury, but does not require him to interfere with the management of a machine over which he has no control. Applying the doctrine that Dow was under the necessity of using reasonable precautions to protect himself, and following the presumption that one takes such precautions, it was for the jury to determine whether the speed of the train was such that Dow was prevented from exercising such precautions, after the danger became imminent, or whether he was prevented from taking the last chance to save himself. The evidence is conflicting as to the ringing of the bell; and, as to the blowing of the whistle, the evidence in this case, just as in the Johnson Case, shows that the signals were not sounded as required by section 486 of the Civil Code.

A considerable portion of the briefs of counsel for both appellants and respondents is devoted to arguing the effect of the testimony introduced, but, as we cannot say that the withdrawal of the question of speed in connection with the other acts set forth relative to the operation of the train was not prejudicial, it would serve no useful purpose to follow the arguments of counsel as to what it was claimed on one side that the evidence establishes, and asserted on the other that the evidence proves.

It is sufficient to say that our attention has not been called to anything which cures the error committed by the giving of the instruction known as "Number 7," withdrawing from the consideration of the jury one of the issues involved in the action upon which the jury alone was entitled to pass.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Frances M. Wulferdinger against the Pickwick Stages System. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion for diminution of record.

Motion denied.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is a motion on the part of the appellant for a diminution of the record by requiring the court reporter to certify as a part of the transcript of testimony the deposition of the plaintiff which was duly taken pursuant to law prior to the trial. The appeal was perfected pursuant to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] It is asserted that this deposition is a proper and necessary part of the record, since it was offered in evidence by the appellant under section 2022 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and for impeachment purposes. It was, however, properly rejected by the court. This court may not direct it to be certified as a part of the record on appeal for two reasons. It does not impeach the witness upon the ground claimed by the appellant. It was not marked for identification during the progress of the trial.

[3-5] The appeal was taken from a judgment for plaintiff for injuries sustained while riding as a passenger in the auto stage of the defendant. Prior to the trial her deposition was duly taken and returned to the court in the manner provided by statute. The plaintiff was called and examined at the trial as a witness in her own behalf. With respect to the speed of the stage upon which she was riding at the time of the accident in question she testified: "Q. At what speed was the car going when you passed that bridge (just before the accident)? A. Well, it was going faster—faster than we were coming from the Springs; I should say perhaps forty-five miles an hour." Upon cross-examination the plaintiff was asked no question regarding the speed of the stage. Subsequently, as a part of the defendant's case, the deposition of the plaintiff was offered in evidence under the provisions of section 2022 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Counsel for the defendant stated that he wished to read it as the testimony of the plaintiff which was taken pursuant to section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon objection this was refused. By permission of the court she was then called by the defendant and further cross-examined under the provisions of the last-mentioned section. Having had an opportunity to fully cross-examine the witness upon this subject-matter, the right to further cross-examine her in this manner was discretionary with the court. Section 2050, Code Civ. Proc. Upon further cross-examination the witness was asked if in the giving of her deposition she did not say, "The bus was going along at a rate of speed of about thirty-five miles an hour until about seven miles before we came to Ukiah, where it left the road and went down into a river bed, * * *" to which inquiry she replied, "If that's my deposition, I must have said it; I don't remember." This was not a denial that she had made the statement read to her from the deposition. Moreover, the deposition was not thereafter offered to impeach her. No purpose for reading the deposition in evidence except to impeach the plaintiff upon her testimony with respect to the speed of the stage was assigned. When the reading of the deposition was first offered by the defendant, the attention of the court was not called to any material subject-matter which it contained that was not fully covered by her previous oral examination at the trial. The deposition of the witness having been taken under subdivision (1) of section 2021 of the Code of Civil Procedure as a party to the action, the defendant would have been entitled to read it in evidence, notwithstanding her personal appearance at the trial, provided it contained anything material to the issues which were not covered by her oral examination at the trial. It is not claimed any such omitted evidence is contained in the deposition. The permission to read the deposition of a witness, under section 2022 of the Code of Civil Procedure, when he is a party to the action and all the material evidence therein contained has been fully covered by an examination of the witness at the trial, is discretionary with the court. Section 2050 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to this sort of an examination like the re-examination of the same witness at the trial of the case. That section provides that: "A witness once examined cannot be re-examined as to the same matter without leave of the court, but he may be re-examined as to any new matter upon which he has been examined by the adverse party. And after the examinations on both sides are once concluded, the witness cannot be recalled without leave of the court. Leave is granted or withheld, in the exercise of a sound discretion."

[6] Moreover, this deposition was not marked or requested to be marked for identification. Documents which are not a part of the judgment roll must be authenticated by the proper court officer as having been used or referred to at the trial, to entitle them to become a part of the transcript on appeal. In the Estate of Broome, 169 Cal. 604, 147 P. 270, 271, it is said: "It is axiomatic that papers not properly authenticated as having been used on a hearing * * * cannot be considered on appeal." The motion for a diminution of the record is denied.

PEOPLE v. DAVIS. *

Cr. 1884.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

April 22, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 6, 1930.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 22, 1930.

1. Criminal law ⇨507½.

In prosecution of deputy district attorney for receiving bribe, testimony of prosecuting witness held to show he was accomplice required to be corroborated (Pen. Code, § 1111).

The testimony of the prosecuting witness was to the effect that the deputy district attorney asked the prosecuting witness to ask a defendant in a criminal prosecution to give attorney bribe money, and that the bribe, when paid, was paid by such defendant through the prosecuting witness to the deputy district attorney.

2. Criminal law ⇨511(1).

Evidence corroborating accomplice must be effective for more than merely raising suspicion of defendant's guilt (Pen. Code, § 1111).

3. Criminal law ⇨511(2).

Corroborating evidence is sufficient to support conviction if it, of itself, tends to connect defendant with offense (Pen. Code, § 1111).

4. Criminal law ⇨696(3).

Refusal to strike out testimony offered to show consciousness of guilt by conduct in face of accusation held error, it not being shown that defendant understood he was accused of criminal act.

5. Criminal law ⇨407(2).

Before failure to deny statement can be received as evidence of admission of guilt, it must appear that accused understands he is accused of criminal act.

6. Criminal law ⇨683(1).

Where witness testified concerning conversation with another over defendant's objection, refusing to permit the other to deny conversation held error.

7. Criminal law ⇨511(1).

In prosecution of deputy district attorney for receiving bribe, corroboration of accomplice held insufficient to support conviction (Pen. Code, § 1111).

8. Criminal law ⇨814(3).

Submitting case on theory evidence would authorize conviction of asking for bribe held erroneous, there being no evidence to support theory.

9. Criminal law ⇨1186(4).

Errors occurring in prosecution of deputy district attorney for receiving bribe held to require reversal, evidence being weak and unsatisfactory (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

10. Criminal law ⇨1186(4).

Where errors have been committed and it is doubtful whether without errors defendant would have been convicted, errors require reversal (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Emmet H. Wilson, Judge.

Harold L. Davis was convicted of crime of asking, agreeing to receive, and receiving a bribe, and he appeals.

Reversed.

Jerry Giesler, Paul B. D'Orr, and Thomas A. Reynolds, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J.

In the indictment it is charged, and the record shows, that at the times to which the indictment refers the defendant was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting chief deputy district attorney of the county of Los Angeles; that at and during said time there were pending undetermined in the superior court of said county two certain criminal actions wherein the defendants were charged with the commission of felonious crimes; that the defendant Davis, as such chief deputy district attorney, was charged with the duty of prosecuting said criminal actions; and that one E. H. Rosenberg was one of the defendants in each of said criminal actions. In one of these actions, No. 31043, the defendants, S. C. Lewis, E. H. Rosenberg, Jacob Berman alias Jack Bennett, were accused of the crime of conspiracy to obtain money by false pretense, and of the crime of conspiracy to violate the corporate securities act. In the other of said actions, No. 31044, I. L. Rouse, E. H. Rosenberg et al., were charged with the crime of conspiracy to violate the act to regulate the interest of money, known as the Usury Law. The indictment against Davis charges that on or about the 15th day of August, 1927, said Davis knowingly, etc., did ask, agree to receive, and did receive from the said E. H. Rosenberg, also known as Ed Rosenberg, charged as a defendant in said actions 31043 and 31044, and from one Ben Getzoff, a bribe, to wit, the sum of $7,500, with a corrupt intent, and an agreement thereupon then and there made that the action of him, the said Davis, as chief deputy district attorney, would be knowingly, willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, and feloniously influenced thereby, in that he, the said Davis, then agreed that as such chief deputy district attorney, he would control and direct the prosecution of each and both of said causes so pending, to the end and in the manner that in so far as each and both of said causes related to the said E. H. Rosenberg, that each and both of said causes would be disposed of in such manner as to result in the discharge of the said E. H. Rosenberg without conviction. Upon trial of this cause before a jury, defendant Davis was found guilty as charged in the information. Pursuant to that judgment he has been sentenced to imprisonment for the term prescribed by law. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

There is no evidence of any direct negotiation or transaction between appellant and Ed Rosenberg in relation to the alleged crime of appellant. If there were any such negotiations or transactions, they occurred between appellant and one Ben Getzoff acting as some kind of agent or go-between in said negotiations and in the alleged payment of the bribe. The prosecution is in no position to claim that the defendant ever did anything to comply with his supposed corrupt agreement; for if any of the evidence for the prosecution could be given that construction, it would follow that the court erred in refusing the offered evidence concerning his actual conduct, some of which defendant was not allowed to produce. The first and foremost contention of appellant is based upon the proposition that Ben Getzoff, according to his testimony, was an accomplice in the commission of the crime charged against appellant. It is further contended by appellant that "the evidence is legally insufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty as there is no legal corroboration of Ben Getzoff, the only witness who testifies to any of the essentials of the crime charged, and who is an accomplice, according to his own testimony."

In order to obtain a clear understanding of the most important elements of fact in the case, and as a basis for consideration of the various errors alleged to have been committed at the trial, it is necessary to have before us the testimony of Ben Getzoff. We shall here summarize that testimony as we find it in the record. In making this summary it should be understood that we are not quoting his exact words, except where they are placed within quotation marks. Ben Getzoff said: For some years I have been engaged in the tailoring business in the city of Los Angeles. In the year 1925 the defendant Davis was introduced to me by Asa Keyes, the district attorney. Thereafter I met Davis at my places of business on Spring street, including my latest location at 609 South Spring street; also at his office in the Hall of Justice. I have known Ed Rosenberg for five or six years. He was introduced to me by his brother Jack Rosenberg. I have visited in the homes of the Rosenbergs and in the home of defendant Davis. In the year 1927 the Rosenbergs were engaged in the sale of stock of the Julian Petroleum Company. In May, 1927, the Julian Company was in financial difficulties. In May, 1927, I called on Davis in his office. He asked me, "What seems to be the trouble?" I told him the trouble was that Ed and Jack Rosenberg were subpoenaed before the grand jury. The defendant said: "You can talk to me about it. I have full charge of the case of the Julian Petroleum." I said, they don't want to be indicted. He said that he believed that they would be indicted. He promised that if there was any possible way he would stop the indictment, at least against Jack Rosenberg. I told him, "If you do anything for them they will appreciate it." He said, "All right, I will see what I can do."

In June there were two indictments returned against Ed Rosenberg and other defendants. That evening Davis called me up and said he had saved Jack, but Ed is indicted but not to worry about it. The next day I phoned him, and he told me to come over at 2 o'clock that day, which was Saturday. I was in his office at 2 o'clock; no one else was there. He asked me if it was really true that Ed Rosenberg is worth $3,000,000. I said, I don't know, but I do know they are wealthy. I said, what are you going to do with the indictment? He said: "It is too early in the game. Public sentiment is too strong against it right now to do anything." Later we will see what we can do. During July, 1927, I saw Davis at my place, 609 South Spring street, perhaps twice, and also saw him at his office. When I went to his office I would meet Mrs. Barrett, his secretary.

In August, 1927, Davis came to my store and told me to come to his office at 2 o'clock, which I did. When I came into his office, he asked me whether I had seen Ed Rosenberg and whether he was worried. I said yes, and he wants to know what you are going to do for his dismissal. He said, "I sure would love to dismiss Ed's case but it is time yet, don't have to worry." Then I asked him, "Buddy, is that true, you are going to run for district attorney?" And he asked me who told me, and I told him Asa Keyes told me that. He said, "That is correct." And he said, "Do you realize, Ben, it would cost me between $35,000 and $50,000 to make the run" for his office. I said "Does it take that money, Buddy?" He said, "Yes." He said, "It will take every penny of it, but," he said, "I have some friends, if they only come through with it." Then he told me, "Ben," he says, "if I want to make myself $100,000 or $200,000, I can do it right now, but," he said, "a man in my position you have got to be very careful with whom you do business."

Q. Well, what else was said, if anything? A. Then I told him, I said, "Buddy," I said, "I will tell you what I will do, I will talk to Ed Rosenberg, and I am sure that he is going to do his share." He said, "What do you mean, money?" I said, "Yes." He said, "You think he is going to come through with anything?" I said, "He is not a cheap piker, he will come through." I said, "Now, Buddy, I want to tell you something, I am going to talk to Ed as soon as I get back to the store." He picked himself up from the chair, and he says, "Do you realize, Ben—do you think, Ben," he said, "that he will come through with $10,000?" I says, "I do." He says, "That ought to be worth to him $10,000." I says, "If you will dismiss that case, Buddy," I said, "he will give you more than that, and I am sure of it."

Q. Anything else about that matter? A. Then I told him, "As soon as I get back to the store, I will get in touch with Ed Rosenberg," and I did.

After I left Mr. Davis' office I had a talk with Ed Rosenberg. Then I called up defendant Davis and said to him, "I have got what you asked for." He told me to meet him in the basement of the Hayward Hotel. A few minutes later he met me there, in the basement between the telephone booths. I said to him, "I have got for you $5,000." He said he wanted me to ask Ed Rosenberg for $2,500 more as a loan; that he had to make good on some stock he had bought on margin. I said, "All right, you can have the $5,000, and tomorrow I will get you the balance of $2,500." He said: "No I wouldn't need it tonight. You can get that tomorrow, the whole thing." Then I left and telephoned to Ed Rosenberg, and he came to my place of business. The next morning I telephoned to Buddy Davis and told him I have got the balance what he wanted. He said, "I will meet you in the same place." Later in the day he telephoned me, and we did meet in the same place, in the basement of the Hayward Hotel. (This was next door to Getzoff's tailor shop.) When I left the store I spoke to my son David, who was working in the store. I went to the appointed place. I said to Davis: "I have got the balance of $2,500 for you. That makes $7,500." I had received that sum from Ed Rosenberg. It was in seven single $1,000 bills and one $500 bill. I handed it over to Buddy Davis. He said, "The first thing tomorrow I am going to get in touch with Asa, and tell Ed not to worry anything about it, as I will take care of it." He said: "You know what I done for Jack, Ed's brother. I prevented his indictment. He knows I will do the right thing by him." I said I thought it was Asa that prevented the indictment. He said, "Asa was a liar." While we were talking there, my son came down and told me that there was an urgent call from Ed Rosenberg. Then I went out through the Spring street side, and Davis went out through the Sixth street side.

In September I saw Davis at his office, when he got back from up north. I was up to see him the morning when Jack Bennett came. We were figuring he was going to dismiss the case in September, and Ed and I were supposed to leave town for a vacation. Davis told me he doesn't get any help from Asa Keyes. That he believed that Keyes feels that Ed is guilty. I saw Davis again the following day. He said that Ace was yellow and had no backbone. After that I left Davis alone entirely. I next saw him in January. In November I went to Chicago with Mr. Keyes. We got back the latter part of November. After we got back I saw Davis again. That was in November or December. He said he was unable to fix it. "I am going to send Ace a letter of resignation, and that will bring him to time." I did not see Davis again until the trial was on, not until the day before Keyes was to deliver his argument before the jury. The trial of the case in which Ed Rosenberg was defendant ended some time in May, 1928. A day or two after the trial ended, Keyes and Davis and Jack Bennett and Ed Rosenberg and myself met in my office. They were having a few drinks and congratulating one another on the outcome of the trial. It was on Saturday. Keyes left first, then Jack Bennett, then Ed Rosenberg. Then Harold Davis said to me, "Is Ed going to come through with the balance of the $2,500?" I said to him: "You have an awful lot of nerve to ask him for the $2,500. If you want the $2,500 you have got to ask him yourself." He said, "According to the circumstances, Ben, I have done the best that I knew how to do." I had a man named Joseph Sherman working for me at the time. His cloth table was right near the window outside the office. When he worked at the cutting table he stood just by that window.

On cross-examination of the witness Ben Getzoff, he said:

"Defendant Davis visited my house on Christmas eve, in December, 1926. He and his wife and Forrest Murray came to my apartment at Wilshire and Shatto Place. Prior to May, 1927, I had been to his house twice. I had been there in the summer of 1926. My son David took me over there. Mrs. Davis was there. Davis had been to my place and asked me if I had a bottle of whiskey. He gave me his address. I went over there and gave the bottle of whiskey to him. Again I went to Davis' house. I think it was in the spring of 1927, on a Sunday. Nobody was home. My son went with me. I brought a reading lamp. I went there and left it right in that little hallway. I was there again in May or June. Jack Rosenberg's brother drove me there and I delivered some booze. Davis was not at home. His wife was at home and she accepted it. Again I was at Mr. Davis' home in 1928. It was at night. I went there with Mr. Keyes. Davis was there but not Mrs. Davis. Again I went there and delivered a piece of white flannel for his wife's skirt. That was in 1927. Jack Rosenberg drove me over there. He did not go in with me. I took two pieces of white flannel. I gave them to Davis. Mrs. Davis was there. When I first talked with Davis, in his office, in May, 1927, I told him, 'The Rosenbergs will do the right thing by you.' The lamp which I took out to Mr. Davis' house was a tall standing lamp with a shade for reading. I got the lamp from my son-in-law, who manufactures lamps. I took one to Asa Keyes the same Sunday. When I took the lamp to Davis' house I left it in the alcove in front of the house. 'There is a neighbor who lives upstairs, and the door is opened and I am going in the house, and Forrest Murray came out from the house and he says to me, Ben, you can leave the lamp stand right here in the little hall.' Also a man upstairs told me the same thing. Asa Keyes and E. H. Rosenberg and I were convicted of the crime of bribery in the Superior Court a few months ago." (Date of present testimony being July 3, 1929.)

"Q. Now, the first time that you ever told this story about having paid Mr. Davis money in consideration for his promising to do something for Ed Rosenberg was after you had been convicted of bribery in the Superior Court; isn't that true? * * * A. As soon as we were indicted for accepting or giving a bribe and when we had received our transcript, and when I read in that transcript where Buddy Davis has deliberately committed perjury, before the grand jury * * * so that is the time that I was ready * * * to go to the district attorney and tell him the whole story."

During the time of the trial before I was convicted "I told Buron Fitts (district attorney) that it doesn't make no difference whether it will be a conviction or a hung jury or an acquittal, I will tell him all about the whole transaction, and even told him about Buddy Davis, and so I done this right after we were convicted * * * and I told him the whole history of it." That was the following day after my conviction.

[1] According to the testimony of Ben Getzoff, the defendant Davis, through Getzoff, asked Rosenberg to give him bribe money. Likewise, according to that testimony, the bribe, when paid, was paid by Rosenberg, through Getzoff, to Davis. There is no evidence whatever of the asking for a bribe to be given by Getzoff, or the agreeing to receive or the receiving of a bribe from Getzoff. Undoubtedly, the testimony of Getzoff places him in the category of an accomplice. "A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof. An accomplice is hereby defined as one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given." Pen Code, § 1111. Upon the statement of facts contained in the testimony of Ben Getzoff, he was liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against Davis. Pen. Code, §§ 31 and 971; People v. Anderson, 75 Cal. App. 365, 374, 242 P. 906.

[2, 3] The evidence relied upon to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice must be effective for more than merely the raising of a suspicion of the defendant's guilt. But the corroborating evidence is sufficient if it, of itself, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, although it is slight, and entitled, when standing by itself, to but little consideration. People v. Kemp-ley, 205 Cal. 441, 456, 271 P. 478.

David Getzoff, twenty-eight years old, is a son of Ben Getzoff. During the year 1927, David was associated with his father in the tailoring business at 609 South Spring street. He testified substantially as follows:

In August, 1927, I returned from a vacation which I had taken during that month. One or two weeks after I came back from my vacation, an incident occurred with which the defendant and my father were concerned. This incident occurred in the basement of the Hayward Hotel. My father spoke to me and then went out of the store. After that I received a telephone call. Then I went to the basement of the hotel to call my father. At that place, in a little corner between the telephone booths, I saw Mr. Davis and my father. I told my father there was a phone call for him. He asked who it was, and I told him it was Ed Rosenberg. I said, "How do you do Mr. Davis," and he said, "Hello, Dave."

"Q. Did you see anything occur at that time between your father and Harold Davis as you walked toward them? A. My father handed Mr. Davis some money.

"Q. Could you tell how much it was? A. No, sir.

"Q. Could you see it? A. I saw it was money.

"Q. What did Mr. Davis do with it? A. I don't recall."

I left immediately. I did not stay there.

The foregoing testimony of David Getzoff is evidence which, if believed, would be sufficient to corroborate the testimony of Ben Getzoff upon the single fact that, at the stated time and place, money passed from the hands of Ben Getzoff to the defendant. But in view of the fact that there was in this case no evidence (other than the testimony of the accomplice) that any bribe was asked for, agreed upon, or paid—and no evidence, even in Ben Getzoff's testimony, that the defendant ever asked him, the said Ben Getzoff, for a bribe—it cannot reasonably be said that the testimony of David Getzoff had any force as evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. First, there must be the offense, the crime, the corpus delicti. If there had been evidence produced (other than that of the accomplice) that Ed Rosenberg, defendant in the criminal action then being prosecuted by Davis, had delivered money into the hands of Ben Getzoff, for payment to Davis (or, perhaps, even for some not reasonably explained purpose), then the further evidence that Ben Getzoff thereafter paid money to Davis might be sufficient to support the theory of a corrupt purpose, and so connect Davis therewith. In the absence of any evidence (other than that of Ben Getzoff) of any connection of Ed Rosenberg with the transaction, there remains no ground for claiming that the transaction said to have been observed by David Getzoff had any connection whatever with the payment of a bribe. In the absence of any corroborating evidence connecting Ed Rosenberg with the transaction, the mere delivery of "some money" (as stated by David Getzoff) by Ben Getzoff to Davis was not evidence of guilt. To make such an act criminal there must be legally sufficient evidence connecting the act with a criminal transaction, intent or purpose. "The corroborating evidence is sufficient if it, of itself, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." People v. Kemp-ley, 205 Cal. 441, 271 P. 478, 484. But it must do that much.

What other evidence has been produced that could support a verdict against the defendant in this case? Ben Getzoff testified, as we have seen, concerning a visit of appellant and appellant's wife at his home, and certain other visits of himself at the home of Davis. He further testified to certain presents made by him to Davis, or to the wife of Davis. All of these are denied both by Davis and by his wife. Mr. Forrest Murray says that he never visited the home of Ben Getzoff in company with defendant and Mrs. Davis or at all, and that he never, at any time, saw Ben Getzoff come to the house of Davis with a lamp. Mrs. Davis denies the alleged visit said to have been paid by her and the defendant to the Getzoff home. She denies the incident relating to the lamp, and denies that she has ever had such a lamp. She denies the alleged present of the white flannel goods and denies that she ever had any such materials coming from Ben Getzoff. She denies that he was ever in her home or that she ever was in his home. But let it be assumed that these incidents, or some of them, as related by the witness Ben Getzoff, did take place. They had no evidentiary force concerning the crime charged, more than to create an atmosphere of suspicion.

[4] Besides the testimony of David Getzoff, to which we have referred, the evidence offered by way of corroboration is found in the testimony of Joseph Sherman, of Mrs. Jessie Barrett, and of John J. Kessler and his wife. Sherman testified that his place of work in the Getzoff shop was not more than five feet away from a window of the office; that in June, of 1928, several days after the verdict returned in the Rosenberg case, he overheard a conversation between defendant Davis and Ben Getzoff in which he heard Davis say to Getzoff: "Why doesn't he come across with the money? I am waiting too long." Cross-examined about the date of this occurrence, Sherman said that it was several days after the verdict, "Either about two weeks or three weeks; I can't remember exactly the date." Mrs. Barrett testified that she was secretary to the defendant in his office of chief deputy district attorney during the months of May, June, July, August, and September, 1928; that she knew Ben Getzoff during that time; that he came to the office frequently and would ask for Mr. Davis and be admitted to his office; that she also made telephone connections between the defendant and Getzoff on frequent occasions.

The testimony of John J. Kessler and his wife is the only other testimony claimed to have corroborative value. That of Mrs. Kessler requires no separate mention, since that of her husband more fully covers the same matters. Apparently the purpose of this testimony was to prove that in the face of an accusation personally made by Kessler to defendant Davis, the conduct of Davis in response to that accusation was such as to show a consciousness of guilt. It appears that at some time prior to the trial of the Rosenberg case there had been a transaction between Mrs. Kessler and Jack Rosenberg, in which Jack Rosenberg received from Mrs. Kessler 200 shares of Julian stock, and that she had been unable to obtain from him any accounting therefor. Kessler testified to an interview which he had with Davis in the office of Davis, on May 17, 1928. He went there with Mrs. Kessler and asked Davis to take Jack Rosenberg before the grand jury for an investigation of that transaction. He said that he had found out that Jack Rosenberg had sold the stock of Mrs. Kessler, and he had told Jack that if he (Jack) did not return the money to Mrs. Kessler that he (Kessler) would go to the district attorney and swear to a warrant, and "you will be arrested, just like your brother."

"Q. Is this what you told Mr. Davis? A. Yes, I told Mr. Davis everything. He started to laugh. He said, 'I am not afraid. The Julian case is fixed by Mr. Getzoff.'"

Further on it appeared that what the witness meant to say was that in response to Kessler's threat of arrest, Jack Rosenberg laughed and said: "I am not afraid. The Julian case is fixed by Mr. Getzoff." Further on, Kessler said, "Mr. Davis, when I told him that—I said, 'Jack Rosenberg says he is not afraid, because the case is fixed.' He says, 'John, don't worry; wait until the trial will be over, and I will get you the money.'" Davis said that.

At the conclusion of the direct examination of Mr. Kessler, defendant moved to strike out said testimony as not illustrative of any of the issues in the case and not tending to prove anything in the indictment. Strenuous but unsuccessful efforts had been made by counsel for defendant to have this witness confine his statements to his conversation with Davis and to exclude direct statements of the conversation that he had had with Jack Rosenberg. The motion of defendant to strike out the testimony was denied. Upon a very similar record of the testimony of Mrs. Kessler, similar objections and motions made by defendant were overruled.

[5] The testimony of the Kesslers was offered as showing an accusatory statement made to the defendant, and showing consciousness of guilt as exhibited by the conduct of defendant in the face of such accusation. The statement made by Kessler to Davis, in the form of an alleged quotation from Jack Rosenberg, was not an accusation directed personally to Davis. The record shows that in the then pending trial of the Rosenberg case the district attorney and several deputies other than Davis were also actively connected with the prosecution. There was also the possibility that any "fixing" of the case had been effected through contact with jurors. Before the failure of a person to deny a statement of fact can be received as evidence of an admission of guilt or of consciousness of guilt, it must appear that he understands that he himself is accused of the criminal act. Wharton on Criminal Evidence (10th Ed.) vol. 2, § 680, p. 1407; People v. Hartwell, 37 Cal. App. 799, 175 P. 21. We are of the opinion that the court erred in denying the motions to strike out said Kessler testimony.

[6] Another error of the court in relation to the Kessler testimony occurred at a later point in the trial. Jack Rosenberg was called as a witness for the defendant, and was asked whether he had a conversation with Kessler during the trial of the Rosenberg case, in which he told Kessler that he wasn't afraid of being taken before the grand jury because the case had been fixed by Getzoff. The district attorney objected to this question upon the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial and that the conversation testified to by Kessler was a conversation of Kessler with Davis. The objection was sustained. If in fact the testimony of Kessler had been confined to his conversation with Davis, the objection to the question addressed to Jack Rosenberg would have been properly sustained for the reason that the question whether or not there had actually been such prior conversation with Jack Rosenberg would have been immaterial. But in fact Kessler had been permitted to testify and had testified, notwithstanding objections thereto, concerning a previous conversation with Jack Rosenberg, and had given a statement of that conversation. If the defendant had been permitted to produce the testimony of Jack Rosenberg denying the conversation, it would have been to that extent an impeachment of the Kessler testimony. The evidence of such prior conversation should not have been received by the court and retained in evidence by the court as against the defendant's objections, without permitting the defendant to produce testimony contradicting the same. The general rule, which excludes evidence in rebuttal of testimony concerning an immaterial matter, is based upon the fact that controversies about such matters are likely to "lead to endless confusion." Donnelly v. Curran, 54 Cal. 282; People v. Mitchell, 62 Cal. 411. In the cases last cited, the irrelevant evidence had been received without any objection thereto. Moreover, the testimony which appellant sought to contradict was closely connected with the principal fact, to-wit, the supposed accusation. Without such contradiction, the defendant stood helplessly prejudiced before the jury.

[7] Taking the testimony of the several witnesses offered in corroboration of the story told by Ben Getzoff, it is exceedingly doubtful whether any of it, or all of it together, in and of itself amounts to corroborative evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged. In order to give it effect even as tending in that direction, it seems at every point necessary to interpret and explain this "corroboration" in the light of the testimony of Ben Getzoff. It requires the testimony of Ben Getzoff to give it direction to the alleged crime, before it can be said to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. But the law requires that such testimony offered in corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice shall of itself tend to connect the defendant with the offense charged. The following quotation seems appropriate: "As to all of the claimed corroborative evidence the prosecution must fail, for it does not even show 'the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof' within the rule laid down in section 1111 of the Penal Code, and must further fail under the well-established rule approved in People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, where, at page 470, 154 P. 317, 319, it is said that—'Where the circumstances when proved, taken separately or collectively, are consistent with the innocence of the accused, there is no corroboration, and a verdict of conviction thereon will be set aside.' Therefore, eliminating, as we must, the evidence of the accomplice in order to determine whether the other evidence is sufficient to connect the defendants with the crime of bribery, we conclude that such other evidence falls far short of the legal requirements to constitute corroboration." People v. Kempley, 205 Cal. 441, 461, 271 P. 478, 487. The Attorney General suggests that the statements contained in the foregoing quotation should not be accepted as authority for the proposition that the corroborative evidence must show the commission of the crime. The general rule no doubt is that the corpus delicti, such as, for instance, that a certain man was murdered, may be established by testimony of an accomplice showing that the man was found dead under described circumstances indicating murder. In such case it would be only that part of his testimony implicating the defendant that would have to be corroborated by other evidence. But in the case of a prosecution of a public officer on a charge of bribery, the fact that the crime was committed and the connection of the defendant therewith are of a single inseparable nature. In such case to hold that the testimony of the accomplice alone may be accepted as sufficient proof of the corpus delicti would wholly destroy the rule requiring corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, as that rule is set forth in section 1111 of the Penal Code.

[8] Counsel for the people claim that the defendant "was convicted of the crime of asking a bribe of Ben Getzoff." This is true, because this was a part of the crime charged by the indictment, and the jury found the defendant "guilty of asking, agreeing to receive, and receiving a bribe, a felony, as charged in the indictment." Under instructions 23 and 26, reading them together, the court presented the case to the jury upon the theory that there was evidence which, if believed by the jury, would authorize them to find the defendant guilty of asking for a bribe, and upon the theory that this corrupt solicitation might be one occurring solely between defendant and Ben Getzoff. This theory was erroneous, because there was no evidence that the defendant asked a bribe of Ben Getzoff.

[9, 10] And even if it be assumed that the so-called corroborative testimony is technically sufficient to prove the asking, agreeing to receive, and receiving a bribe from Ed Rosenberg, nevertheless it leaves the case in that weak and unsatisfactory condition in which errors become important, because in such case they much more easily lead to a miscarriage of justice than in those cases where there is abundance of reliable evidence of the defendant's guilt. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution was not intended to mean that the mere fact that the evidence may legally be able to stand up under the weight of the judgment is sufficient reason in all cases for refusing to set aside the judgment. The phrase "miscarriage of justice," used as descriptive of that condition of a cause which justifies the reversal of a judgment, has no hard and fast definition. It seems assured, however, that where errors have been committed, and where the appellate court finds that upon the record it is seriously doubtful that without such errors the defendant would have been convicted, then it may well be that errors which otherwise would not be considered to be seriously prejudicial, will require a reversal. See People v. Adams, 76 Cal. App. 178, 186, 244 P. 106, and numerous cases there cited.

There are numerous assignments of error, other than those to which we have referred. We do not find it necessary to elaborate upon them here. Let it be assumed that none of them would be sustained, or that if sustained they would not be of great importance. The fact that the verdict rests upon the testimony of a self-confessed accomplice in the crime of bribery (a crime which necessarily impeaches the integrity of one who takes part in its commission), the fact that there is evidence indicating that the accomplice had interested motives for testifying against the defendant, the fact that the so-called corroborative evidence is of that inconclusive character which appears in the record, and the fact that those errors occurred to which we have given attention—these things together have left the cause in a condition which entitles the appellant to a new trial.

The judgment, and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, are reversed.

May 3, 1930.

1. Husband and wife ☞259.

Where husband or wife owns business before marriage and continues to conduct it thereafter, portion thereof attributable to personal activity and ability is "community property" (Civ. Code, § 164).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Community Property," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Husband and wife ☞259.

Earnings acquired by skill of either spouse become "community property" (Civ. Code, § 164).

3. Husband and wife ☞262(1).

Presumption is that property acquired by either spouse after marriage otherwise than by gift, bequest, or descent is community property (Civ. Code §§ 163, 164).

4. Husband and wife ☞262(2).

Burden rests on party contending property acquired after marriage is not community property to establish contention by fair and convincing evidence.

5. Husband and wife ☞255.

Interest of husband and wife in business held measurable by their respective contributions thereto in determining extent of community and separate property on husband's death (Civ. Code, §§ 163, 164).

The evidence disclosed that the husband made direct contribution of $5,600 and wife of $3,750 in purchase of billboard advertising business.

6. Husband and wife ☞264.

Property of deceased husband held community property, where evidence did not show when or how property was acquired, or that it was separate property of deceased (Civ. Code, §§ 163, 164).

7. Husband and wife ☞266.

Deed to realty and bill of sale of business from wife to husband held ineffective, where executed without consideration and without wife's knowledge of contents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Accounting of Gwendolyn Caswell, administratrix of the estate of W. H. Caswell, also known as William Henry Caswell, also known as Wm. H. Caswell, deceased. From portions of a decree directing distribution of part of the estate to E. W. Caswell and another, the administratrix appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Ralph H. Lewis and George E. McCutchen, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Bradford, Cross & Prior, of Sacramento, and J. Raleigh Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

This appeal is from certain portions of the decree of distribution rendered by the court in the estate of W. H. Caswell, deceased, wherein certain of the assets of said estate were held to be the separate property of decedent.

By said decree one half of the assets so decreed to be separate property of deceased was ordered distributed to respondent and Maud Caswell, brother and sister of deceased, and the other half to appellant, the surviving wife of deceased. Appellant, who is the administratrix of said estate and who petitioned the court to order the distribution of the assets of said estate, contends that all of the assets of said estate are community property, and that as the surviving wife of deceased she is entitled to have the whole thereof distributed to her.

It appears from the evidence that appellant and deceased were married on February 11, 1911, and that his death occurred on December 1, 1926. At the date of said marriage deceased owned an inchoate right to a half interest in a certain billboard advertising business known as the Caswell Company, which interest arose in the following manner:

On March 1, 1927, W. A. Caswell, the father of deceased and respondent, who was then the owner of a billboard advertising business known as the Caswell Company, entered into an agreement with them by the terms of which it was agreed that he lease said business, together with its equipment, to them for a rental of $15,000, same to be paid in installments of $100 per month, they to become the owners thereof when the full sum of $15,000 was paid to him. At the date of the marriage of appellant and deceased there had been paid on the said agreement the sum of $4,600.

W. A. Caswell died April 28, 1914, and by his will he bequeathed to his said sons the unpaid portion of the said $15,000, namely, the sum of $6,600, they having paid on said agreement from the date of said marriage up to the death of said W. A. Caswell the sum of $3,800.

On March 30, 1915, respondent leased to deceased his half interest in said business for a period of five years from that date at a monthly rental of $200 per month, and on April 1, 1920, respondent executed a new lease to deceased for another period of five years with the privilege therein given to deceased to purchase, during said five years, respondent's half interest in said business at a price of from $20,000 to $25,000, depending, for the amount to be paid, on the year in which the option was exercised. In 1921 deceased exercised the option for a purchase price of $22,000, having in the said year 1921 sold the said business and equipment to Foster & Kleiser for the sum of $100,000, $25,000 of which was paid in cash, a note was executed for $15,000 and for the remaining $60,000, 600 shares of the capital stock of the said Foster & Kleiser Company, of the par value of $60,000, were delivered to deceased.

The court found that these 600 shares of the capital stock of the said Foster & Kleiser Company were the separate property of deceased.

At the date of his death deceased had title to certain lots or parcels of real estate. One of the lots or parcels was deeded to respondent and deceased in 1909. The purchase price of this parcel is not stated. A mortgage for $700 was placed upon this parcel in the deal, but just when this mortgage was paid is not stated; however, respondent deeded his half interest in said parcel to deceased in the year 1916. The title to all the other lots or parcels was acquired after the said marriage and payment for same was made from the profits arising from the said business.

The court found that all of the lots or parcels of land owned by deceased at the time of his death was his separate property, except one parcel, presumably the home of appellant and deceased.

Appellant contends that all of these lots and parcels of land are community property. Appellant testified that at the date of her marriage she had in cash the sum of $3,750, which she turned over to deceased immediately after the said marriage. She further testified that at this time deceased was needing money for his business; that he was running on a shoestring; that he had very little money and was forced to pay the bills of the company weekly; that she turned the money over to him to be used in said business, and that she did this upon the understanding that it was to be used in the business and that it would give her an interest therein. A witness produced by appellant, a Mrs. Garliepp, testified that she was employed by the Caswell Company in March, 1911, and continued in that employment until 1915; that for the first year and three or four months she was deceased's secretary, and after that both secretary and bookkeeper until 1915; that in June, 1912, she had a conversation with deceased in which he told her that appellant had an interest in the said business; that she had put some three or four thousand dollars in it.

Respondent testified that he and deceased took over the business of the Caswell Company in 1907; that thereafter he and deceased conducted the said business until 1912, deceased having charge of the office and respondent having charge of the outside work; that on March 12, 1912, they entered into an agreement which was to continue in force for one year from that date, by the terms of which deceased was to have the sole charge of said business at a salary of $250 per month; that at the end of said year respondent returned and again took charge of the outside work until the execution of the lease in 1915. He testified that deceased never mentioned to him that appellant had ever turned any money over to him; that deceased never put any outside money in the business; that, had deceased put any outside money in the business, respondent would have known it.

The trial court found that, at the time of the marriage of appellant and deceased, appellant had as her sole and separate property the sum of $3,750 in cash, which she delivered to deceased, and that at that time deceased said: "This is for both of us; it goes into one pot for both of us; it is jointly for both of us." The court further found that no community property, nor any community earnings, went into the business of Caswell Company, or in any of the property found to be the separate property of deceased. And in its conclusions of law it found that the separate estate should be charged with the $3,750, which it found to be community property.

Section 163 of the Civil Code provides that "All property owned by the husband before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, is his separate property." Section 164 of said Code provides that all other property acquired after marriage, including real and personal property situated within the state, is community property.

All of the real estate, except the half interest in the parcel deeded to deceased and respondent in 1909, was acquired after the marriage. The half interest in the business of the Caswell Company was not owned by deceased at the date of said marriage. He had at that date an executory right only to become such owner, though it may be said that he did have an interest in the said business at the date of said marriage to the extent that he had paid his part of the installments under the agreement with his father, that is to say, to the extent of $2,300. From the date of his marriage to the death of his father on April 28, 1914, he had paid the further sum of $1,900 upon the said agreement, and upon the death of his father, by bequest under his father's will, he became a half owner in the said business, the said bequest amounting to the sum of $3,300. It therefore appears that at the time deceased became the owner of the half interest in the said business he had paid thereon up to the time of his marriage the sum of $2,300; $1,900 was paid thereon after his marriage, and the payment of his portion of the said $15,000 was completed by the bequest of the $3,300 willed to him by his father. There is no positive evidence as to the source from which the $1,900, paid on the said agreement after the marriage, was derived, though it must have come either from the money appellant turned over to deceased, or from the deceased's earnings from the said business, for the evidence clearly shows that when the sons entered into the agreement with the father neither of them had any means, and this condition continued for several years thereafter. Relative thereto respondent testified as follows: "Well, when we first took the business over my father gave us, under the agreement there, my father gave us the same amount. * * * We didn't have to pay anything because he knew we didn't have no money; then we started in drawing just what we had to draw. * * * It was twenty-five dollars a week apiece we drewed, that went on for a year or two years, then we drewed thirty-five dollars a week, then he brought it up to fifty later on as the business increased." He further stated that by 1912 they were each drawing $50 per week, that they had no difficulty in meeting the payments to their father because they didn't go ahead with improvements only when they had money to spare.

It is evident from this testimony of respondent and from the testimony of appellant that at the date of said marriage deceased, outside of his interest in the said business to the extent of the installments he had paid, had little, if any, means of his own. It is also evident whether the said $1,900 was paid from the earnings of said business or from the money turned over to deceased by appellant it was community property.

[1, 2] Where a husband or wife owns a business before marriage and continues to conduct it thereafter, the portion thereof attributable to the personal activity, ability, and capacity of the person conducting the business will be regarded as community property. 5 Cal. Jur. 299; Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 P. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107. Earnings acquired by the industry and skill of either husband or wife are to be credited to the community. Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 P. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092.

[3, 4] No evidence was produced indicating in any way that this $1,900 was acquired from any other source than from the community property. The presumption is that all property acquired by either spouse after marriage, otherwise than by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, is community property. 5 Cal. Jur. 311. And while this presumption is not conclusive, the burden rests upon the party affirming the fact to the contrary, and such fact must be established by clear and convincing evidence. Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 323, 30 P. 547; Morgan v. Lones, 78 Cal. 58, 20 P. 248.

There is substantial evidence that the money turned over to deceased by appellant went into his said business, while upon the other hand the evidence produced by respondent to the contrary is far from being so. The only evidence offered by respondent that this money did not go into deceased's said business is his own testimony to the effect he did not see it set forth or mentioned in the books of the company; that deceased never told him about having received it, and his conclusion from this that he would have known about it had it occurred. It is evident that the money was not turned over to deceased for the purpose of acquiring an interest in respondent's half of said property, but only an interest in deceased's half thereof. The separate property of deceased that went to the purchase of the half interest in the said business was the sum of $2,300 paid by him before marriage and the $3,300 willed to him by his father, making a total of $5,600. The $3,750 turned over to deceased by appellant undoubtedly went into and was used in deceased's half interest in the said business. We think that the language used by the appellate court in the case of Vieux v. Vieux, 80 Cal. App. 222, 251 P. 640, 643, can be very appropriately applied to the facts of this case. Therein the court said:

"In the instant case, the husband having acquired an inchoate right, on compliance with certain conditions, to become an absolute owner of the property in question, and the facts showing that the required conditions were met with funds furnished by the community, aided by other funds issuing directly from the property agreed to be purchased, justice demands that the rights of the parties should be measured by the direct contributions made by the respective parties to the purchase price of the property."

[5] In the purchase of the said business deceased made direct contribution on the purchase price thereof in the sum of $5,600, while appellant made direct contribution on the purchase price in the sum of $3,750; therefore, the interest of each in the said business should be measured by the contribution made by each.

We are of the opinion that, except the half interest in the tract of land purchased from Nellie Reed and husband before the marriage, being the north half of the south half of lot 1, and the north half of the south half of lot 2, and the west 70 feet of lot 2 in the block bounded by R and S and Sixth and Seventh streets in the city of Sacramento, which the court found to be the separate property of deceased, and except the west half of lot 2 in the block bounded by and between P and Q and Tenth and Eleventh streets in said city, found by the court to be community property, all of the other parcels or lots of land owned by deceased at the time of his death, and the 600 shares of the capital stock of the Foster & Kleiser Company were separate property to the extent of $\frac{112}{187}$ thereof, and was community property to the extent of $\frac{75}{187}$ thereof.

[6] We are also of the opinion that the promissory note of C. R. Ray for $1,820, the five shares of the Sacramento Hotel Company and the 100 shares of the Sacramento Riverside Bath & Power Company, which the trial court found to be separate property of deceased, is community property, for the reason that there is nothing in the record showing or tending to show when or how this last-mentioned three pieces of property were acquired, nor any evidence that any of them was separate property of deceased. In passing upon this question in the Estate of Jolly, 196 Cal. 547, 238 P. 353, 356, the court said:

"The property in the possession of one of the spouses at the close of a long marital relation must be presumed to be community, unless a better right can be established by the spouse claiming it to be his or her separate property."

And, unless this presumption is controverted, the court or jury is bound to find according to the presumption. Stafford v. Martinoni, 192 Cal. 724, 221 P. 919.

[7] Respondent produced in evidence a deed executed by appellant to deceased dated October 24, 1918, for the undivided one-half interest in two of the said tracts of land, and also produced in evidence a bill of sale dated August 23, 1921 (erroneously marked 1911 in the copy of said bill of sale set forth in the transcript as Exhibit P), by which appellant conveyed to deceased all her right, title, and interest in the business of the Caswell Company. Appellant testified, relative to the circumstances under which she signed the said deed and bill of sale, that deceased would come home and present a paper to her and tell her to sign it, and when she would ask him what it was he would say for her to never mind, but to sign it. That trusting him implicitly, she sometimes didn't even look at the paper to see what it was, but at once signed it; that no consideration of any kind or character passed from deceased to her for either of these two conveyances.

Respondent offered no evidence tending to show that appellant received any consideration for these two conveyances, or for either of them, nor to controvert the testimony of appellant as to the circumstances under which she signed them. Inasmuch as in his brief respondent makes no mention of either of these conveyances, presumably he does not rely upon them.

[8] Confidential relations are presumed to exist between husband and wife, and, in his dealings with his wife, the husband, if he obtains any advantage over her, must stand unimpeached of any abuse of the confidence presumptively reposed in him by his wife and resulting from the marital relation, and, failing in this, he must bear the burden of showing that the transaction was fair and just and fully understood by the party from whom the advantage was obtained. Estate of Cover, 188 Cal. 133, 204 P. 583; Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 194 Cal. 73, 227 P. 715.

Under these circumstances neither the said deed nor the said bill of sale was effective to convey to deceased appellant's interest in the property mentioned therein.

The decree is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

PEOPLE v. HEAD.

Cr. 1560.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

April 22, 1930.

Rehearing Denied May 7, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 22, 1930.

1. Criminal law ☞161.

Statutory jeopardy lacks essential elements of common-law jeopardy and bars further prosecution solely because Legislature has so decreed.

2. Criminal law ☞161.

Plea of former jeopardy, when based on common-law jeopardy, is favored.

3. Criminal law ☞163.

Plea of statutory jeopardy cannot be extended to cases wherein it does not clearly appear that Legislature intended statutory bar to exist.

4. Criminal law ☞178.

Failure to state reasons for dismissal of action in order does not bar further prosecution, where court records at time show good reason for dismissal, and it clearly appears to have been made in furtherance of justice (Pen. Code, §§ 1385, 1387).

Pen. Code, § 1385, authorizes dismissal of action or indictment on court's own motion or district attorney's application "in furtherance of justice" and requires that reasons be set forth in order entered on minutes, while section 1387 provides that order of dismissal is no bar, if offense is felony.

5. Criminal law ☞170.

Pendency of information did not bar proceedings on indictment for same offense.

6. Criminal law ☞178.

Failure to state in order dismissing information that indictment was pending for same offense, as already disclosed by court records, did not bar further prosecution under indictment.

7. Homicide ☞332(2).

Jury's implied finding, supported by evidence, that defendant did not act in self-defense, will not be disturbed on appeal.

8. Homicide ☞116(5).

To justify homicide in self-defense, it must appear, not only that defendant believed himself in imminent danger, but that he had sufficient grounds for such belief as reasonable person (Pen. Code, § 198).

Pen. Code, § 198, provides that circumstances must be sufficient to excite fears of reasonable person and that killer must have acted under influence of such fears alone.

9. Homicide ☞276.

Whether circumstances were sufficient to excite fears of reasonable person and defendant acted solely under influence of such fears in killing deceased are essentially questions for jury in practically every case (Pen. Code, § 198).

10. Homicide ☞244(2).

Defendant's testimony he believed himself in danger and testimony as to deceased's character and possession of knife held not conclusive on issue of self-defense, but for jury's consideration with all testimony.

11. Homicide ☞244(1).

Evidence held to warrant jury's finding in murder trial that defendant did not act in self-defense.

12. Homicide ☞231.

Evidence in murder trial held to warrant jury's finding that there was no considerable provocation precluding implication of malice (Pen. Code, § 188).

13. Criminal law ☞938(1), 1156(3).

Motion for new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence is directed to sound discretion of trial court, whose action will not be disturbed, in absence of clear abuse thereof.

14. Homicide ☞319.

Denial of new trial for newly discovered impeaching testimony as to how deceased left defendant's premises after shooting held not abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Lile T. Jacks, Judge.

Richard Head was convicted of second degree murder, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Nourse, Justice pro tem., not voting.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Ralph O. Marron, of San Francisco, for the People.

SPENCE, J.

Appellant was convicted of murder of the second degree and sentenced to the state prison. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Upon this appeal it is contended: First, that the appellant had once been in jeopardy for the offense charged in the indictment; second, that the evidence does not support the verdict for the reason that it appears therefrom that the appellant acted in self-defense, and, third, that the evidence does not support the verdict for the reason that it appears therefrom that the killing was done without malice.

In the early morning hours of May 30, 1929, the appellant shot and killed one Edward Prouty. On two or three occasions on the previous day the deceased and two companions had visited the "bootlegging establishment" conducted by appellant. The final visit was made at about 10 o'clock in the evening and lasted until 4 o'clock in the morning, at which time the shooting occurred. It is unnecessary to set forth all of the sordid details of the events of the evening. The testimony shows that appellant's patrons engaged in a drunken debauch in the flat where appellant carried on his illegal occupation. Several persons present, including the deceased and his companions, had engaged in prolonged drinking, accompanied at various times by hilarity, quarreling, and drunken slumber on the part of some of the participants. As might well be expected, there is considerable conflict in the testimony concerning the circumstances preceding and following the shooting. The body of the deceased was found about two hours later on a dump some distance from the house where the shot was fired. The appellant was arrested that night and denied knowing the deceased or having any knowledge of the shooting.

On his plea of once in jeopardy the appellant relies upon a so-called "statutory jeopardy" rather than a "common law jeopardy." No previous trial was had, but two proceedings were instituted, one by information and the other by indictment, each charging the appellant with the murder of the deceased. Appellant was tried and convicted upon the indictment. While both the information proceeding and indictment proceeding were pending, the former was dismissed, and the order of dismissal did not set forth the reasons for such dismissal. Under the provisions of sections 1385 and 1387 of the Penal Code appellant contends that the failure to set forth the reasons for the order of dismissal of the information bars a further prosecution and makes the plea of once in jeopardy sustainable. We deem it proper to fully set forth the facts concerning these two proceedings.

The information proceeding was instituted by filing a complaint in the police court on June 3, 1929. A preliminary examination was held, appellant was held to answer, and an information was filed in the superior court on July 18, 1929. On August 1, 1929, and before appellant had entered his plea to the charge contained in the information, the information was dismissed on motion of the district attorney. The order granting the order to dismiss did not state the reasons therefor. In presenting the reasons for the motion to the trial court, the district attorney stated that appellant had been charged by indictment with the identical offense, had entered his plea thereto, and that said indictment proceeding had been theretofore set for trial. He further stated that the purpose of proceeding by way of preliminary hearing in the police court was to perpetuate the testimony of certain witnesses, as he believed that said witnesses might not be available at the time of trial.

The indictment proceeding was commenced on June 7, 1929, by filing the indictment here involved. On June 24 a plea of not guilty was entered. On the 31st day of August, and after the dismissal of the information proceeding, oral and written pleas of once in jeopardy and former acquittal were entered. Trial resulting in conviction was had on September 3. At the time the case was called for trial appellant moved to dismiss the indictment. The motion was based upon the above facts, being the same facts relied upon to support his plea of once in jeopardy. The motion was denied, and, under the instructions of the court, the jury found in favor of the people on the pleas of once in jeopardy and former acquittal.

[1-3] We find no merit in appellant's first contention that he had been once in jeopardy for the offense charged by reason of the filing and dismissal of the information, as above set forth. A statutory bar or statutory jeopardy, as it is sometimes termed, has been recognized, but such bar lacks the essential elements of common-law jeopardy and constitutes a bar solely for the reason that the Legislature has so decreed. Ex parte Hayter, 16 Cal. App. 211, 221, 116 P. 370. The plea of once in jeopardy, when based upon a common-law jeopardy, is a favored plea for the reason that the accused has once been placed on trial for the offense charged, and under the common law and constitutional guaranty is shielded from successive prosecutions for the same offense. On the other hand, where this plea is based upon a statutory bar, the accused ordinarily never stands trial for the offense charged, and such plea is not to be extended to cases in which it does not clearly appear that the Legislature intended the statutory bar to exist. Referring to the statutory provisions herein involved, section 1385 provides: "The court may, either of its own motion or upon the application of the district attorney, and in furtherance of justice, order an action or indictment to be dismissed. The reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered upon the minutes." Section 1387 provides: "An order for the dismissal of the action, as provided in this chapter, * * * is no bar if the offense is a felony."

[4-6] Although by the terms of section 1387 a dismissal of a felony made pursuant to section 1385 is not a bar to any other prosecution of the same offense, it is argued that the clause in section 1385 requiring the reasons for the dismissal to be set forth in the order is mandatory, and that the failure to set forth such reasons results in a bar to any further prosecution. The requirement of section 1385 is mandatory in its terms, and the reasons for the dismissal should have been set forth in the order. However, we cannot agree that under those sections the mere failure to embody the reasons for the dismissal in the order will result in a bar to further prosecution, where, at the time such dismissal is made, the records of the court show good reason for such dismissal, and it clearly appears that the dismissal was made in "furtherance of justice," as contemplated by section 1385. The procedure adopted of filing two proceedings charging the same offense is unusual and is not to be commended. The pendency of one, however, did not bar proceedings on the other. As stated in Bishop's New Criminal Law, volume 1, page 610, in discussing double jeopardy: "A man may be held on two or more indictments at the same time for one offense, and the pendency of the one will be no bar to proceedings on the other. Yet if justice to him requires, the court in its discretion will quash one or more of them." Here both proceedings were promptly commenced following the commission of the offense. The indictment proceeding was on the calendar for trial. No prejudice could result to the appellant, nor could his right to a speedy trial in the indictment proceeding be jeopardized by dismissing the information subsequently filed before he entered his plea thereto. It is apparent that the pendency of two proceedings constituted good reason for the dismissal of one, and the dismissal of the information under the circumstances was obviously in the interests of justice, as contemplated by section 1385. The failure to state in the order of dismissal the fact that another proceeding was pending charging the identical offense constituted a mere omission to state a fact which the records of the court already disclosed, and here constituted, at most, a mere irregularity in procedure without prejudice to appellant. It does not appear that the Legislature intended by the sections above mentioned to create a bar to further prosecution under the circumstances in the present case.

Appellant relies mainly upon certain language in the decision of People v. Disperati, 11 Cal. App. 469, 105 P. 617. The facts therein involved are clearly distinguishable, and the decision in that case is not in conflict with the views herein expressed. There the district attorney made the motion to dismiss almost two years after the alleged offense was committed, nearly six months after the complaint was filed, and just prior to the expiration of the sixty-day period following the disagreement of the jury in the first trial on the original information. From a reading of the decision it appears that the district attorney, at the time the motion was made, was endeavoring to get further time to prepare his case, and it does not appear that he could have made a sufficient showing to obtain a continuance. The order for dismissal was made, but failed to state the reasons. On the same day the district attorney filed a new complaint, and, after a second preliminary examination, proceeded to try the defendant upon a second information charging the identical offense. Aside from the reasons there stated by the district attorney at the time the motion was made, the records of the court showed no reason for the dismissal, and, as indicated on page 476 of 11 Cal. App., 105 P. 617, 620, the reasons stated by the district attorney in presenting his motion, even if embodied in the order of dismissal, would not have been sufficient to show that such dismissal was made in furtherance of justice, as contemplated by section 1385. In that case, not only did the order of dismissal fail to show the reasons for dismissal, but in addition it did not appear that the dismissal was made in furtherance of justice. On the contrary, it appeared that the motion for dismissal was made by the district attorney for his own convenience in securing further delay. He sought to accomplish this delay by dismissing the pending information and subsequently filing another proceeding charging the defendant with the same offense. Such procedure entirely ignored the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial on the offense charged. It may be noted that in discussing certain cases the court said, on page 475 of 11 Cal. App., 105 P. 617, 619: "The foregoing cases are certainly authority for holding—if authority other than the provision of the statute is needed—that the dismissal of an information in the interests of justice is not a bar to another prosecution for the same offense."

[7] It is next claimed that it appears from the evidence that appellant acted in self-defense. Much of the conflicting testimony is referred to in support of this contention. From a review of the entire record, it may be said that there was sufficient evidence to make self-defense an issue for the jury under instructions from the court. This issue was properly submitted to the jury, and they impliedly found against appellant. There was ample evidence to support this implied finding.

[8, 9] In order to justify the commission of a homicide in self-defense it must not only appear that the defendant believed himself to be in imminent danger, but also that as a reasonable person he had sufficient grounds for his belief. The circumstances must be sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person, and the party killing must have acted under the influence of such fears alone. Pen. Code, § 198. In practically every case it is essentially a question for the jury to determine whether the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable person, and whether the defendant acted solely under the influence of such fears. People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 562, 62 P. 1069; People v. Anderson, 57 Cal. App. 721, 208 P. 204.

[10, 11] Obviously, neither the testimony of appellant to the effect that he believed himself in danger, nor the testimony concerning the character of the deceased, nor the testimony that the deceased had a knife in his possession would be conclusive upon the issue of self-defense. They were proper matters for the consideration of the jury, together with all the testimony concerning the circumstances preceding the killing. Briefly relating some of these circumstances, the testimony of the prosecution witnesses showed that, for some time prior to the shooting, the deceased and McCarthy, one of his companions, had been in the kitchen drinking with other patrons of appellant's place. This room was furnished with a couch, morris chair, and other furniture not usually found in a kitchen, but adapted to the use of appellant in making his customers comfortable. About 4 o'clock in the morning, Malezia, deceased's other companion, who had been asleep in an adjoining room, entered the kitchen and sat on the couch. He said to one of the women present, "Come over here, baby, and sit by me." Another patron, a man of large stature, resented this remark and a quarrel ensued. No blows were struck, but a fight was threatened between the various patrons, including the deceased and his companions. Appellant said: "There will be no fight go on in here." The deceased then said: "What are you going to do about it?" Appellant then pulled out a gun and said to the deceased: "You have been looking for it." The deceased said: "You haven't guts enough to shoot that." Whereupon the appellant shot the deceased. During the remarks between the deceased and appellant the deceased was standing several feet from the defendant with his hands behind his back. Several witnesses testified that they saw no knife in the possession of the deceased at the time. There was some conflict in the testimony regarding the positions of the various persons in the room, their actions, and their words, but the details of the tragedy, as told by some of the witnesses, fully warranted the jury's conclusion that the circumstances were insufficient to render the homicide justifiable under the plea of self-defense.

[12] The recital of the foregoing testimony disposes of appellant's third point that the killing was done without malice. Section 188 of the Penal Code defined malice as follows: "Such malice may be express or implied. It is express when there is manifested a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature. It is implied, when no considerable provocation appears, or when the circumstances attending the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart." It is not necessary to consider whether the evidence was sufficient to constitute express malice, as above defined. Malice is implied where no considerable provocation appears, and the jury was warranted in finding upon the conflicting evidence that there was no considerable provocation for the killing of the deceased.

[13, 14] Although not referred to in the briefs, appellant, during oral argument, urged a reversal of the order denying his motion for a new trial, claiming that a new trial should have been granted on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The evidence referred to in the affidavits in support of the motion related solely to the testimony of one witness who claimed to have seen one of deceased's companions and another person apparently assisting a man into an automobile in front of appellant's place at about 4:30 that morning. The testimony offered at the trial left in doubt the manner in which deceased had traveled or been conveyed from appellant's place to the place where his body was found two hours later. The newly discovered evidence, if produced, would tend to show the manner in which the deceased left the premises after the shooting, and to impeach certain testimony of deceased's companions. It had no direct bearing upon the shooting or the events preceding the shooting. It is extremely doubtful whether such evidence would have produced any different result upon the trial. The motion for a new trial under such circumstances is directed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the action of the trial court will not be disturbed, except in cases manifesting a clear abuse of such discretion. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 P. 235. It does not appear that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion for new trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Civ. 4059.

1. Judgment ⇨251(1).

In suit for specific performance and accounting, judgment that plaintiff was entitled to deed on payment of certain sum held proper; issue being tendered by cross-complaint.

2. Specific performance ⇨117.

In action for specific performance and for accounting, refusal to receive evidence respecting partition held not error, where before trial appellant dismissed cross-complaint "in so far as he asks for a partition."

3. Appeal and error ⇨1071(6).

Court's failure to make findings on certain issues is immaterial where appellant suffered no prejudice.

4. Tenancy in common ⇨28(4).

On accounting owners of apartment building held properly charged only with rents collected rather than rental value of apartments in possession.

Plaintiff had eight apartments in his possession, while defendant was in possession of four; but notwithstanding a scramble by each for the management of the property, there was a degree of co-operation between them.

5. Tenancy in common ⇨32.

On accounting between owners of apartment buildings, defendant held not entitled to credit for amount paid housekeeper.

It appeared that each party employed a housekeeper for a time, and that during the period covered by the accounting plaintiff himself did all work in connection with eight apartments and the greater part of the general work about the premises, but made no claim for such services. It did not appear from the evidence that defendant had authority to employ housekeeper at the common expense or that he had rightfully taken the management of the property or the four apartments away from plaintiff.

FINCH, P. J.

In April, 1920, the plaintiff and the defendant Daniel A. Deacon purchased an apartment house, containing twelve apartments, in the city of San Diego. Title was taken in Deacon's name with the understanding and agreement that he would convey a one-half interest in the property to the plaintiff upon payment by the latter of a specified part of the purchase price of the property. At the time of the trial Deacon was the owner of a one-fourth interest in the property as tenant in common with his divorced wife, who owned a one-fourth interest, and the plaintiff, who owned a one-half interest, subject to an indebtedness of $6,500. The case was tried on issues raised by Deacon's cross-complaint and the plaintiff's answer thereto.

The prayer of the cross-complaint is for a judgment determining the rights of the parties in the property, adjudging that the plaintiff's rights therein are subject to an indebtedness of $6,500, partitioning the property and settling the accounts between the parties. By a supplemental cross-complaint Deacon alleged that "at all times since the first of May, 1926, cross-defendant A. T. Roark has been in sole possession" of eight of the apartments and "has held the same adversely to the said Daniel A. Deacon, and has refused possession of said apartments, or any of them, to the said Daniel A. Deacon, and has exercised sole and absolute control over each and all of said apartments; that the said A. T. Roark has forcibly prevented the said Daniel A. Deacon from entering into possession of said * * * apartments, or any of them; that said Daniel A. Deacon was entitled to possession thereof." Based on these allegations, Deacon demanded that the plaintiff "account for the rental value of each and all of the apartments so held to the exclusion of the cross-complainant."

An accounting was had and, based thereon, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for $27.57. The judgment also requires the cross-complainant to execute a deed conveying the undivided one-half of the property to the plaintiff on payment by the latter of $6,500. The cross-complainant has appealed from the judgment.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the court "erred in refusing to receive evidence on the issues of partition" and in adjudging that the plaintiff is entitled to a deed upon payment of the sum of $6,500, basing the latter contention on the ground that there was no such issue before the court. That issue, however, was tendered by the appellant's cross-complaint. In answer to the point first mentioned, it is sufficient to say that, prior to the trial, the appellant dismissed his cross-complaint "in so far as he asks for a partition of the property."

[3, 4] It is urged that the court erred in failing to find on the issues raised by the supplemental cross-complaint, in which appellant attempted to plead an ouster. Disregarding all objections urged by the respondent to the sufficiency of that pleading, it does not appear that the appellant has suffered any prejudice from the failure to find thereon. He has not called attention to any evidence warranting a finding of ouster. As stated by the trial judge: "The evidence appears to show that up to a certain time Mr. Roark was, by an agreement to which the cross-complainant, Daniel A. Deacon, at least, was a party, entrusted with managing and renting the entire building. It appears to show that subsequently Mr. Deacon took the physical possession of four out of the twelve apartments and placed locks upon the same, and that Mr. Roark responded by placing locks on the other eight; that apparently neither act was done with the idea of denying the legal title of the parties thus locked out, nor of dispossessing him of his share of any rental actually collected for any of the apartments involved; but these acts of the parties were what has been described by counsel for the cross-defendant as 'a matter of scrambling possession for purposes of management and administration.'" Notwithstanding the scramble for the management of the property, it appears that there was a degree of co-operation between them. The appellant's sister-in-law was employed by him as housekeeper of the apartments in his exclusive possession. He testified: "If the apartments were called for, people desired to look at them, she would attempt to show them the apartments. If she was blocked by a special keyhold, keys that Mr. Roark has been inserting to keep us out, then she asked Mrs. Roark for the key, and Mrs. Roark showed the apartment." Attention is not directed by the appellant to any evidence to the effect that the plaintiff's right to manage the property was ever canceled. Some of the appellant's testimony indicates that he attempted to cancel such right, but it does not appear that he had authority to cancel it. In fact, the trial appears to have been conducted on the theory of an accounting for rents received by the parties with little effort to prove an ouster. Under the circumstances, no finding on that question was required, and if one had been made it would necessarily have been in favor of the plaintiff. It follows that the plaintiff was properly charged only with the rents collected by him rather than the rental value of the eight apartments in his possession. The court applied the same rule to the appellant and charged him only with the rents collected by him for the four apartments in his possession.

[5] It appears that each party employed a housekeeper for a time, but that during the period covered by the accounting the plaintiff himself did all the work in connection with the eight apartments and the greater part of the general work about the premises. During the same period the appellant employed his sister-in-law to manage the four apartments and do part of the general work in connection with the hallways. The plaintiff made no claim for his services and was allowed nothing therefor in the accounting. The appellant claimed credit for the amount he had paid his housekeeper, but the court disallowed the claim. In addition to the natural injustice of the appellant's claim, under the circumstances, it does not appear from the evidence that he had authority to employ a housekeeper at the common expense or that he had rightfully taken the management of the property or the four apartments thereof away from the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

OWEN, Justice pro tem.

On the 13th day of May, 1926, the defendant, as sheriff of San Diego county, attached a Buick automobile as the property of one Lillian L. Elphick. On the 15th day of May, 1926, the plaintiff herein filed with the defendant a third party claim, alleging his ownership of the attached property. On the 26th of the month, judgment was entered against Lillian L. Elphick, and an execution on the judgment was duly issued on the 29th of said month. Pursuant to the execution, and after due and legal notice, the sheriff sold the said automobile on the 8th day of June, 1926, and immediately parted with its custody.

On July 1, 1926, the plaintiff instituted this action against the defendant, said sheriff, for the sum of $850, the alleged value of the automobile, and the sum of $500 for the loss of its use.

After denying the allegation of the complaint, the defendant, as a further defense, alleges that Lillian L. Elphick had transferred the said automobile to the plaintiff herein, without any consideration, that the transfer was without immediate delivery, and was not accompanied by an actual or continued change of possession, and that the attempted sale was fraudulent as to creditors.

The court found that on April 17, 1926, while she was the owner and in possession and control of the automobile, Lillian L. Elphick had sold it to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration, that, after the sale and delivery thereof, there was an actual and continued change of possession, and that plaintiff thereupon became the lawful owner. The court further found that the defendant seized the automobile without right or authority of law, and that the allegations of his answer were untrue. Judgment followed for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,350.

On appeal, the defendant urges his demurrer to the complaint, attacks the court's findings as to the immediate delivery to plaintiff from Elphick of the automobile, and its actual and continued change of possession. He also excepts to the award for loss of use, and raises the question of the correct measure of damage.

[1] 1. The court's finding that there was a valuable consideration for the sale, followed by an immediate and actual delivery, and accompanied by a continued and actual change of possession, is substantially borne out by a reading of the transcript. We will not disturb that finding. 2 Cal. Jur. p. 919; Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157; Kern Valley Bank v. Koehn, 10 Cal. App. 679, 103 P. 173; Davies v. Angelo, 8 Cal. App. 305, 96 P. 909; Thom v. Stewart, 162 Cal. 413, 122 P. 1069; Stockton Combined Harvester & A. Works v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 53 P. 565.

[2, 3] 2. While the plaintiff may well have set out with more particularity his statement of damage for the detention of the automobile, it must be said that his allegation is neither ambiguous nor uncertain. An allegation in effect that the defendant unlawfully withholds and detains an automobile from the possession of the plaintiff to his damage in the sum of $500 for the detention thereof, all other facts essential to a cause of action being stated, is sufficient as against a general demurrer. A general demurrer "does not reach mere defects in allegations, defects in matter of form, as that essential facts appear only inferentially, or as conclusions of law, or by way of recital." 21 Cal. Jur. p. 109. Defendant proceeded to trial without urging his demurrer, or making any objection to the admission of evidence. Had such an objection been made, the trial court could have permitted an amendment curing the defect if there be a defect, but in this instance there is not a total absence of allegations essential to a statement of a cause of action. 2 Cal. Jur. 242.

[4] 3. The correct measure of damage for the detention of personal property when wrongfully converted is the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest from that time. Civ. Code, § 3336. But where "the property has a usable value which exceeds the lawful rate of interest, the successful party is entitled to recover as damages for the detention, the reasonable value of such use." 5 Cal. Jur. 208; 8 Cal. Jur. 800; Morneault v. Natl. Surety Co., 37 Cal. App. 285-287, 174 P. 81.

In the instant case the court found upon competent testimony that the plaintiff had been damaged by being deprived of its use while the automobile was wrongfully detained, in the sum of $500. We believe the correct measure of damage was used by the trial court in reaching his judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

By information the district attorney charged O. W. De Vaughan with having committed (1) a conspiracy to commit an abortion, (2) a conspiracy to commit a violation of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law, and (3) that this defendant alone violated said section. The defendants pleaded not guilty. They were tried before the court sitting with a jury. The court advised the jury to acquit. The jury did not do so, but returned a verdict finding McCoy guilty on the second count and De Vaughan guilty on the first and second counts. Each moved for a new trial. The court granted McCoy's motion. It granted De Vaughan's motion as to the first count and denied it as to the second count. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

On the 3d day of July, 1929, the prosecutrix went to work for Mr. and Mrs. McCoy, 1050 Sanchez street, in San Francisco. She testified that on the evening of the 6th of July, 1929, when Mrs. McCoy was away from home, Mr. McCoy gave her a glass of port wine. She dimly remembered that later she was on her bed. She did not remember anything else till Mrs. McCoy came home at 2 a. m. At that time she did not know that she and McCoy had had intercourse. Later, July 13, 1929, she discovered that she had had intercourse with him. On that same date Mr. and Mrs. McCoy took her to Dr. De Vaughan.

On the trial the prosecution claimed that Mrs. McCoy took the witness to have an abortion performed. The defense claimed that she was taken to receive treatment for gonorrhea. Judging by the orders made by it, we assume the trial court adopted the theory of the defense and rejected the theory of the prosecution on this part of the charge.

[1] As to the second count the prosecution contended that the commission of an abortion, or an attempt to do so, would bring the perpetrators within the purview of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Act (St. 1915, p. 1246, as amended by St. 1921, p. 773). But an abortion cannot be performed on a woman who is not pregnant. There is not in the record a particle of evidence that the prosecutrix is, or ever was, pregnant. The rulings of the trial court, as above shown, have, in legal effect, so held. If we consider that section 21 of the Juvenile Court Act commonly applies to acts committed to arouse the passions (People v. Cohen, 62 Cal. App. 521, 217 P. 78), there was some slight, but most highly improbable, evidence on that score as against the defendant McCoy, but, as to him, a new trial has been granted. As to this defendant there is not a word in the record which tends to support the charge, unless we assume he was guilty because he treated the prosecutrix for gonorrhea. To so hold would find no support in any language contained in the Juvenile Court Act.

In other words, we think the trial court was clearly right when it advised the jury to acquit the defendant. Thereafter, when the motion for a new trial was presented, it should have been granted as made.

[2, 3] The defendant took the stand in his own defense. Later the prosecution called witnesses to impeach his character for truth and integrity. In surrebuttal the defendant called witnesses to sustain his reputation for truth and integrity. The word truth needs no definition, it is understood by all. The word "integrity" has been defined as being synonymous with probity, honesty, and uprightness in business relations with others. Estate of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 302, 26 P. 178, 532. On cross-examination of the defendant's character witnesses many questions were asked, objections made, and objections sustained. The defendant claims misconduct on the part of the district attorney. "The rule is that a character witness may be cross-examined as to his knowledge of reports of particular and specific charges of acts inconsistent with the character which he is called on to prove." People v. Steele (Cal. App.) 280 P. 999. We have examined each question so complained of, and have weighed it by that rule. Two transgressed, "Did you ever hear that Clarence Martin plead guilty to the charge and is now in San Quentin prison? * * * You don't know what the medical profession think of him?" We cannot say that the mere asking of those two questions, neither of which was answered, constituted prejudicial error.

The judgment and order are reversed.

5. Partnership §273.

Court on ordering partnership accounting should have decreed dissolution, where-one partner without consent of other had sold all assets of partnership (Civ. Code, §§ 2425, 2426).

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff prosecutes this action for an accounting of partnership assets and for a decree that the partnership out of which the accounting arose was dissolved on or about March 22, 1922. The plaintiff was awarded a judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The first point advanced for a reversal of the judgment is the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. The court found that on July 7, 1919, the defendant was the owner in fee simple of one acre of land in the city of San Gabriel, Cal., together with the improvements thereon, consisting of a dwelling house, a wooden frame chicken house, two small paper chicken houses, and other minor improvements; that at said time and located on said property defendant owned and was raising approximately 400 chickens; that there were also a number of household furnishings and fixtures in the dwelling house on said property; that on said date defendant was financially involved and in need of money to maintain himself and said property; that on said date defendant made a proposition to the plaintiff that, if plaintiff would go into partnership with him, give him some money in cash, secure employment, and turn his wages over to the defendant, work on said premises after the regular hours of plaintiff's employment elsewhere by assisting defendant in and about the premises, in particular, feeding the chickens, washing and cleaning eggs, cleaning hen houses, and doing other incidental duties and chores about said place, attend to these matters on Sundays and holidays, and assist defendant in paying for groceries and household commodities, defendant would transfer to the said partnership or hold for the benefit of said partnership the said acre of ground and its appurtenances and would divide the profits and losses of the entire partnership adventure; that the plaintiff accepted said offer, but that said offer was not in writing; that pursuant to the said agreement and on the same day, plaintiff paid defendant $80 in cash and plaintiff immediately secured a job as a day laborer for a lumber company and commenced work on July 10, 1919, and, with the exception of four months in 1920, he worked continuously for said lumber company until on or about March 22, 1922, the date said partnership was dissolved; that he received a salary of $30 per week; that during said period of time he paid to the defendant from his salary the sum of $20 per week and retained therefrom the sum of $10 per week, out of which plaintiff paid for approximately 90 per cent. of the groceries and foodstuffs used by the plaintiff and defendant; that during the existence of said partnership there had been accumulated as partnership property an additional one-half acre of ground, one water pipe line, a fence around the said one-half acre of ground, and approximately 800 chickens in addition to those owned by the defendant at the time of the formation of the partnership; that the value of the said one-half acre at the time of the termination of the partnership was $1,000; that the total value of the other additional property aggregated $2,335. The court further found that on the 22d day of March, 1922, the defendant, without advising with the plaintiff in any manner whatsoever, sold and disposed of the entire assets of said partnership for the sum of $10,000, all of which sum has been paid to the defendant; that after paying the debts of said partnership there remained in the hands of the defendant the sum of $8,500 partnership property. It is further found that the defendant failed, refused, and neglected to account to the above-named plaintiff for the proceeds of said sale except to the extent of $475 in cash and certain articles of furniture of the reasonable value of $200. The court further found that said plaintiff was entitled to receive one-half of the proceeds of the said sale less the sum of $675, paid him by the defendant as aforesaid, and that there is now due to said plaintiff from the defendant the sum of $3,575, together with interest.

The appellant contends that the evidence concerning the one acre of land owned by him before the formation of the partnership is so conflicting that the court erred in including it in the partnership affairs. He claims that the only evidence upon this subject is the oral testimony of the plaintiff and the defendant; that said testimony cannot be reconciled, and as the burden of proof is on the plaintiff and there is none except his own self-serving testimony to sustain the court's finding that it was in fact partnership property, such finding is therefore unsupported by the evidence.

[1] A careful reading of the entire testimony in the case does no more than disclose a sharp conflict in the evidence. It was the province of the court to make a finding thereon, and having accepted the testimony of the plaintiff as the correct version of the transaction and having found that the acre of land was a part of the partnership property, upon well-settled principles of law, this court may not disturb such finding.

[2, 3] It is further claimed that, to be valid, an agreement affecting an interest in real estate must be in writing. Civ. Code, § 1624. There are two answers to this claim. The agreement sued upon is one of partnership. The one acre of land was sold by the appellant and the complaint herein seeks an accounting of the partnership funds, which includes the money received from the sale of the land, and does not seek the enforcement of any contract affecting real property. Furthermore, the evidence discloses that from the beginning of the partnership, and for nearly four years thereafter, the partnership was in full operation. This is a sufficient performance to take the contract out of the statute of frauds, even if it were a contract affecting real property. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 318, 95 P. 154, 159; Colon v. Tosetti, 14 Cal. App. 693, 113 P. 365, 366; Standing v. Morosco, 43 Cal. App. 244, 184 P. 954.

[4, 5] Another reason advanced for a reversal of the judgment is that the court did not enter a decree dissolving the partnership. The plaintiff prayed for a decree that the partnership was dissolved on or about March 22, 1922. In his answer the defendant alleges that the partnership was dissolved during the month of April, 1922. The evidence is contradicted that on March 22, 1922, defendant sold, without the consent of the plaintiff, all of the assets of the partnership, and told plaintiff to seek living quarters elsewhere. That since said date there have been no partnership dealings.

Section 2425 of the Civil Code provides that a dissolution of a partnership may be had "by decree of court under section 2426," and the latter section provides that: "On application by or for a partner the court shall decree a dissolution whenever: * * * (c) A partner has been guilty of such conduct as tends to affect prejudicially the carrying on of the business." We think it is clear that the appellant's conduct justified a decree of dissolution and it should have been made.

One other claim deserves attention. It is that the court did not make a finding of what constituted partnership assets. An examination of the court's findings numbered 1, 5, and 6 set forth such assets and are sufficiently definite for that purpose.

In accordance with sections 956a and 957 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the judgment is modified by adding thereto before the words "Done in Open Court this 7th day of June, 1927," the following paragraph: "That said partnership was dissolved on or about the 22d day of March, 1922."

As so modified the judgment is affirmed, with costs to respondent.

FINCH, P. J.

The plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant a new automobile at the price of $1,800, and agreed to accept a second-hand automobile as payment on the purchase price in the amount of $950; the remainder being paid in cash. The defendant was unable to transfer the old automobile to the plaintiff because a finance company held title thereto and the certificate of ownership thereof; it having held the title and certificate at the time the defendant purchased such automobile and at all times thereafter. Upon the defendant's failure to make the transfer, the plaintiff brought this action to recover $950, the sum for which the plaintiff had agreed to accept the old automobile in payment on the price of the new. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and, on motion of the plaintiff, the court granted a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict. The defendant has appealed from the order granting a new trial.

[1] "The trial court is not bound by the rule of conflicting evidence as is the appellate tribunal; nor is it bound by the finding of the jury in passing upon a motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict, if there is sufficient evidence to sustain a contrary finding." 20 Cal. Jur. 111.

[2] To review and comment at length on the evidence in this case might tend to prejudice the rights of the parties in the retrial thereof. It is deemed sufficient to say that the plaintiff testified that the defendant, at the time of the transaction in question, agreed to procure the certificate of ownership of the second-hand automobile and transfer it to the plaintiff. While it is true that the defendant denied this testimony and testified to facts tending to excuse him from delivering the certificate to the plaintiff, the trial court has resolved this conflict in favor of the plaintiff, and such determination is conclusive on appeal.

The order is affirmed.

McKENZIE, Justice pro tem.

The defendant, under the name of Mynard Anslyn, which he stated at the trial was his true name, in the year 1914 married Eva V. Anslyn, plaintiff's intestate. They lived together about ten years and then divorced. In 1926 defendant under the name of Milton Anderson married another woman. The defendant and his second wife separated at a time not disclosed by the record, but prior to his first wife's appearing again on the scene. This second marriage had not been dissolved at the time of the trial. On the 1st of January, 1928, the first wife (plaintiff's intestate), came to defendant's home in Berkeley, where he was living alone in a house which he owned. From the 1st of January, 1928, to March 6th of the same year, when the woman died, the defendant and his former wife lived together in this house without other occupants.

Some time between January 1 and February 27, 1928, plaintiff's intestate and defendant discussed the proposition of conveying the real property of each to the other and of his converting a bank deposit of his into a joint account. The amount of money in bank was $500, but there is no satisfactory evidence in the record which shows that this account was transferred to a joint account. There is no direct evidence as to the value of the respective real properties; however, the record shows that the intestate's real property involved in this action, which is situate in Merced, brings a monthly rental of $200 per month, but is incumbered with a trust deed to secure an undisclosed amount. It may be inferred that the property has a substantial value. It may also be inferred from the evidence that she had no other property of substantial value. In many respects the record is not comprehensive, but it may be inferred therefrom that the intestate's nearest relatives were nieces and nephews. It may likewise be inferred that defendant's Berkeley property was a modest residence, but of substantial value, and that the residence and bank deposit of $500 constituted all of defendant's property. The evidence does not disclose any relative of defendant, other than his second wife, who was not living with him, but from whom he had not been divorced.

On the 27th day of February, 1928, the intestate and defendant went to an abstract office and had prepared two ordinary grant deeds, one from the intestate to defendant of the Merced property and the other from defendant to the intestate of the Berkeley property. Both deeds described the defendant as an unmarried man. These deeds were signed and acknowledged by the respective parties; the defendant then going to his place of employment and the intestate returning to their home with the two deeds and placed them in a drawer where she had a number of her personal papers. Shortly after midnight on March 7, 1928, the defendant on returning to his home from work, found the intestate dead in a bathroom. The next day a woman friend of the deceased came to the residence, and while there examined the house to ascertain what papers could be found which had belonged to the deceased. In the drawer, where Mrs. Anslyn had placed them when she returned from the abstract office, she found the two deeds in question, together with a number of other papers belonging to the deceased.

The defendant was the only witness who testified concerning the negotiations and understanding concerning the making of the two deeds; and he testified that the agreement was that his deed was to have no effect unless he died before the intestate and the same understanding was had in regard to her deed, and that neither of said deeds was delivered at the time Mrs. Anslyn placed them in the drawer.

Up to this point both sides are agreed that the foregoing are the facts. The controversy centers around an incident that defendant claims occurred at defendant's home on the 2d day of March, 1928, when the intestate, the defendant, and W. F. Sergeant were present. At this time the defendant claims there was a complete delivery of Mrs. Anslyn's deed to him. To prove this fact he relies upon the testimony of himself and Mr. Sergeant, the only living witnesses to what occurred at this time.

At the trial Mr. Sergeant testified that he was manager of the insurance department of a real estate concern in Berkeley; that he called at defendant's home about 10 o'clock on the morning of March 2, 1928; that he did not know Anderson very well, but had met him in November; that he had never seen or heard of Mrs. Anslyn until this morning; that he went to the house to collect a premium that was due for insurance on Anderson's house; that he was in the house for an hour with Anderson and Mrs. Anslyn, and that they were in the kitchen all the time, he and Anderson standing and Mrs. Anslyn sitting on a chair; that they engaged in conversation, and from this conversation he learned that she owned an auto camp in Merced with which he was familiar, and that after some conversation about the auto camp Mrs. Anslyn got up from the chair she was sitting in when she was talking to Sergeant and went out of the room. "Coming back into the kitchen again where Mr. Anderson and I were talking, she said, 'Here is a deed to the property we were talking about at Merced,' and I cannot remember the exact words she said to Mr. Anderson, but she just handed me the deed and I gave it back to her, and she said something to the effect that she was giving this property to Mr. Anderson." At this point counsel for Anderson asked the witness: "Did she hand the deed to him?" Answer: "Yes, she handed him the deed." "And he put it in his pocket?" "Yes." "You actually saw her deliver that deed?" "I saw her." "And heard what she said about giving him the property?" "Yes." On cross-examination Mr. Sergeant testified that no mention was made of a deed from Anderson to Mrs. Anslyn and there was no mention of any other deed; that he did not know what prompted Mrs. Anslyn to spring out of her chair and get the deed or do what she did, and that the only reason he knew of was that they had been discussing the property.

In regard to Mr. Sergeant's testimony concerning the hour of the day he went to Anderson's house, he was asked on cross-examination if he had not told Mr. Fraser, one of counsel for plaintiff, that at the time in question he went to the Anderson house at about 8 o'clock in the evening, and he said he had not, that he had a conversation with Mr. Fraser, and that he told him about having met Anderson about 8 o'clock in the evening during the month of November. To impeach Sergeant, Mr. Fraser testified that on the 3d of April, 1928 (within a month after Mrs. Anslyn died), Mr. Sergeant told him that the meeting when the deed passed took place at 8 o'clock in the evening, that there was no talk between them about a meeting in November, and there was no occasion to talk about a meeting in November.

Concerning what happened at the house when the deed is alleged to have been delivered, the defendant testified: That he saw the deed in the drawer where Mrs. Anslyn had placed it and the next time he saw it was when she brought it in the kitchen, and "she brought it in there and told Mr. Sergeant she was going to deliver it to me, and he glanced at it and looked over it and handed it back to her, and she presented it to me. She gave it to me. I don't remember what was said. She said it was mine. I give it to you. I put it in my pocket. I think I put it back in the drawer next morning with her papers and my papers." That the deed remained in the drawer until after her death, and that Anderson took the deed out of the drawer the day following her death. "Q. Why did you draw these deeds? A. Because she said she wanted to do what was right. She said she wanted to give me that property, as she left me and treated me so mean. Q. What was said about you giving her your property? A. I told her if she done that I am not ungrateful, and I would give her my own home. I owned no other property except about five hundred dollars in the bank." Before the trial Mr. Anderson had been examined under oath before a judge of the superior court concerning the property belonging to Mrs. Anslyn's estate, and on cross-examination he admitted having said at that time that he had known Sergeant about two years, and that "we both had known him"; that at said hearing counsel for plaintiff asked the following questions, and he made the following answers:

"Q. Now, was it (meaning the deed) removed from that place after she put it there (meaning the drawer where Mrs. Anslyn had placed the deed) until you removed it after her death, so far as you know? A. No, sir, I didn't meddle with it at all.

"Q. Had she passed it to you, or handed it to you (meaning the deed) before her death or not? A. Yes, before her death.

"Q. When did she hand it to you? A. It was somewhere around the 1st or 2d of March.

"Q. Now, you have testified that she put it in this drawer when she came home from signing it and that it remained there until after her death. Now, do you desire to change that statement? A. There was a man came there, a Mr. Sergeant, and she delivered it to him and gave it to me in front of him.

"Q. Did you believe that you were entitled to the rent from the Merced Auto Camp, after you got that deed, during Mrs. Anslyn's lifetime, supposing she had lived ten years? A. No, I would not, it wouldn't be mine then.

"Q. You didn't expect to have dominion and control of that property if she lived? A. No, sir.

"Q. You expected that she would continue to pay the taxes and pay the insurance, did you? Is that right? A. Yes, sir."

After Mrs. Anslyn's death, Anderson took the deed from the drawer in question and had the same recorded.

The foregoing somewhat lengthy statement is a fair summary of all the relevant and material facts.

This action is brought by the administratrix of the estate of Mrs. Anslyn to cancel said deed on the ground that it was never delivered.

[1] The trial court made findings and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, but did not make a strictly direct finding as to how the decision was arrived at. However, there is certainly nothing in the findings or in the record that tends to show that the trial court found to be true the facts testified to by defendant concerning the delivery on March 2d.

From the foregoing facts an action might be prosecuted on two theories: First, that the incident which defendant claims occurred on March 2d never took place, and, second, that even if it did take place, there was not a legal delivery. The allegations of plaintiff's complaint relating to delivery are as follows: Paragraph IV: "That on or about the 27th day of February, 1928, Eva V. Anslyn made and acknowledged a deed of the property described * * * to Milton Anderson, a single man. That at the same time and place the said Milton Anderson made and acknowledged a deed to said Eva V. Anslyn of his property, * * * and in said deed he set forth he was a single man, and he acknowledged said deed as a single man." Paragraph V: "That said deed from said Eva V. Anslyn to said Milton Anderson * * * was never delivered to said Milton Anderson or any other person with the intention of becoming absolute or vested." Paragraph VI: "That after the death of said Eva V. Anslyn on the 6th day of March, 1928, the said Milton Anderson obtained possession of said deed from the personal belongings of said Eva V. Anslyn and had the same recorded. * * *" The defendant answered these allegations by way of general denials, and made no allegation concerning how he got possession of the deed. The court found generally that all plaintiff's allegations were true, and made a special finding in the following words: "The court finds that the said deed described in Exhibit A of plaintiff's first cause of action in her complaint was never delivered during the lifetime of the grantor, Eva V. Anslyn, or at all, to said defendant or to any other person." In addition to the pleadings and findings, an examination of the record discloses that the principal issue of fact urged and contested at the trial centered around the fact as to whether or not defendant obtained the manual possession of the deed from Mrs. Anslyn on the 2d day of March. It will be noted that plaintiff's complaint contains two paragraphs relating to delivery: Paragraph 5 is applicable to both theories; paragraph 6, though indirect, raises the issue as to whether or not defendant obtained possession of the deed the day he got it from the drawer or on the 2d day of March, and this fact seems to have been determined by the findings. We therefore conclude that whether or not defendant obtained manual possession of the deed on March 2d was an issue of fact properly before the court, and that the findings determine this fact in favor of plaintiff.

From the foregoing it would seem that, before we can pass on the legal effect of the transactions alleged to have occurred on March 2d, we must first determine whether or not under the evidence we can say, as a matter of law, that the court was in error in finding that what defendant claims happened on March 2d did not occur, because, if the court's finding in this particular is sustained, it would be only of academic interest to try and reconcile the seemingly conflicting cases that counsel present in the case at bar. On one side counsel relies on a line of distinguished cases, of which Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 185 P. 665, and Hotaling v. Hotaling, 193 Cal. 363, 224 P. 455, 56 A. L. R. 734, are quite conspicuous. On the other side is presented a number of eminent cases, of which Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 25 P. 17, and Blackledge v. McIntosh, 85 Cal. App. 475, 259 P. 770, are illustrative.

[2] Now coming to the question about determining as a matter of law that this court should say that the trial judge was not justified in finding that the deed was not even manually delivered on March 2d, it is proper to consider what effect would follow if defendant's contention were upheld: Mrs. Anslyn and Anderson had each made a deed to the other of substantially all their properties. Under the law neither would inherit from the other. Anderson claims his deed was not delivered, but hers was. If her deed was legally delivered and Anderson had died on the 3d of March, his heirs would have taken not only his property, but also the property formerly belonging to Mrs. Anslyn, and she would be left with nothing. If the situation was reversed and Anderson had died first, and Mrs. Anslyn set up the claim that Anderson's deed was delivered to her, but hers to him was not, the situation would be the same on the other side. If both deeds were delivered, it would amount to nothing but an exchange of properties. The defendant testified that Mrs. Anslyn promoted this deal, and that she was a smart business woman. She was presumed to know the law; and the court had a right to consider whether or not she would do what defendant claims she did on March 2d. There is a presumption of law "that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns." Section 1963, Code Civ. Proc.

[3] According to the defendant's own testimony, the deed in question was in Mrs. Anslyn's possession and kept in a drawer by her up to the 2d day of March, and after her death it was found in the same drawer. This raises a presumption it was not delivered. Donahue v. Sweeney, 171 Cal. 388, 153 P. 708.

[4, 5] The foregoing summary of facts and other inferences that may be drawn from reading a transcript of the testimony might be well calculated to form in the court's mind an opinion that Anderson's story of what occurred on March 2d was a very strange and improbable one. Then, too, the plaintiff offered evidence tending to impeach both Anderson and Sergeant, and it was for the trial court to weigh this evidence. And, finally, the trial court saw, observed, and heard the witnesses, and we cannot say as a matter of law that he was not justified in finding that the story told by Anderson and his witness concerning what happened on March 2d was not true.

Defendant's notice of appeal states that the appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The only papers in the record concerning a new trial are the notice of motion and the order denying the motion.

Furthermore, the defendant makes no point in regard to this order.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Wills $\S$ 118.

Facts held to show testatrix acknowledged will in presence of two witnesses present at same time, where both were present during acknowledgment to second person witnessing will day after first witness did (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1276).

Civ. Code, $\S$ 1276, relates to the execution and attestation of a will. Evidence disclosed that testatrix signed and acknowledged the will in the presence of one of the witnesses thereto who, at the same time as such witness, affixed her signature thereto, and that on the day following testatrix showed the will to a second witness, who thereupon read it, and that at such time, and continuously thereafter, during the alleged acknowledgment, the first witness was either in the same room with, or in an adjoining room to that occupied by, testatrix and second witness.

HOUSER, J.

This is an appeal from an order by which a petition for the revocation of the probate of the will of Francis Nita Miner, deceased, was denied.

As stated by appellants, the sole question presented for consideration "is whether the will was acknowledged by decedent in the presence of the two witnesses, present at the same time."

The evidence which related to the acknowledgment of the will which was adduced at the hearing of the contest showed that on a certain date the testatrix signed and acknowledged the will in the presence of one of the witnesses thereto, who at the same time, as such witness, affixed her signature thereto. On the day following, while the second witness and the testatrix were in a bedroom in an apartment occupied by the latter, the testatrix showed the will to the second witness, who thereupon read the same. At that time, and continuously thereafter during the alleged acknowledgment of the will by the testatrix, the first witness was either in the same room with, or in an adjoining room to that occupied by, the testatrix and the second witness. As testified by one of the witnesses, it was "only just a small apartment." The size of each of the rooms was approximately ten by thirteen feet. "It was very close quarters." The door between the two rooms was open, and, with the exception that the first witness did not actually see the second witness attach her signature to the will, the first witness saw all that took place, and heard all that was spoken between or among the persons then and there present. As stated by the first witness, she "had a good idea that she (the second witness) signed it."

In response to a question as to what she heard at the time the will was attested by the second witness, the first witness testified:

"Well, I believe after Mrs. Cotter (the second witness) had read the will, I believe Mrs. Miner said to her, 'What do you think of this,' or, 'What do you think about it?' or, 'What do you think of this will?' and Mrs. Cotter made some remark, that it was perfectly all right for her, it made no difference, if those were her wishes, something to that effect, and Mrs. Miner said, 'Those are my wishes, I want my two own sisters to have my property,' or words to that effect; I don't know, they may not be exactly just the same, but words to that effect that she said. * * * Well, I heard Mrs. Cotter ask her if she was going to leave anything to the half brothers, and she said, no."

In substance, the second witness gave identical testimony.

Primarily section 1276 of the Civil Code contains the rules which govern the execution and attestation of a will of the character of that here under consideration. As far as appears to be pertinent, the requirements are that there must be two attesting witnesses, each of whom must sign the same as a witness, at the end of the will, at the testator's request and in his presence, that the instrument purporting to be a will must be acknowledged by the testator to the attesting witnesses, "to have been made by him," and that at the time of subscribing or acknowledging the will the testator must declare to the attesting witnesses that the instrument is his will.

In Estate of Dow, 181 Cal. 106, 115, 183 P. 794, 798, it is held that, in the execution of an ordinary written will, it is unnecessary that the subscribing witnesses sign their names in the presence of each other. In that connection, in part, the court said: "To hold that the witnesses must sign in the presence of each other would be to write into the statute a requirement that is not there, and would be digging another pitfall for those unfamiliar with judicial decisions who rely upon what seems to be the plain letter of the Code."

No question is raised by appellants regarding the fulfillment of the statutory requirement to the effect that each of the witnesses to the will must subscribe his name thereto "at the testator's request"; in fact, it is conceded by appellants that in the execution of the will the testatrix complied with all statutory requirements, excepting only as to the acknowledgment by her to each of the attesting witnesses, "present at the same time," that the propounded instrument was her will.

In the Estate of Silva, 169 Cal. 116, 122, 145 P. 1015, and later, in the Estate of Cullberg, in the same volume, at pages 365, 368, 146 P. 888, where many authorities are cited in support of the doctrine there announced, it is ruled that in the execution of a will it is unnecessary that the testator in so many words declare the document to be his will, or that he expressly request the witnesses to sign it as such; but that, although such verbal declaration and request be lacking, they may be implied from the conduct of the testator and the attendant circumstances. To the same effect is decided in Estate of Johnson, 152 Cal. 778, 780, 93 P. 1015.

Supplementing the facts hereinbefore set forth, as well as repeating part of them, it appears that at the time in question the testatrix and the second witness to the will went into a bedroom, where the testatrix produced from "a pocket-book * * * in a little desk in the corner," the document here propounded as her will, and which theretofore, under the direction of the testatrix, had been prepared by the first witness, and which had been signed by the testatrix and attested by such first witness. Thereupon the testatrix requested the second witness to read the "paper," and that the first witness bring pen and ink, with which request the first witness complied. The testatrix then inquired of the second witness if she thought it (the will) was "all right"; to which inquiry the witness responded, "Well, it is all right, Nita, if that is your wishes, but wasn't you going to leave Frank and Charley?" To such question the testatrix replied, "No, 'she didn't want any of them to have any of her money, that she hardly knew them until a short time ago, that they were only half brothers and she wanted her two sisters to have her money.'" It also appears that at that time the testatrix stated that "those are my wishes; I want my two own sisters to have my property." The testatrix "said Mrs. Wilson (the first witness) had signed it while I (the second witness) was gone and they was waiting for me to come back to sign it." Thereupon the second witness attached her signature to the will. During all of such time, with the exception hereinbefore noted, the first witness saw or heard everything that was said or occurred as between the testatrix and the second witness. In such circumstances, it would seem impossible to place a construction upon the conduct of the testatrix other than as a declaration to the attesting witnesses, "present at the same time," that the instrument was her will.

The order is affirmed.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is an appeal from a decree of distribution and settlement of final account. The appeal is taken on typewritten transcripts.

The appellants Charles Del Re and Teresa Del Re took a life estate in certain real property in the city of Tulare under the will of Angiola Bacigalupi, deceased. By the terms of this will, their interest in the property was to terminate upon the death of either one of the devisees, and the entire estate was then to go to their six children named in the will. The will contained numerous bequests to relatives of the deceased, and left the residue to a nephew and to a friend in equal shares. The total value of the estate for purposes of distribution was found to be over $76,000, of which amount over $31,- 000 made up the residue devised to these two individuals. In settling the account and decreeing distribution, the trial court determined that all legacies should bear a proportionate amount of the costs of administration, and for that purpose allotted the sum of $1,659.88 to these appellants, making that sum a charge upon the life estate devised to them.

[1] On this appeal the single question involved is whether the expenses of administration should thus be proportioned among the legacies or charged entirely to the residuum. Appellants rely upon the provisions of section 1359, Civil Code, which prescribes the order in which the property of the estate must be resorted to for the payment of debts. They read this section with section 1563, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that all the estate given by will to legatees or devisees is liable for the debts, costs of administration, and family expenses in proportion to the value or amount of the several devises or legacies. They argue that section 1563, Code of Civil Procedure, begins to operate only when the conditions of subdivision 5 of section 1359, Civil Code, occur; that is to say, when all the property mentioned in the first four subdivisions of section 1359, Civil Code, is found insufficient to satisfy the debts and expenses of administration and when resort must therefore be had under subdivision 5 to "all other property ratably," then the method of resorting to the property ratably is that prescribed in section 1563, Code of Civil Procedure.

In order that we may better understand the point involved, we quote the two Code sections in full:

"1359. The property of a testator, except as otherwise specially provided in this code and the Code of Civil Procedure, must be resorted to for the payment of debts, in the following order: One. The property which is expressly appropriated by the will for the payment of the debts; Two. Property not disposed of by the will; Three. Property which is devised or bequeathed to a residuary legatee; Four. Property which is not specifically devised or bequeathed; and, Five. All other property ratably. Before any debts are paid, the expenses of the administration, and the allowance to the family, must be paid or provided for."

"1563. The estate, real and personal, given by will to legatees or devisees, is liable for the debts, expenses of administration, and family expenses, in proportion to the value or amount of the several devises or legacies, but specific devises or legacies are exempt from such liability if it appears to the court necessary to carry into effect the intention of the testator, and there is other sufficient estate."

In support of the decree, the respondent argues that there is an irreconcilable conflict between section 1359, Civil Code, and section 1563, Code of Civil Procedure, if the former is read as in any wise relating to the payment of expenses of administration. Their point is that the Civil Code section prescribing the method the property shall be resorted to relates solely to the payment of debts of the decedent and not to the payment of expenses of administration or of the allowance to the family, and that section 1563, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the method of prorating legacies alone refers to the proration of the expense of administration and allowance to the family. By so interpreting the sections, the respondent has been able to create some inharmony between them, but there is no justification for such interpretation. Section 1563, Code of Civil Procedure, expressly relates to the payment of debts, expenses of administration, and family expenses. It provides for the prorating of these debts and expenses among the various legacies and for the exemption of specific legacies under certain conditions. Manifestly there is to be no prorating of debts of the estate if any of the properties mentioned in the first four subdivisions of section 1359, Civil Code, are available for that purpose, and, in so far as the payment of the debts of the estate are concerned, it is manifest that section 1563 does not begin to operate until we reach the property mentioned in subdivision 5 of section 1359, Civil Code. This is made the more clear by the provisions of subdivision 5 to the effect that the expenses of administration and the allowance for the family must be paid or provided for before any debts are paid. What possible reason could there be for holding that the debts should be paid out of any of the properties mentioned in subdivisions 1 to 4 of section 1359, but that before this is done the expenses of administration and the allowance to the family must be prorated under the provisions of section 1563? Thus section 1560, Code of Civil Procedure, corresponds with subdivision 1 of section 1359 of the Civil Code and section 1562 corresponds with subdivisions 2 and 4 of the Civil Code section except that in the Code of Civil Procedure the words "expenses of administration, and family expenses" are added. There is no section of the Code of Civil Procedure corresponding to subdivision 3, which relates to the devise to a residuary legatee. However, the practice has been uniform from the adoption of these various Code sections that specific devises or legacies shall be exonerated from the payment of debts of the deceased, funeral expenses, and expenses of administration if, in the absence of other provision in the will for that purpose, sufficient property is bequeathed to a residuary legatee; that is to say, the accepted rule is that the order in which the property of the estate is to be resorted to for the payment of debts of the deceased as prescribed in section 1359 has been the accepted and approved order in reference to the payment of funeral expenses, allowance to the family, and expenses of administration. Recent authorities in harmony with this practice are Estate of Babb, 200 Cal. 252, 252 P. 1039, 1042, and Estate of Daly, 202 Cal. 284, 260 P. 296. In Estate of Babb, the Supreme Court, at page 260 of 200 Cal., 252 P. 1039, said: "Property bequeathed to a residuary legatee must be resorted to for the payment of the debts of the deceased, funeral expenses, and expenses of administration, prior to any resort being made to property specifically devised or bequeathed. Civ. Code, § 1359; Code Civ. Proc. § 1563." In that case, as here, the special devise of the life estate to appellants was specific, whereas the bequest to the residuary legatees was general within the definition of section 1357 of the Civil Code. In the Estate of Daly, at page 288 of 202 Cal., 260 P. 296, 298, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the rule that a specific legacy is exempt from the payment of expenses of administration "if there be other sufficient estate to satisfy them, and it was the intention of the testator that the specific legacy be not so charged."

[2] Respondent here earnestly contends that, because the probate court recited in the decree that it was not necessary to exempt this specific life estate in order to carry into effect the intention of the testatrix, therefore this court is bound to assume that the conditions were such that all these expenses should be prorated under the provisions of section 1563, Code Civ. Proc. Aside from the fact, as we have heretofore shown, that this section is applicable to the specific devises and legacies only when there is no other sufficient estate to satisfy them, it is apparent that the record fails to support the respondent in this respect. The best evidence of the intention of the testatrix is the will itself, and we could perceive of no other state of circumstances which would more imperatively call for a finding of necessity that the specific devise should remain intact than one where that devise was of specific real property carrying a life estate to named individuals with the remainder over to others likewise denominated in the will. But, as has been said in Estate of Daly, at page 288 of 202 Cal., 260 P. 296, 298, if it had been the intention of the testatrix to make this life estate subject to equalization for the payment of expenses of administration, it would have been an easy matter to have done so, and the fact that it was not done is persuasive that such was not her intention. No such intention appears from any provision of the will here involved, but, on the other hand, the contrary is evident from the fact that the cash in the estate was left to the residuary legatees sufficient to meet these expenses without resort to the real property covered by the specific legacies.

The order is reversed, with directions to modify the decree in accordance with the views herein expressed.

FINK v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7312.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

May 8, 1930.

As Amended May 20, 1930.

Rehearing Denied June 7, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1930.

1. Statutes ⇨226.

Statute adopted from another state will be given same interpretation as is given to it by courts of state from which adopted.

2. New trial ⇨10.

Party moving for judgment notwithstanding verdict by failing expressly to reserve right to apply for new trial did not waive right to move for new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 629).

Code Civ. Proc. § 629, provides in part that motion for judgment notwithstanding verdict may be made in alternative form, asking therefor, and reserving, if that be denied, the right to apply for a new trial.

3. Prohibition ⇨24.

Appellate court will quash alternative writ of prohibition to prevent expiration of period to move for new trial (Const. art. 6, § 4c).

An order denying the peremptory writ would not become conclusive on rights of parties for period of sixty days after decision under provisions of Const. art. 6, § 4c, and hence while this time was running jurisdiction of lower court to entertain motion for new trial might conceivably expire, which result should be avoided if possible.

Original application by Benjamin Fink for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles, and John L. Fleming, judge thereof, to prevent action on a motion for new trial.

Writ denied.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This original proceeding seeks to prohibit the respondent court from entertaining or passing upon a motion for a new trial in the case of Benjamin Fink, Plaintiff, v. William Weisman et al., Defendants. The circumstances giving rise to this petition are as follows: The case mentioned was tried by the respondent court with a jury. The jury returned its verdict in favor of plaintiff on March 18, 1930, and immediately the defendants orally made motions for a judgment in their favor notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. The court continued the hearing until the following day at 2 o'clock p. m. Prior to the argument counsel for defendants filed with the court written motions for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which written motions were different from those orally made, in this: That the former were in the alternative, that is, reserving to themselves the right to apply for a new trial in the event of a denial of their motions for judgment, which motions were in fact denied by the court. It is now insisted that the defendants had no right to interpose the written motions after the oral motions were made and that by reason of their failure to word the oral motions in the alternative they waived their right to move for a new trial in the regular course of procedure. Motions therefor are now pending and the court is about to hear argument thereon.

The section of the Code of Civil Procedure pertinent to our problem is 629, reading as follows:

"When a motion for a directed verdict, which should have been granted, has been denied and a verdict rendered against the moving party, the court, at any time before the entry of judgment, either of its own motion or on motion of the aggrieved party, shall render judgment in favor of the aggrieved party notwithstanding the verdict.

"A motion for judgment notwithstanding such verdict may also be made in the alternative form, asking therefor and reserving, if that be denied, the right to apply for a new trial. If the motion for a directed verdict or for judgment notwithstanding the verdict be denied, the trial court on motion for new trial or the appellate court on appeal from the judgment may order judgment to be so entered when it appears from the whole evidence that a verdict should have been so directed at the trial; and when the motion is made in the alternative form, the court may also so order on appeal from the other denying such motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, whether a new trial was granted or denied."

[1] We do not need to concern ourselves with any question except the one of waiver by failure to put the motions in the alternative, assuming solely for the purposes hereof that the oral motions precluded the filing of other and altered motions, because the view we now entertain is that the defendants did not waive their rights to apply for a new trial in the regular course of procedure. The section of the Code which we have quoted is, we learn, taken from similar legislation in Minnesota and North Dakota. See Cushman v. Cliff House, 79 Cal. App. 572, 250 P. 575. In accordance with a well-known rule of construction the act is to receive the interpretation given to it by the courts of the states from which the statute is adopted. Cushman v. Cliff House, supra; Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 P. 826. We have found the authorities of Minnesota to be definitely opposed to the contention of petitioner. In Smith v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 132 Minn. 51, 155 N. W. 1046, 1047, the defendant appealed from a judgment against it, it having moved for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, without asking for a new trial. The court affirmed the judgment, taking occasion to say that, "A new trial was not asked for, so that on this appeal we can only consider whether the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict." On a subsequent appeal of the same case from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial (Smith v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 134 Minn. 292, 157 N. W. 499, 159 N. W. 623), the court announced the following: "A motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict does not bar a subsequent motion for a new trial. Sallden v. City of Little Falls, 102 Minn. 358, 113 N. W. 884, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 790, 120 Am. St. Rep. 635. The trial court may entertain a motion for a new trial after the decision upon an appeal from a judgment; there having been a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, but no motion for a new trial. This is definitely decided in Daily v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co., 129 Minn. 432, 152 N. W. 840. In that case there was a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which was denied, and an appeal from the judgment afterwards entered, which was affirmed. An application for a rehearing was made; and there was a request that the case be remanded without prejudice to the right of the defendant to move for a new trial. This court, in denying the motion for a rehearing said: 'The request that the order of this court be so amended as to remand the cause without prejudice to the right of defendant to move for a new trial is also denied. An application for leave to make such motion, if grounds exist therefor, must be addressed to the trial court, and the affirmance here ordered in no way interferes therewith.' The trial court was not without jurisdiction to entertain a motion for a new trial. It entertained the motion and denied it. This court has jurisdiction of an appeal from the order denying it."

In an earlier case from that state (Sallden v. City of Little Falls, 102 Minn. 358, 113 N. W. 884, 885, 13 L. R. A. [N. S.] 790, 120 Am. St. Rep. 635), the reason for the interpretation is made manifest in the following language: "Counsel for plaintiff contends that the order appealed from should be affirmed, for the reason, as he urges, that defendant waived the right to move for a new trial. This contention is based upon the fact that, after the verdict had been returned, defendant moved the court for judgment notwithstanding the same, which motion was denied. Thereafter, upon a settled case, the motion for a new trial was made, heard by the court without objection, and denied. We discover no waiver in this state of the facts. The motion for a new trial was, so far as the record discloses, made within the time prescribed by the statute, and the right to make it was not barred by the previous separate motion for judgment. The cases cited by counsel in support of this contention (Bragg v. Railway Co., 81 Minn. 130, 83 N. W. 511; Wright et al. v. Robinson, 79 Minn. 272, 82 N. W. 632) are not in point. In those cases a motion for judgment was made, and upon that the moving party rested. No motion for a new trial was made at any time, and the court held that the party could not obtain a new trial on an appeal from an order denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict; that by limiting and resting upon the motion for judgment he waived the right to ask for a new trial. In this case the defendant did not rest upon his motion for judgment, but subsequently made his motion for a new trial, which was denied. This is proper practice." (Italics ours.) So, too, the North Dakota authority of Nelson v. Grondahl, 12 N. D. 130, 96 N. W. 299, 301, although the opinion was written prior to the amendment of their statute, throws some light upon the proper interpretation of the legislation. Therein we read: "The respondent contends that the appellant is not entitled to a new trial for the reason that he did not ask for one in connection with his motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, made when the verdict was returned into court, and, in consequence of his failure to do so, has waived his right thereafter to move for a new trial based on a settled statement of the case. We do not think that chapter 63, p. 74, Laws 1901, is subject to such a construction. That law permits a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict to be made either separately or in connection with a motion for a new trial. Nothing in the law indicates that they must be joined, nor that the right to move for a new trial in the usual way is waived if a new trial was not asked in connection with the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. It is true, as repeatedly held in the Minnesota cases, under a law the same as the one under consideration, that a new trial will not be granted by the Supreme Court on review of an order granting or denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, unless such motion includes within it a motion for a new trial.

It is held in such cases that, by failing to unite a motion for a new trial with the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the right to a new trial is waived. This is all that Bragg v. Ry. Co. [81 Minn. 130], 83 N. W. 511, relied on by counsel, decides, as we understand it. In that case no motion for a new trial was made at all in the district court, and for that reason it was held that the right thereto had been waived. This is the extent of the Minnesota decision. In no case is it held that the failure of the moving party to unite a motion for a new trial with his motion for judgment deprives him of his statutory right to move thereafter for a new trial in the usual way."

[2] The conclusion which follows logically and irresistibly is that by the adoption of the section from the laws of the states mentioned there is an entire lack of legislative intent to put the losing party to a waiver of his right to apply in the trial court for a new trial as distinguished from appellate tribunals by his failure to word his motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict in the alternative, and even though our procedure for taking appeals seems to materially vary from that provided in those states we ought not, for that reason only, to so construe the act as to be in opposition to the legislative will.

[3] The petition for the writ in this case made it appear that the law of the states of Minnesota and North Dakota required the motion in arrest of judgment to be worded in the alternative at the peril of waiving the right to make a motion for a new trial. A further perusal of the authorities from those jurisdictions have convinced us that the law is to the contrary and is as we have already expressed it. It is manifest that an order of this court denying the peremptory writ would not become conclusive upon the rights of the parties for a period of 60 days after decision under the provisions of section 4c of article 6 of the Constitution, and hence while this time was running the jurisdiction of the respondent court to entertain the motion for a new trial might conceivably expire. Such a result should be avoided if it be possible. We entertain no doubt concerning our right to undo what we have done and leave the parties to this proceeding in the same position as though the alternative writ had never been issued. This can be accomplished by setting aside and vacating the order that the alternative writ issue, or, in other words, by quashing the writ.

The alternative writ is quashed and the permanent writ denied.

VICKICH v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7044.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California.

May 12, 1930.

Rehearing Denied June 4, 1930. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 7, 1930.

1. Execution ☞158(1).

Superior court has power to stay execution on ordinary judgment of that court.

2. Master and servant ☞416½.

Superior court is without jurisdiction to suspend execution of judgment entered in its records on award of Industrial Accident Commission (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, §§ 20(d), 21, 67(d), Const. art. 20, § 21).

Under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act § 67(d), St. 1917, p. 876, Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, no court, except the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, has jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct, or annul any order or award of Industrial Accident Commission.

3. Master and servant ☞416½.

That Accident Commission reduced amount of original award did not justify superior court in attempting to recall execution on judgment entered in accordance with original award (Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, §§ 21, 67(d)).

Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, § 21 (St. 1917, p. 850, Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, art. 4749), provides that the Industrial Accident Commission may stay execution of any judgment entered on award of commission on good cause appearing therefor.

Original application by Kris Vickich for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Samuel R. Blake, judge thereof, to prevent further proceedings in the matter of a motion to recall and quash execution issued on judgment entered in accordance with an award of the Industrial Accident Commission.

CONREY, P. J.

Petition for writ of prohibition. Petitioner applied to this court for writ of prohibition to prevent respondent court from proceeding further in the matter of a motion to recall and quash an execution upon a judgment entered in accordance with an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

The proceedings by which an award of said commission may be filed in a Superior Court, and judgment entered thereon and the judgment enforced, are outlined in section 21 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917. St. 1917, p. 831; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 4749. When a certified copy of the findings and award of the commission has been filed with the clerk of the Superior Court, judgment must be entered by the clerk in conformity therewith. The certified copy of the findings and award and a copy of the judgment constitute the judgment roll.

[1, 2] In the case of an ordinary judgment of the Superior Court, the power of that court to stay or recall an execution is included in the general authority of the court to control its own proceedings. In said section 21, however, it is provided that "the commission, or any member thereof, may stay the execution of any judgment entered upon an award of the commission, upon good cause appearing therefor and upon such terms and conditions as may be imposed. A certified copy of such order shall be filed with the clerk entering judgment." It would seem to follow that, when a stay has been ordered by the commission or by one of its members, no judge of a Superior Court would have authority to interfere with the operation of the order so made. But the question arises whether the judgment when entered upon an award of the commission becomes a judgment of the Superior Court, of such a nature that, in the absence of any stay order made by the commission or one of its members, the Superior Court acting through one of its judges may stay, or recall, or quash an execution. In section 20 (d) of the Compensation Act, it is provided that the commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over its awards, and may at any time, upon notice, etc., rescind, alter, or amend any award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor, at any time within 245 weeks from the date of the injury. Article 20, section 21, of the Constitution of California, which authorizes the Legislature, by appropriate legislation, to create a system of workmen's compensation, gives to the Legislature plenary power in relation to the manner of review of decisions of the compensation tribunal; "Provided, that all decisions of any such tribunal shall be subject to review by the appellate courts of this state."

Section 67 of the Compensation Act, in subdivision (d) thereof, reads as follows: "The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state relating to writs of review shall, so far as applicable and not in conflict with this act, apply to proceedings in the courts under the provisions of this section. No court of this state, except the supreme court and the district courts of appeal to the extent herein specified, shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order, rule, regulation, decision or award of the commission, or to suspend or delay the operation or execution thereof, or to restrain, enjoin or interfere with the commission in the performance of its duties; provided, that a writ of mandamus shall lie from the supreme court or the district courts of appeal in all proper cases." From the foregoing quotation it appears that the Superior Court is deprived of jurisdiction to suspend or delay the execution of a judgment entered in the records of such court following upon, and in accordance with, an award of the commission. In the case at bar the real question presented is whether or not, in threatening to proceed to the hearing and determination of the motion to recall and quash the execution upon such a judgment, the court is exceeding its jurisdiction, in that it is assuming authority to suspend the operation or execution of the judgment or of the award.

[3] In the proceeding before us, it appears that in accordance with an award made by the commission in favor of petitioner, Kris Vickich, and against one Tony Pleik, judgment was entered on September 15, 1928, in the sum of $1,742.79; that on September 30, 1929, execution was issued and a levy made upon certain real property of the defendant, and the property advertised for sale, to be sold by the sheriff on November 4, 1929. On November 2, 1929, the defendant gave notice of motion to be made in the Superior court on November 12th for an order to recall and quash the execution "on the ground that the execution exceeds the present amount of the award and/or judgment."

With the notice of motion an affidavit was filed, which, among other things, stated that, pursuant to an application made to the commission, the commission on October 29, 1929, modified and reduced the original award, and among other things ordered that indemnity payments under the award be terminated as of August 26, 1928; that, pursuant to the execution and levy made prior to said modification of the award, the property levied upon (unless proceedings under the execution be restrained by order of the court) would be sold under the execution issued on the original judgment rather than on the award and judgment as now modified. Upon said notice of said motion and affidavit, respondent court made an order restraining petitioner and the sheriff from making sale under said execution and levy during the pendency of said motion. The sheriff refused to sell the property, and continued the sale to November 18, 1929. On November 12, 1929, when the motion to recall and quash the execution came before the Superior Court for hearing, the petitioner objected to the hearing upon the ground that said court did not have jurisdiction of said proceeding. The court overruled that objection and indicated its intention to further proceed, and announced that, upon the proper amount of the award being ascertained, an order would be made reducing the amount to conform therewith, and continued the matter to November 15th for further hearing. On November 14, 1929, the petition for writ of prohibition was filed in this court, and an alternative writ issued, wherein and whereby further proceedings in the matter of said motion in the Superior Court are stayed until the further order of this court.

The question at issue here apparently has not been the subject of decision in any other case. In Gamble v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 661, 179 P. 717, it was held that a Superior Court as a court of equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the enforcement by execution of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission upon the ground that the same was obtained by fraud. But the plaintiff in the action there under consideration had not been a party to any proceeding before the commission, and was not a person who would have been entitled to appear before the commission in the proceeding before it. The provisions of the Compensation Act which authorize the entry of judgment upon an award and the issuance of execution thereon in the Superior Court are merely a method adopted for the enforcement of such awards, in lieu of machinery of enforcement which might have been provided for and given to the commission itself, to exercise through executive officers appointed for that purpose. Subject only to review by the Supreme Court or a Court of Appeal, the judicial authority in relation to such awards appears to have been retained entirely within the Industrial Accident Commission. If the facts relied upon by the employer, Pleik, are such as to justify or require the recall or quashing of the execution, the authority to make such order is in direct terms vested in the commission or some one of its members. Section 21 of the Compensation Act so provides. In vesting such authority in one tribunal, it seems clear that the Legislature intended to withhold that authority from any other tribunal. The execution on a judgment entered upon an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, although in the form of an execution upon a judgment of the Superior Court, is in reality an execution upon the award of the commission. The clerk in issuing the execution and the sheriff in making his levy and sale under the writ are for the purposes of the proceeding instrumentalities of the commission in the enforcement of its award. That those officers are respectively the clerk of the county (ex officio clerk of the Superior Court) and sheriff of the county, are simply and only facts which under the statute qualify them to perform these duties. Our conclusion is that respondent court is without jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the motion to recall or quash the execution.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

SPENCE, J.

The petitioners seek to annul the award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the respondent Murphy and against petitioner Pacific Indemnity Company, the insurance carrier of Butler-Veitch. It is contended that the finding that Murphy, while employed as a salesman of Butler-Veitch, sustained injury "occurring in the course and arising out of his employment," is not supported by the evidence.

Murphy was an employee of Butler-Veitch acting as a city salesman of automobiles on a commission basis. Murphy had certain freedom of action, as is customary with such salesmen, but Butler-Veitch generally directed and controlled his activities by requiring definite hours of floor duty and reports on his time spent on work other than floor duty. Murphy worked every third Sunday and was on call at all times. Admittedly Murphy was an employee and would have been entitled to compensation for injuries received in the performance of his customary duties as city salesman. However, he met with the accident here involved under somewhat unusual circumstances.

Butler-Veitch, as Northern California distributors of Marmon and Roosevelt automobiles, sold cars to H. F. Burke, the local retail dealer in Merced. Burke purchased a certain Roosevelt car in May, 1929, and on July 26, 1929, drove the car from Merced to San Francisco and into the mechanical department of Butler-Veitch to have certain adjustments made. That evening Burke returned to Butler-Veitch's store in an intoxicated condition. Mr. Veitch was leaving town, and left orders not to allow Burke to take his car while intoxicated. The following day, Saturday, July 27, neither Mr. Veitch nor Mr. Butler was present. The sales department of the establishment was in charge of Mr. Crogan, and the mechanical department, was in charge of Mr. Reimus. Mr.

1. Master and servant ☞417(7).

In proceedings to review award of Industrial Accident Commission to employee, conflicting evidence must be resolved in favor of employee.

2. Master and servant ☞375(1).

Services of automobile distributor's city salesman injured while driving automobile dealer to home town held within scope of employment for automobile distributor, under evidence (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6 (a), subd. 2).

The evidence disclosed that the automobile distributor sold a local dealer an automobile, but that dealer was not in a condition to drive automobile, and that the city salesman, while driving dealer to his home town at implied, if not express, request of distributor's sales manager was injured. The city salesman was to receive no compensation from the dealer, but was merely to be reimbursed for his expenses.

3. Master and servant ☞361.

Automobile distributor's city salesman, injured while driving dealer to home town, held not employee of dealer, under evidence, within Workmen's Compensation Act.

Crogan was the sales manager supervising the work of the salesmen. Burke again returned to the store on Saturday morning in an intoxicated condition. Murphy was on floor duty at the salesroom, and, seeing Burke's condition, took him to a barber shop and later to a nearby hotel in an effort to straighten him up. Before Murphy left the hotel, Burke told him that he had to get back to Merced, and asked Murphy to drive him there if he could not make it himself. Murphy told Burke that he would, but testified that he had no intention at that time of doing so, believing that Burke would go to sleep and not awake in time to leave that day. Murphy returned to the store and talked to Mr. Crogan about Burke's condition. Mr. Crogan stated that Burke's wife had been ringing up from Merced and that he had been telling her that Burke was all right. Crogan further told Murphy that, if Burke could not get down, he would like to see Murphy take him down or get him down there. Murphy worked on floor duty until 1 o'clock that afternoon. He then called on certain prospects, returning to the salesroom a couple of times. When he returned about 4 o'clock that afternoon, Burke was there waiting for him. Burke was still in an intoxicated condition, and, pursuant to Mr. Veitch's instructions, Mr. Reimus had refused to let him take his car. Burke told Murphy that they would not allow him to drive his car, and renewed his request that Murphy drive him to Merced. Murphy told Burke that, if he had to get to Merced, he would take him. Murphy again spoke to Mr. Crogan and told him that he would have to take Burke to Merced. Crogan said, "Someone will have to get him down there." Murphy took Burke's car with the knowledge and consent of Mr. Crogan and Mr. Reimus and started on the trip with Burke. About two hours later, while Murphy was driving the car towards Merced on the highway near Dublin, an accident occurred in which Murphy sustained his injuries.

Thereafter a question arose as to whether Murphy was entitled to compensation for his injuries from Butler-Veitch or Burke or from both. He filed an application with the commission, joining Butler-Veitch and Burke, together with their respective insurance carriers, as defendants. At the conclusion of the hearing, the commission made its award in favor of respondent Murphy and against petitioner Pacific Indemnity Company, the insurance carrier of Butler-Veitch, and dismissed the action as to the remaining defendants. In effect, the conclusion reached was that Murphy was at the time of the injury an employee of Butler-Veitch and was performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment and acting within the course of his employment as contemplated by section 6 (a), subd. 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 834) and that he was not an employee of Burke. The evidence was sufficient to justify these conclusions and to support the findings made by the commission.

[1] There was some conflict in the evidence, but on this proceeding such conflict must be resolved in favor of the respondent. In addition to the evidence above referred to, it appeared that Murphy had only a slight acquaintance with Burke through seeing Burke at Butler-Veitch's store; that Burke was a customer of Butler-Veitch, but not a prospect for Murphy, as Murphy could not sell to the local dealers; that Murphy did not desire to make the long trip involved, but felt that he "was elected to take him down"; that he undertook the driving of Burke's car merely as a courtesy on the part of his employers; that various courtesies of a similar nature were customarily performed by distributors for their customers; that Murphy was to receive no compensation from Burke, but merely reimbursement for the expenses incurred; that Mr. Veitch testified that to a certain degree Murphy was performing a service for Butler-Veitch in driving Burke to Merced; that, while normally some one regularly assigned to driving would have been assigned to such work, Mr. Veitch stated that under the circumstances he might have told Murphy to "go ahead" if he had been personally present.

[2, 3] The services performed by Murphy in driving Burke to Merced were exceptional and were not within the usual scope of his employment as a city salesman. Nevertheless, it may properly be inferred from the evidence that these services were connected with his employers' business, were of benefit to the employers and not personal to the employee, and were performed on behalf of the employers at the implied, if not express, request of their sales manager, Mr. Crogan. Under these circumstances the services were within the actual scope of Murphy's employment, and the fact that they were outside of the usual scope of his employment is immaterial. Engels Copper Mining Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 183 Cal. 714, 192 P. 845, 11 A. L. R. 785; Payne v. Industrial Accident Commission, 84 Cal. App. 657, 258 P. 620. The evidence failed to show any hiring of Murphy by Burke so as to establish the relationship of employer and employee between them within the meaning of the act. The evidence justified the findings made, and the commission did not exceed its jurisdiction.

The award is affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover moneys alleged to be due under an oral contract. The defendant answered and the trial was had in the lower court before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed and has brought up a typewritten record.

Mr. M. T. Dolman, president of the plaintiff corporation, met Mr. W. Flanders Setchel, the general manager of the defendant corporation, and a conversation was had regarding the employment of the plaintiff by the defendant as its advertising agent. Thereafter, on August 10, 1927, the two met again, and at that time Mr. Dolman delivered to Mr. Setchel a written plan, which is set forth in the transcript. It included the use of advertisements in newspapers, window cards, window streamers, and "throw away cards." Newspaper advertising was to be done in the metropolitan daily newspapers of San Francisco and Oakland. The advertisement in each newspaper was estimated as to size and the cost per week. Each other item of the plan was estimated as to quantity and the cost of each item. After that conversation, on August 12, 1927, the plaintiff wrote the defendant a letter confirming the conversation. Omitting irrelevant parts, and for our convenience numbering the paragraphs, the letter stated:

"1. We wish to thank you for placing your advertising account with this agency, and to confirm our understanding of the basis upon which it is to be handled.

"For the present all that is required is for us to prepare a booklet, illustrating Keaton Tires and describing their various points of superiority.

"And to plan and prepare and place a campaign of advertising to appear in San Francisco and Oakland newspapers (to be selected later) featuring Keaton Week, August 21.

"To supervise the preparation of publicity matter under the direction of Mr. A. S. Peterson, to be furnished the newspapers.

"To plan and prepare such window streamers and window cards and display advertising material as may be deemed necessary and compatible with good judgment.

"2. It is understood further that these arrangements, tentatively entered into by Mr. Setchel and this agency are contingent also upon confirmation by your permanent board of directors.

"3. It is agreed further that the Dolman Company, Inc., is to be assured, during the life of any agreement of a minimum remuneration of $50.00 per month, regular agency commissions to apply against this fee.

"4. It is agreed by you that the Dolman Company, Inc., is to retain any and all customary agency commissions from publications, etc., that you will remit to us for all monthly bills on or before the tenth of the month following date of invoice, and you will receive, for this a 2 per cent cash discount for such payments, but only when the monthly invoices have been paid in full."

The advertising was to take place during "Keaton Week," which was to commence on the 21st day of August, 1927. That letter was not answered by a letter written by the defendant. However, after the letter was written the plaintiff proceeded to prepare the advertising matter including the wording, size, etc., of the newspaper advertisement. Having done so, it caused its secretary to take the proofs and submit them to the defendant. When she returned and made her report, on August 19, 1927, the plaintiff wrote the defendant a letter confirming the conversation between the plaintiff's secretary and the defendant and stating that the plaintiff would make certain corrections which had been suggested. In that letter the plaintiff stated the cost of each newspaper advertisement and also the total thereof. After that letter was sent the advertisements were inserted in the newspapers. No claim is made that said advertisements did not in form, in size, and in all other respects conform with the terms of the oral agreements. During the oral negotiations the defendant discussed its desire to pay for some of the advertising in trade. Mr. M. T. Dolman testified that he stated to the defendant that agreements to pay in trade must be negotiated by the agents of the defendant and not by the agents of the plaintiff, but that otherwise such arrangements would be satisfactory to the plaintiff. Mr. William A. Dolman testified that prior to the placing of the advertisements he had a conversation with Mr. Setchel in which he stated to Mr. Setchel the necessity of bills being paid to the plaintiff promptly to the end that the plaintiff in turn could make its payments promptly to the newspapers and thus obtain the benefit of certain liberal discounts which were made to the plaintiff by the newspapers and which enabled the plaintiff to give to its patrons more liberal terms. Before "Keaton Week" had ended no further communications, oral or written, were had between the witnesses above named.

The plaintiff pleaded its claim in five separate counts. The defendant denied many of the allegations, but as to the newspapers, it admitted that it employed the plaintiff to place the advertising, but contended that the advertising was limited to $1,200 and that it was to be paid for in trade and that each application for advertisements should have indorsed thereon a stipulation to that effect.

After the "Keaton Week" had taken place, the plaintiff paid the bills which it had incurred and asked the defendant to pay it. The defendant did not do so and this action was commenced. The defendant does not claim that it did not authorize everything done which the plaintiff did, nor does it claim any defect in the performance by the plaintiff, except as we shall note.

[1-4] Using the language of defendant: "The issues were (1) Whether the agency was authorized to place advertising to the extent of $1,200 and no more; (2) whether such advertising was to be placed only upon condition that the newspapers would take payment therefor in tires and (3) whether in any event the defendant's liability to pay therefor was to the newspapers or to the agency." The defendant does not follow this order in briefing, but the gravamen of its complaint is that the issues so enumerated were not properly presented by reason of certain errors committed at the trial. In assignments 1, 3, 4, 6, and 9 the defendant complains of the admission of evidence showing payments made by the plaintiff. It asserts the plaintiff in making the payment acted as a volunteer. We think

It did not do so. Paragraph 4 of the letter written August 12, 1927, shows that defendant was to pay the plaintiff and that the plaintiff was to pay the newspapers, receive the discount, and retain the discount to its own use. There was other evidence which clearly authorized, at least by implication, plaintiff to pay the other expenses which it was expressly authorized to incur. The defendant complains because evidence of usage was introduced. It was in the nature of a description of the business in hand which is somewhat out of the ordinary. Among other things, it showed the following: As to a newspaper, an advertising agency undertakes to solicit and finally prepare for insertion advertising matter and to collect therefor and then to pay the newspaper. In turn the newspaper gives to the agency liberal discounts on the payments which are made promptly. As to the advertiser, the agency undertakes to inform itself of his wants and needs and express them in the most effective form for insertion in a newspaper, to select the place in the newspaper where the advertisement is to be inserted, to obtain the most efficient and economical space, and make all arrangements therefor. On all of these matters it undertakes to be informed as fully as the proprietors of newspapers. Both as to the newspaper and as to the advertiser it undertakes to do perfect work. In the interest of the newspaper and also in the interest of the advertiser it undertakes to make payments promptly, obtain discounts for the prompt payments, and give the advertiser the benefit of the cheapest service possible. Mr. Dolman testified that he stated these matters to Mr. Setchel. Continuing, he testified that said facts were the general usage. Evidence of the covenants of standard forms of contracts used by agencies and newspapers was admitted. We think the trial court did not err in admitting it. It was but a method of showing what the nature of one of these transactions is in the absence of express covenants to the contrary. As the contract, if any, between the plaintiff and defendant rested in parol the evidence just referred to was not improper. Letters written by the parties after the end of "Keaton Week" were introduced. The defendant asserts that they were improperly received and were in the nature of self-serving declarations. The point is not sustained by the record. As recited in paragraph 2 of the letter dated August 12, 1927, Mr. Setchel endeavored to hold the contract open until it was confirmed by the defendant's "permanent board of directors." As neither a confirmation nor objection of defendant's "permanent board of directors" was sent forward before the plaintiff had fully performed everything by it to be done and performed, at least as to some parts of the agreement, the terms were not agreed to. Until all communications, written or oral, made before the trial were received and considered, the jury under the circumstances was not in a position to ascertain exactly what had been agreed to and what had not been agreed to. From what has been said above it is patent that defendant's motion to strike out the written estimate dated August 10, 1927, was properly denied, and the same comment applies to the motion to strike the letter dated August 12, 1927.

[5] The defendant makes several attacks on the giving or refusing to give instructions. We do not find any merit in any one of the attacks. It objects to instruction No. VI. It says that the instruction submitted to the jury whether the letters constituted a contract; that it is in conflict with instruction No. VII; and that it withdrew from the jury the question of authority. A bare reading of it shows that it did nothing of the kind. It was not addressed to authority. That subject was fully discussed in other instructions. It complains of instruction No. VII. That objection is hypercritical and rests on a typographical error. The letter dated August 12th contained statements regarding the times within which payment should be made. The letter dated August 19th contained a list of the amounts that would be due each paper. Instruction No. VII clearly refers to both letters, but inadvertently repeats 19th instead of using 12th when referring to the letter which specified the times of payments.

[6, 7] The trial court refused to give defendant's proposed instruction No. II. That instruction purported to state the law as to the authority of this plaintiff to pay the newspapers and thereafter collect from the defendant. It purports to follow Civil Code, § 2343. That section states the law as to an agent's obligation to a third person. In this case we are considering the rights and obligations between principal and agent. In 2 C. J. 793, the rule is stated as follows: "Except where the contract of agency contains stipulations contrary to or inconsistent with any right of the agent to * * * reimbursement for liabilities or expenditures incurred in the furtherance of the agency, an agent ordinarily is entitled * * * to reimbursement from his principal for all advances and expenditures properly made in carrying into effect the purposes of the agency." The text cites, among other authorities, Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Central R. Co., 6 Cal. Unrep. 202, 55 P. 777. Applying that rule to the instant case, there was nothing precluding the plaintiff from making the payments. There was no covenant in the contract limiting its right so to do.

[8] Complaint is also made because the trial court refused to give defendant's requested instruction No. IV. The court did not err. The instruction was an improper statement of the law. Among other things it purported to withdraw the letter dated August 12, 1927, as being no part of the evidence of the contract between the parties. To have so held would have been to commit reversible error.

The plaintiff asserts that the judgment was excessive in the sum of $50. The plaintiff admits the fact and asks that the judgment be modified accordingly. Therefore the words "the sum of two thousand three hundred and eighty-nine and two one hundredths ($2,389.02)" contained in the judgment are changed to read as follows: "the sum of two thousand three hundred and thirty-nine and two one hundredths ($2,339.02)."

As so modified the judgment is affirmed, and the plaintiff will recover its costs on this appeal.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiffs sued for breach of contract for a sale of personal property. The cause was tried before a jury and resulted in a verdict for plaintiffs in the sum of $1,000. Defendants appeal upon typewritten transcripts.

The contract was oral and called for the sale to defendants of a grocery store for the full purchase price of $3,700, $1,000 of which was to be paid at the time of transfer, the balance in monthly installments of $150 each. Defendants made the first payment, plaintiffs transferred the property to them, and they took possession, which they retained until after this action was filed. While still in possession, defendants repudiated the contract in toto. Plaintiffs' complaint is framed in two causes of action; the first on the contract itself, and the second for the recovery of damages for the breach.

[1] On this appeal the appellants insist that the action was premature because the contract called for monthly payments and these payments were not due at the time the suit was filed. In answer, the respondents rely upon the well-settled rule that, when the repudiation of an executory contract results in a violation of the contract "in omnibus," the injured party may treat the entire contract as at an end and sue for damages for the breach. 6 R. C. L. pp. 1024, 1025; 6 Cal. Jur. pp. 464, 465.

[2] It is argued that there is a fatal variance between the evidence and pleadings, because the plaintiffs alleged that the full balance of $2,700 was due, whereas the evidence showed that this amount was agreed to be paid in monthly installments of $150 each. If plaintiffs were suing to enforce the contract there might be some merit in the point, but, where they rely upon the repudiation as a breach of the entire contract, the evidence as to the amount due was merely evidence of plaintiffs' damages for the breach, and was in no sense a variance from the pleadings in so far as the second cause of action was concerned.

[3] It is also argued that the verdict cannot be justified because under the provisions of section 3310, Civil Code, the full contract price is the measure of the detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, whereas in this action the jury awarded the plaintiffs no more than $1,000. If the point were raised by the plaintiffs, we might be constrained to give it some consideration, but we cannot perceive how the defendants can possibly be prejudiced through a verdict of $1,000 instead of $2,700.

[4] Finally it is argued that the trial judge was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in the matter of instructions to the jury. The point is this: It was stipulated that the property had been sold under attachment proceedings and that the sheriff held in his possession the sum of $533.66, as the proceeds of such sale. After the jury had retired under instructions to which no objections have been made, it returned to the courtroom, and one of the jurors stated to the trial judge that they wished to know whether they were to determine the amount of money in possession of the sheriff and what was to be done with it. The trial judge instructed the jury that it had nothing to do with that matter, but that, if the plaintiffs were to prevail, the amount in the hands of the sheriff would be credited to them. To this statement both counsel agreed in the presence of the jury. The further discussion between court and counsel along the same lines was nothing more than an amplification of this statement. As all that was said in the presence of the jury which could possibly be deemed prejudicial to the defendants was expressly agreed to by their counsel, they may not at this time make the claim of prejudice.

We find no error in the record.

FINCH, P. J.

This is an action to recover the balance alleged to be due on a promissory note. The answer alleges and the court found that the note had been paid in full prior to the commencement of the action, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment. The only question to be determined is whether the note has been paid.

At all times during the transactions mentioned herein, the plaintiff was the assistant secretary of the Los Angeles Wholesalers' Board of Trade and acted in that capacity in connection with such transactions. Prior to April 8, 1925, Mayme Crew was operating as a retail merchant. She became indebted to a number of creditors and was unable to pay them. On the day mentioned, she entered into an agreement with the defendant C. A. Robinson and the plaintiff, by the terms of which she agreed to sell her business and stock of merchandise to Robinson for the sum of $7,000, to be evidenced by a promissory note for that sum payable to the plaintiff and executed by Robinson and J. H. McGehee. The defendants gave the plaintiff their promissory note in accordance with the terms of the contract, and Robinson and his wife, the defendant Myrtle Robinson, took charge of the business. The business did not prove profitable, and on November 13, 1925, the following agreement was executed by the persons named therein:

"This Agreement, Made this 13 day of November, 1925, between C. A. and Myrtle Robinson, * * * parties of the first part, hereinafter referred to as assignor, L. Boteler, * * * party of the second part, hereinafter referred to as assignee, and the creditors of the assignor signing this agreement, consenting hereto in writing or whose claims may be filed with and allowed by the assignee, parties of the third part,

"Witneseth: That said assignor, for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements to be performed by the parties of the second and third parts, as hereinafter contained, and the sum of $1 to assignor in hand paid by the assignee, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, does by these presents grant, bargain, sell, assign and transfer unto said assignee, his heirs and assigns forever, all of the property of the assignor of every kind and nature and wheresoever situated, both real and personal, not exempt from execution, including all that certain stock of merchandise, store furniture and fixtures, book accounts, books, bills receivable, cash on hand, choses in action, insurance policies, and all other personal property of every kind and nature situated in or pertaining to that store * * * now owned and conducted by said assignor, * * * except real estate leases and leasehold interests in real estate. Said assignee to receive the said property, conduct the said business, should he deem it proper, and is hereby authorized at any time after the signing hereof by said assignor to sell and dispose of the said property upon such time and terms as he may see fit, and is to pay said parties of the third part, pro rata, according to the several indebtedness due to them from the said assignor, the net proceeds arising from the conducting of said business and sale and disposal of said property after deducting all moneys which said assignee may at his option pay for the discharge of any lien on any of said property and any preferred indebtedness, and all charges (subject to the Constitution, By-Laws and Rules of the Los Angeles Wholesalers' Board of Trade, which are hereby made a part hereof).

"In consideration of the premises the parties of the third part do hereby agree to accept their pro rata portion of the net recoveries from this estate as paid to them by said assignee."

The Robinsons made payments on their promissory note to the plaintiff in the aggregate sum of about $3,500. The assets of the assignors were sold by the plaintiff and the net proceeds applied pro rata in accordance with the terms of the assignment, each creditor receiving about 40 per cent. of the amount of his claim. Out of such proceeds the plaintiff received and credited on the note the sum of $1,982.57, leaving a large balance due thereon. A. B. Fately was an adjuster of the Los Angeles Wholesalers' Board of Trade. In that capacity he procured the assignment involved herein. In relation to the execution of the assignment, the following testimony was given by the defendant C. A. Robinson over the plaintiff's objection that "it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and wholly outside the issues in this case; * * * and for the further reason that it is an attempt to alter, vary or contradict the terms of a written contract."
